The war was declared because Great Britain arrogated to herself the pretension of regulating foreign trade, under the delusive name of retaliatory Orders in Council—a pretension by which she undertook to proclaim to American enterprise, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." Orders which she refused to revoke after the alleged cause of their enactment had ceased; because she persisted in the act of impressing American seamen; because she had instigated the Indians to commit hostilities against us; and because she refused indemnity for her past injuries upon our commerce. I throw out of the question other wrongs. The war in fact was announced, on our part, to meet the war which she was waging on her part. So undeniable were the causes of the war; so powerfully did they address themselves to the feelings of the whole American people, that when the bill was pending before this House, gentlemen in the opposition, although provoked to debate, would not, or could not, utter one syllable against it. It is true they wrapped themselves up in sullen silence, pretending that they did not choose to debate such a question in secret session. Whilst speaking of the proceedings on that occasion, I beg to be permitted to advert to another fact that transpired—an important fact, material for the nation to know, and which I have often regretted had not been spread upon our journals. My honorable colleague (Mr. McKEE) moved, in Committee of the Whole, to comprehend France in the war; and when the question was taken upon the proposition, there appeared but ten votes in support of it, of whom seven belonged to this side of the House, and three only to the other!

It is said that we were inveigled into the war by the perfidy of France; and that had she furnished the document in time, which was first published in England, in May last, it would have been prevented. I will concede to gentlemen everything they ask about the injustice of France towards this country. I wish to God that our ability was equal to our disposition to make her feel the sense we entertain of that injustice. The manner of the publication of the paper in question, was undoubtedly extremely exceptionable. But I maintain that, had it made its appearance earlier, it would not have had the effect supposed; and the proof lies in the unequivocal declarations of the British Government. I will trouble you, sir, with going no further back than to the letters of the British Minister, addressed to the Secretary of State, just before the expiration of his diplomatic functions. It will be recollected by the Committee that he exhibited to this Government a despatch from Lord Castlereagh, in which the principle was distinctly avowed, that to produce the effect of the repeal of the Orders in Council, the French decrees must be absolutely and entirely revoked as to all the world, and not as to America alone. A copy of that despatch was demanded of him, and he very awkwardly evaded it. But, on the 10th of June, after the bill declaring war had actually passed this House, and was pending before the Senate, (and which, I have no doubt was known to him,) in a letter to Mr. Monroe, he says: "I have no hesitation, sir, in stating that 'Great Britain, as the case has hitherto stood, never did, nor ever could engage, without the greatest injustice to herself and her allies, as well as to other neutral nations, to repeal her orders as affecting America alone, leaving them in force against other States, upon condition that France would except singly and specially America from the operation of her decrees.'" On the 14th of the same month, the bill still pending before the Senate, he repeats: "I will now say, that I feel entirely authorized to assure you, that if you can, at any time, produce a full and unconditional repeal of the French decrees, as you have a right to demand it in your character of a neutral nation, and that it be disengaged from any question concerning our maritime rights, we shall be ready to meet you with a revocation of the Orders in Council. Previously to your producing such an instrument, which I am sorry to see you regard as unnecessary, you cannot expect of us to give up our Orders in Council." Thus, sir, you see that the British Government would not be content with a repeal of the French decrees as to us only. But the French paper in question was such a repeal. It could not, therefore, satisfy the British Government. It could not, therefore, have induced that Government, had it been earlier promulgated, to repeal the Orders in Council. It could not, therefore, have averted the war. The withholding of it did not occasion the war, and the promulgation of it would not have prevented the war. But gentlemen have contended that, in point of fact, it did produce a repeal of the Orders in Council. This, I deny. After it made its appearance in England, it was declared by one of the British Ministry, in Parliament, not to be satisfactory. And all the world knows, that the repeal of the Orders in Council resulted from the inquiry, reluctantly acceded to by the Ministry, into the effect upon their manufacturing establishments, of our non-importation law, or to the warlike attitude assumed by this Government, or to both. But it is said, that the Orders in Council are done away, no matter from what cause; and, that having been the sole motive for declaring the war, the relations of peace ought to be restored. This brings me into an examination of the grounds for continuing the war.

I am far from acknowledging that had the Orders in Council been repealed, as they have been, before the war was declared, the declaration would have been prevented. In a body so numerous as this, from which the declaration emanated, it is impossible to say with any degree of certainty what would have been the effect of such a repeal. Each member must answer for himself. I have no hesitation then in saying, that I have always considered the impressment of American seamen as much the most serious aggression. But, sir, how have those orders at last been repealed? Great Britain, it is true, has intimated a willingness to suspend their practical operation, but she still arrogates to herself the right to revive them upon certain contingencies, of which she constitutes herself the sole judge. She waives the temporary use of the rod, but she suspends it in terrorem over our heads. Supposing it was conceded to gentlemen that such a repeal of the Orders in Council, as took place on the 23d of June last, exceptionable as it is, being known before the war, would have prevented the war, does it follow that it ought to induce us to lay down our arms without the redress of any other injury? Does it follow, in all cases, that that which would have prevented the war in the first instance should terminate the war? By no means. It requires a great struggle for a nation, prone to peace as this is, to burst through its habits and encounter the difficulties of war. Such a nation ought but seldom to go to war. When it does, it should be for clear and essential rights alone, and it should firmly resolve to extort, at all hazards, their recognition. The war of the Revolution is an example of a war begun for one object and prosecuted for another. It was waged in its commencement against the right asserted by the parent country to tax the colonies. Then no one thought of absolute independence. The idea of independence was repelled. But the British Government would have relinquished the principle of taxation. The founders of our liberties saw, however, that there was no security short of independence, and they achieved our independence. When nations are engaged in war, those rights in controversy, which are acknowledged by the Treaty of Peace, are abandoned. And who is prepared to say that American seamen shall be surrendered the victims to the British principle of impressment? And, sir, what is this principle? She contends that she has a right to the services of her own subjects: that, in the exercise of this right, she may lawfully impress them, even although she finds them in our vessels, upon the high seas, without her jurisdiction. Now, I deny that she has any right, without her jurisdiction, to come on board our vessels on the high seas, for any other purpose but in pursuit of enemies, or their goods, or goods contraband of war. But she further contends that her subjects cannot renounce their allegiance to her and contract a new obligation to other Sovereigns. I do not mean to go into the general question of the right of expatriation. If, as is contended, all nations deny it, all nations at the same time admit and practise the right of naturalization. Great Britain herself does. Great Britain, in the very case of foreign seamen, imposes perhaps fewer restraints upon naturalization than any other nation. Then, if subjects cannot break their original allegiance, they may, according to universal usage, contract a new allegiance. What is the effect of this double obligation? Undoubtedly that the Sovereign having possession of the subject would have a right to the services of the subject. If he return within the jurisdiction of his primitive Sovereign, he may resume his right to his services, of which the subject by his own act could not divest himself. But his primitive Sovereign can have no right to go in quest of him, out of his own jurisdiction, into the jurisdiction of another Sovereign, or upon the high seas, where there exists either no jurisdiction, or it belongs to the nation owning the ship navigating them. But, sir, this discussion is altogether useless. It is not to the British principle, objectionable as it is, that we are alone to look; it is to her practice—no matter what guise she puts on. It is in vain to assert the inviolability of the obligation of allegiance. It is in vain to set up the plea of necessity, and to allege that she cannot exist without the impressment of her seamen. The truth is, she comes, by her press gangs, on board of our vessels, seizes our native seamen, as well as naturalized, and drags them into her service. It is the case, then, of the assertion of an erroneous principle, and a practice not conformable to the principle—a principle which, if it were theoretically right, must be forever practically wrong. We are told by gentlemen in the opposition that Government has not done all that was incumbent on it to do to avoid just cause of complaint on the part of Great Britain; that, in particular, the certificates of protection, authorized by the act of 1796, are fraudulently used. Sir, Government has done too much in granting those paper protections. I can never think of them without being shocked. They resemble the passes which the master grants to his negro slave: "Let the bearer, Mungo, pass and repass without molestation." What do they imply? That Great Britain has a right to take all who are not provided with them. From their very nature they must be liable to abuse on both sides. If Great Britain desires a mark by which she can know her own subjects, let her give them an ear mark. The colors that float from the mast-head should be the credentials of our seamen. There is no safety to us, and the gentlemen have shown it, but in the rule that all who sail under the flag (not being enemies) are protected by the flag. It is impossible that this country should ever abandon the gallant tars who have won for us such splendid trophies. Let me suppose that the Genius of Columbia should visit one of them in his oppressor's prison and attempt to reconcile him to his wretched condition. She would say to him, in the language of the gentlemen on the other side, "Great Britain intends you no harm;

"she did not mean to impress you, but one of her own subjects; having taken you by mistake, I will remonstrate, and try to prevail upon her by peaceable means to release you, but I cannot, my son, fight for you." If he did not consider this mockery, he would address her judgment, and say, "You owe me, my country, protection; I owe you in return obedience. I am no British subject, I am a native of old Massachusetts, where live my aged father, my wife, and my children. I have faithfully discharged my duty. Will you refuse to do yours?" Appealing to her passions, he would continue, "I lost this eye in fighting under Truxton with the Insurgent; I got this scar before Tripoli; I broke this leg on board the Constitution when the Guerriere struck." If she remained still unmoved, he would break out, in the accents of mingled distress and despair,

"Hard, hard, is my fate! once I freedom enjoyed,

"Was as happy as happy could be!

"Oh! how hard is my fate, how galling these chains!"

I will not imagine the dreadful catastrophe to which he would be driven by an abandonment of him to his oppressor. It will not be, it cannot be, that his country will refuse him protection!

It is said, that Great Britain has been always willing to make a satisfactory arrangement of the subject of impressment; and that Mr. King had nearly concluded one prior to his departure from that country. Let us hear what that Minister says upon his return to America. In his letter dated at New York, in July, 1803, after giving an account of his attempt to form an arrangement for the protection of our seamen, and his interviews to this end with Lords Hawkesbury and St. Vincent; and stating that, when he had supposed the terms of a convention were agreed upon, a new pretension was set up, (the mare clausum.) he concludes: "I regret not to have been able to put this business on a satisfactory footing, knowing as I do its very great importance to both parties; but I flatter myself that I have not misjudged the interests of our own country, in refusing to sanction a principle that might be productive of more extensive evils than those it was our aim to prevent." The sequel of his negotiation, on this affair, is more fully given in the recent conversation between Mr. Russell and Lord Castlereagh, communicated to Congress during its present session. Lord Castlereagh says to Mr. Russell:

"Indeed there has evidently been much misapprehension on this subject, and an erroneous belief entertained that an arrangement in regard to it has been nearer an accomplishment than the facts will warrant. Even our friends in Congress—I mean those who were opposed to going to war with us—have been so confident in this mistake, that they have ascribed the failure of such an arrangement solely to the misconduct of the American Government. This error probably originated with Mr. King; for, being much esteemed here, and always well received by the persons in power, he seems to have misconstrued their readiness to listen to his representations, and their warm professions of a disposition to remove the complaints of America in relation to impressment, into a supposed conviction on their part of the propriety of adopting the plan which he had proposed. But Lord St. Vincent, whom he might have thought he had brought over to his opinions, appears never for a moment to have ceased to regard all arrangement on the subject to be attended with formidable, if not insurmountable obstacles. This is obvious from a letter which his Lordship addressed to Sir William Scott at the time."

Here Lord Castlereagh read a letter, contained in the records before him, in which Lord St. Vincent states to Sir William Scott the zeal with which Mr. King had assailed him on the subject of impressment, confesses his own perplexity, and total incompetency to discover any practical project for the safe discontinuance of that practice, and asks for counsel and advice. "Thus you see," proceeded Lord Castlereagh, "that the confidence of Mr. King on this subject was entirely unfounded."

Thus, continued Mr. CLAY, it is apparent, that, at no time, has the enemy been willing to place this subject on a satisfactory footing. I will speak hereafter of the overtures made by the Administration since the war.

The honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. BLEECKER,) in the very sensible speech with which he favored the Committee, made one observation that did not comport with his usual liberal and enlarged views. It was, that those who are most interested against the practice of impressment did not desire a continuance of the war on account of it, while those (the Southern and Western members) who had no interest in it, were zealous advocates of the American seaman. It was a provincial sentiment, unworthy of that gentleman. It was one which, in a change of condition, he would not express, because I know he could not feel it. Does not that gentleman feel for the unhappy victims of the tomahawk in the Western country, although his quarter of the Union may be exempted from similar barbarities? I am sure he does. If there be a description of rights which, more than any other, should unite all parties in all quarters of the Union, it is unquestionably the rights of the person. No matter what his vocation, whether he seeks subsistence amid the dangers of the deep, or draws it from the bowels of the earth, or from the humblest occupations of mechanic life, whenever the sacred rights of an American freeman are assailed, all hearts ought to unite and every arm should be braced to vindicate his cause.

The gentleman from Delaware sees in Canada no object worthy of conquest. According to him, it is a cold, sterile, and inhospitable region; and yet, such are the allurements which it offers, that the same gentleman apprehends that, if it be annexed to the United States, already too much weakened by an extension of territory, the people of New England will rush over the line and depopulate that section of the Union. That gentleman considers it honest to hold Canada as a kind of hostage; to regard it as a sort of bond, for the good behaviour of the enemy. But he will not enforce the bond. The actual conquest of that country would, according to him, make no impression upon the enemy, and yet the very apprehension only of such a conquest would, at all times, have a powerful operation upon him. Other gentlemen consider the invasion of that country as wicked and unjustifiable. Its inhabitants are represented as unoffending, connected with those of the bordering States by a thousand tender ties, interchanging acts of kindness, and all the offices of good neighborhood. Canada innocent! Canada unoffending! Is it not in Canada that the tomahawk of the savage has been moulded into its deathlike form? From Canadian magazines, Malden, and others, that those supplies have been issued which nourish and sustain the Indian hostilities? Supplies which have enabled the savage hordes to butcher the garrison of Chicago, and to commit other horrible murders? Was it not by the joint co-operation of Canadians and Indians that a remote American fort, Michilimackinac, was fallen upon and reduced while the garrison was in ignorance of a state of war? But, sir, how soon have the opposition changed! When the Administration was striving, by the operation of peaceful measures, to bring Great Britain back to a sense of justice, they were for old-fashioned war. And now, that they have got old-fashioned war, their sensibilities are cruelly shocked, and all their sympathies are lavished upon the harmless inhabitants of the adjoining provinces. What does a state of war present? The united energies of one people arrayed against the combined energies of another; a conflict in which each party aims to inflict all the injury it can, by sea and land, upon the territories, property, and citizens of the other, subject only to the rules of mitigated war practised by civilized nations. The gentlemen would not touch the continental provinces of the enemy, nor I presume, for the same reason, her possessions in the West Indies. The same humane spirit would spare the seamen and soldiers of the enemy. The sacred person of His Majesty must not be attacked, for the learned gentlemen on the other side are quite familiar with the maxim, that the King can do no wrong. Indeed, sir, I know of no person on whom we may make war, upon the principles of the honorable gentlemen, except Mr. Stephen, the celebrated author of the Orders in Council, or the Board of Admiralty, who authorize and regulate the practice of impressment.

The disasters of the war admonish us, we are told, of the necessity of terminating the contest. If our achievements upon the land have been less splendid than those of our intrepid seamen, it is not because the American soldier is less brave. On the one element, organization, discipline, and a thorough knowledge of their duties, exist on the part of the officers and their men. On the other, almost everything is yet to be acquired. We have, however, the consolation that our country abounds with the richest materials, and that, in no instance, when engaged in an action, have our arms been tarnished. At Brownstown, and at Queenstown, the valor of veterans was displayed, and acts of the noblest heroism were performed. It is true, that the disgrace of Detroit remains to be wiped off. That is a subject on which I cannot trust my feelings, it is not fitting I should speak. But this much I will say, it was an event which no human foresight could have anticipated, and for which the Administration cannot be justly censured. It was the parent of all the misfortunes we have experienced on land. But for it the Indian war would have been in a great measure prevented or terminated, the ascendancy on Lake Erie acquired, and the war pushed perhaps to Montreal. With the exception of that event, the war, even upon the land, had been attended by a series of the most brilliant exploits, which, whatever interest they may inspire on this side of the mountains, have given the greatest pleasure on the other. The expedition under the command of Governor Edwards and Colonel Russell, to Lake Peoria, on the Illinois, was completely successful. So was that of Captain Craig, who, it is said, ascended that river still higher. General Hopkins destroyed the Prophet's town. We have just received intelligence of the gallant enterprise of Colonel Campbell. In short, sir, the Indian towns have been swept from the mouth to the source of the Wabash, and a hostile country has been penetrated far beyond the most daring incursions of any campaign during the former Indian war. Never was more cool, deliberate bravery displayed than that by Newman's party from Georgia. And the capture of the Detroit, and the destruction of the Caledonia, (whether placed to our maritime or land account,) for judgment, skill, and courage, on the part of Lieutenant Elliott, has never been surpassed.

It is alleged that the elections in England are in favor of the Ministry, and that those in this country are against the war. If in such a cause (saying nothing of the impurity of their elections) the people of that country have rallied around their Government, it affords a salutary lesson to the people here, who, at all hazards, ought to support theirs, struggling, as it is, to maintain our just rights. But the people here have not been false to themselves; a great majority approve the war, as is evinced by the recent re-election of the Chief Magistrate. Suppose it were even true that an entire section of the Union were opposed to the war, that section being a minority, is the will of the majority to be relinquished? In that section the real strength of the opposition had been greatly exaggerated. Vermont has, by two successive expressions of her opinion, approved the declaration of war. In New Hampshire, parties are so nearly equipoised, that, out of thirty or thirty-five thousand votes, those who approved, and are for supporting it, lost the election by only one thousand or one thousand five hundred votes. In Massachusetts alone have they obtained any considerable accession. If we come to New York, we shall find that other and local causes have influenced her elections.

What cause, Mr. Chairman, which existed for declaring the war has been removed? We sought indemnity for the past and security for the future. The Orders in Council are suspended, not revoked; no compensation for spoiliations; Indian hostilities, which were before secretly instigated, now openly encouraged; and the practice of impressment unremittently persevered in and insisted upon. Yet Administration has given the strongest demonstrations of its love of peace. On the 29th June, less than ten days after the declaration of war, the Secretary of State writes to Mr. Russell, authorizing him to agree to an armistice, upon two conditions only; and what are they? That the Orders in Council should be repealed, and the practice of impressing American seamen cease, those already impressed being released. The proposition was for nothing more than a real truce; that the war should in fact cease on both sides. Again, on the 27th July, one month later, anticipating a possible objection to these terms, reasonable as they are, Mr. Monroe empowers Mr. Russell to stipulate in general terms for an armistice, having only an informal understanding on these points. In return, the enemy is offered a prohibition of the employment of his seamen in our service, thus removing entirely all pretext for the practice of impressment. The very proposition which the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITKIN) contends ought to be made, has been made. How are these pacific advances met by the other party? Rejected as absolutely inadmissible; cavils are indulged about the inadequacy of Mr. Russell's powers, and the want of an act of Congress is intimated. And yet the constant usage of nations I believe is, where the legislation of one party is necessary to carry into effect a given stipulation, to leave it to the contracting party to provide the requisite laws. If he fails to do so, it is a breach of good faith, and a subject of subsequent remonstrance by the injured party. When Mr. Russell renews the overture, in what was intended as a more agreeable form to the British Government, Lord Castlereagh is not content with a simple rejection, but clothes it in the language of insult. Afterwards, in conversation with Mr. Russell, the moderation of our Government is misinterpreted and made the occasion of a sneer, that we are tired of the war. The proposition of Admiral Warren is submitted in a spirit not more pacific. He is instructed, he tells us, to propose that the Government of the United States shall instantly recall their letters of marque and reprisal against British ships, together with all orders and instructions for any acts of hostility whatever against the territories of His Majesty or the persons or property of his subjects. That small affair being settled, he is further authorized to arrange as to the revocation of the laws which interdict the commerce and ships of war of His Majesty from the harbors and waters of the United States. This messenger of peace comes with one qualified concession in his pocket, not made to the justice of our demands, and is fully empowered to receive our homage, the contrite retraction of all our measures adopted against his master! And in default, he does not fail to assure us, the Orders in Council are to be forthwith revived. Administration, still anxious to terminate the war, suppresses the indignation which such a proposal ought to have created, and in its answer concludes by informing Admiral Warren, "that if there be no objection to an accommodation of the difference relating to impressment, in the mode proposed, other than the suspension of the British claim to impressment during the armistice, there can be none to proceeding, without the armistice, to an immediate discussion and arrangement of an article on that subject." Thus it has left the door of negotiation unclosed, and it remains to be seen if the enemy will accept the invitation tendered to him. The honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PEARSON) supposes, that if Congress would pass a law, prohibiting the employment of British seamen in our service, upon condition of a like prohibition on their part, and repeal the act of non-importation, peace would immediately follow. Sir, I have no doubt if such a law were passed, with all the requisite solemnities, and the repeal to take place, Lord Castlereagh would laugh at our simplicity. No, sir, Administration has erred in the steps which it has taken to restore peace, but its error has been not in doing too little but in betraying too great a solicitude for that event. An honorable peace is attainable only by an efficient war. My plan would be to call out the ample resources of the country, give them a judicious direction, prosecute the war with the utmost vigor, strike wherever we can reach the enemy, at sea or on land, and negotiate the terms of a peace at Quebec or Halifax. We are told that England is a proud and lofty nation that disdain to wait for danger, meets it half-way. Haughty as she is, we once triumphed over her, and if we do not listen to the counsels of timidity and despair we shall again prevail. In such a cause, with the aid of Providence, we must come out crowned with success; but if we fail, let us fail like men—lash ourselves to our gallant tars, and expire together in one common struggle, fighting for "seamen's rights and free trade."

Mr. McKEE moved an amendment to the bill, going to place the appointment of the other field officers of each regiment, as well as the Colonels, in the President and Senate.—The motion was agreed to.

SATURDAY, January 9.

Mr. McKIM presented the memorial of sundry owners of merchant mills and others, remonstrating against the retrospective operation given to the law extending Oliver Evans's patent for improvements in manufacturing flour and meal, and praying relief. The petition was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making certain partial appropriations for the year 1813, (additional appropriation for the expenses of Congress;) a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for 1813; a bill to increase the salaries of the Secretaries of the War and Navy Department (to a level with that of the two other Secretaries;) which several bills were twice read and committed.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House, in Committee of Whole, resumed the consideration of the new army bill.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) concluded the speech he yesterday commenced, as given entire in yesterday's debate.

Mr. QUINCY rose and said: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to reply to the honorable the SPEAKER, who it seems has descended from the Chair, in order to do that which no other member of this House was either willing to undertake, or was deemed competent to perform. I should blush for myself and for the good and wise, the only portion of this community, of whose applause I am ambitious, could I deem a reply necessary. As a public man, I never expect, I never wish any other, or farther influence, than what results from distinct principles, and those principles emanating from known, or proved facts. He who refutes those principles, or disproves those facts, has my honor. He who misrepresents, or mistakes either one or the other, has my pity, or my contempt, according to the proportion of imbecility of head or corruption of heart which enters into the cause of such mistake, or misrepresentation. I cannot put myself upon the level of retort. That, in my observations, I did not pass the fair limits of parliamentary discussion is obvious from this, that the honorable the SPEAKER himself, then presiding in this House, neither stopped me himself nor permitted others to do it, when it was attempted.

So far as respects any personal reflections, which have fallen from the honorable SPEAKER, or may fall from other members, touching me, individually, he and they have their liberty. Such as my reputation is, before Billingsgate opens its flood-gates, such it will remain, after the odious flood shall have passed by. For, Mr. Chairman, this is my consolation and support—

"Virtue may be assailed, but never hurt;
Surprised by unjust foes, but not enthralled;
Yea, even that, which mischief meant most harm,
Shall, in the happy trial, prove most glory.
But evil, on itself, shall back recoil,
And mix no more with goodness!—

* * * * *
If this fail,
The pillared firmament is rottenness,
And earth's base built on stubble."

Mr. SHEFFEY said it was his wish to speak to the subject before the Committee rose, and in order to afford the SPEAKER (to whose speech he meant to direct his observations) an opportunity of defending himself, which he could not do if he were in the Chair, he therefore moved that the Committee do rise, report progress, and have leave to sit again. He said, that as he was prevented from the necessary exertion by a violent head-ache and a general indisposition, he hoped the House would not object to indulging him.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that it gave him regret, that his duty on this point should be at variance with his inclination, which dictated to him to allow the indulgence the gentleman wished, in consideration of his indisposition; but the bill had been already so long, and so unnecessarily delayed, and had undergone such ample discussion, that he could not agree to the motion.

The question was put and negatived—60 to 41.

Mr. WILLIAMS said: I hope, Mr Chairman, that I shall not be misunderstood. I do not oppose the motion from a desire to restrain debate, but from a sense of duty, which dictates to me that a bill which has been under discussion for a fortnight, and ought to have been passed a week ago, should be vigorously prosecuted without any further loss of time. Mr. W. then adverted to the character of the debate, and hoped that for the honor of Congress, and of gentlemen themselves, future debates would assume a different complexion.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he would put it to the candor of his honorable friend from South Carolina and of the Committee, whether, after the House had adjourned over three successive days for the accommodation of gentlemen of one political description, whether, on the eve of Saturday, a day too so intemperately cold, that we from the South can hardly keep out of the fire, and with minds scarcely less torpid than our bodies, gentlemen can be expected to do justice to the subject and to themselves? He presumed the Committee would think it but reasonable to comply with the request of his colleague. He owned that he was never more surprised than at the opposition from his honorable friend over the way; it was so unlike his usual liberality to his opponents. He therefore moved that the Committee do rise, and report progress, with leave to sit again.

This called up Mr. WILLIAMS, who said, he opposed the motion from a sense of duty, and if he understood parliamentary practice, he had not acted illiberally. That, for the purpose of affording gentlemen an opportunity of giving a wide range to the debate, the House had gone into Committee of the Whole; but if at two o'clock, when the Committee was willing to hear what gentlemen had to say, it was proposed to adjourn, in order to continue the debate on Monday, he, for one, could not consent to it.

If the gentleman from Virginia was the only one to speak, he would with pleasure consent. But as others might also be disposed to speak, which might lengthen the debate unnecessarily, he could not; and if gentlemen neglected the opportunity afforded, when the Committee were ready to hear them, they should not speak in the House if his vote could prevent it.

Mr. RANDOLPH agreed that the debate was indeed unnecessarily protracted, that it embraced a scope much wider than the limits of the question, and that it had assumed a character of which he must be excused from speaking. He said, if the House had shown a disposition to discussion, not only in range, but in time, the observations of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina might apply. If on Monday, the gentleman had said, take till Saturday to discuss this bill in the Committee, he, for one, would have thought it was enough; but considering how the debate had proceeded, he could not help saying, that it was somewhat hard to refuse the accommodation. Mr. R. observed, that as he had not used the term "illiberal," he therefore could not understand in what way the honorable gentleman could talk of repelling a charge of the kind, as if it had come from him. He would once more put it to the common sense of the House, whether, when it was considered that at nearly the same hour yesterday, a gentleman on the other side, had requested (he would not say that he was not entitled to it) and received a similar indulgence, it was correct to refuse it, in the present instance? or, whether it was fair or proper at such short notice to say, "speak now, or ever after hold your tongue?" Mr. R. said, he did not know how long his honorable friend (if he would permit him to call him so) had been invested with the clerical character, thus to publish the banns, and tell gentlemen "if they knew any just cause why this bill should not pass, to speak now, or ever after hold their tongues." He appealed to the House, whether, as it regarded his colleague and other gentlemen, it was not hard, (he would not say illiberal,) rigorous, and unfair? Mr. R. said he had long wished to see the manner of doing business in the House altered, and he hoped an alteration would take place, but it could not be done retrospectively, nor simultaneously with the evil. Their mode of proceeding was a great abuse and waste of the public time, and the public interest. He fain would see it otherwise; he fain would see that when any business was appointed, it would be done, and that the order of the day should not be a mere entry in the records; that a fixed time should be set for each particular business, something like the docket of a court; and at the end of the appointed time, the minority should acquiesce in taking the question. If business was arranged in some such way as this, half the time occupied by this bill would have been enough. He said, that in the manner as well as the matter of opposition to the request of his colleague, there was something which gave him equal surprise and concern. The gentleman who claimed the indulgence is, perhaps, of the smallest party in the House; but he has rights; and I would remark, said Mr. R., that when he speaks, it is not an idle waste of words. But, if the question was to be forced upon the House, he hoped there would be at least bank notice, with three days of grace—even a shorter time might suffice. He hoped still the indulgence would be conceded.

Mr. WILLIAMS, after again declaring his opposition grew out of what he believed to be a principle of duty, observed that he acknowledged himself overcome by the arguments of his honorable friend, and yielded the point. He should vote for the Committee to rise.

The question was then taken and carried.

The SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, Mr. LITTLE moved that the Committee do not have leave to sit again.—Negatived.

MONDAY, January 11.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of moneys disbursed from the Treasury for expenses of intercourse with the Barbary Powers, during the year 1812, with copies of Consular accounts for the years 1810 and 1811.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for raising an additional military force of twenty thousand men for one year.

Mr. SHEFFEY said, he felt grateful for the opportunity which had been afforded him, to deliver his sentiments on the subject before the Committee. It was now about a year ago, when he had stated his reasons at length on the question of the war then meditated against Great Britain. Since that time, he had been generally a silent, though not an inattentive spectator. Conscious that there had fallen to his share a full portion of the frailty common to man, he felt disposed to distrust his own opinion. He had even hoped he might be mistaken, he had hoped that experience would prove the fallacy of his apprehensions; that the predictions of gentlemen, who differed from him in sentiment, would be realized; that the rights of the country would be secured by arms, to which the majority had resorted; and that the evils anticipated would vanish before us. On a review, however, of the reasons which had then influenced him, aided by the experience of the last year, he found his opinions, not only unshaken, but strongly confirmed.

The bill before us, said Mr. S., contemplates an addition of twenty thousand men to the army heretofore authorized to be raised. By the measures preparatory to the war, upwards of thirty-six thousand men were directed to be enlisted; with the addition now contemplated, our regular army will amount to more than fifty-six thousand men. The question which at once presents itself to every mind disposed to inquire, is, what is the object of this vast military force? We are here not left to conjecture; this inquiry has been anticipated, and we have been directly told by the chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) that it is intended for offensive purposes; that the conquest of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, is to be achieved. If I have any right to deliberate on this subject, and to express the opinion which my view of the real interests of the country dictates, I at once say, that I cannot give my assent to raise such a force for such a purpose. Was an augmentation of the army required to defend us against any enemy, either on the maritime or inland frontier, no member of this House would more readily accord the means of defence and protection than myself. In such event, I shall not inquire how we got into the situation, or by whose temerity the enemy has been brought on our borders. I shall consider defence as a matter of imperious necessity, forbidding all calculations as to means and consequences. But, as it is admitted by all, that the force already authorized is more than sufficient for every defensive purpose; as it is expressly avowed that it is required for offensive operations in the territories of the enemy, the question assumes a different shape; it is stripped of the overruling influence which attends necessity; it becomes a mere question of expediency, controlled by the various considerations which reason and policy may dictate. So far as my conduct is concerned, before I can consent to the prosecution of the war, in the manner contemplated, I must be convinced that the objects in controversy are not only just, but of sufficient importance in their practical effect on the community to justify such an experiment, and not attainable in any other way; that there is a reasonable probability that such a war will secure to us those objects; and that we are not endangering the greater good, to obtain an exemption from the lesser evil; hazarding certain great rights, to secure others of far inferior importance.

Before I enter into the discussion connected with the merits of the question, permit me to notice a remark, of late, often repeated in this House by gentlemen of the majority. I allude to the high claim which is set up over the minds of the community. It is said that, war having been declared, all considerations as to its policy or justice are out of the question; and it is required of us, as an imperious duty, to unite in the measures which may be proposed by them for its prosecution, and we are promised a speedy, honorable, and successful issue. Do gentlemen require of us to act against our convictions? Do they ask that we should follow, with a reluctant step, in the career which we believe will end in ruin? Or do they suppose that, while on the simplest subject, an honest diversity of sentiment exists, on this complicated and all-important one, our minds are cast into the same mould? Uniformity of action is only desirable where there is uniformity of sentiment; and that, on most subjects, will only exist where the mind is enchained by the fear which despotic power inspires.

But it has been said, that the obedience to the will of the majority is the first principle of representative government, and enjoins what gentlemen require. Yes, sir, obedience to all constitutional acts, is a high and commanding duty on the part of the minority and the people; and all factious opposition is highly criminal. But this does not prevent any one in this House, or in the nation, to use every proper effort to arrest the progress of evil; or, to effect a repeal of measures injurious to the public interest. And how can this be done, unless there is full liberty to think, and to speak, and act, as our convictions shall dictate? If this be denied, then there is an end to free government. A majority never can be corrected. They are irresponsible and despotic; they may prepare the yoke when they please, we must submit to it in silence.

I regret that I cannot, consistently with my sense of duty, yield the unlimited confidence in their measures, which the majority demand. My reason must be convinced, before my confidence can be bestowed. There are, indeed, cases where superior virtue and wisdom, tested by long and successful experience, has a strong claim to our confidence. But this, in my opinion, is not the case here. A retrospect of the transactions of the last eight years, will show how much gentlemen have been mistaken and disappointed in their views of our foreign policy; particularly that part which is connected with the difficulties in which we now find ourselves, and which may be said to be the ground-work of them. In making this declaration, and in leading your attention to the facts, it is not my object to give offence to any one. I believe gentlemen are actuated by the purest motives, and sincerely disposed to render essential service to the country. I speak of facts only, intending to show a mistaken, not a corrupt or vicious course.

Our difficulties with Great Britain commenced soon after the treaty of 1794 (generally called "Jay's Treaty") expired by its own limitation, in consequence of the peace of Amiens. About that time the British Government offered to our Minister, then resident in London, a renewal of the treaty. That instrument had been negotiated under the auspices, and received the sanction of WASHINGTON, the father and benefactor of his country. It is true, that its stipulations did not embrace every subject which we could have wished, and those that were embraced, were not so advantageously settled as might have been done, had we had it in our power to have dictated the terms. But it is equally true, that experience refuted all the speculations, and dissipated all the apprehensions, with which the country was filled at the time of its ratification. During its operation we enjoyed a degree of prosperity unexampled in this or any other country. Our leading interests flourished in a manner unknown before, and unexperienced since; our agriculture was encouraged by high prices and ready markets for its products; the freedom of navigation, and the enterprise of our people, carried our commerce to every part of the globe. I ask this House and this nation, whether their hopes or wishes extend beyond what we then enjoyed? If they do, they hope for that which is opposed by all human probability, and they wish for that which has scarcely ever fallen to the lot of man. We were, indeed, not exempt from every evil, or gratified by every possible good. What nation or individual ever reached that state? But the great essentials of national prosperity were in our possession. Our Government, however, was not satisfied. The overture of the British Government was rejected, under the impression, no doubt, that better terms could be obtained; that the situation of Great Britain would compel her to yield to our demands, however extensive.

Soon after the rejection of this overture, Great Britain assumed the right to interdict the trade in the products of her enemies' colonies, when taken directly from those colonies to the mother country, conformably, as she asserted, to the principles adopted in the war of 1756. In consequence of which, our Government, with a view to coerce her into a relinquishment of her pretensions, passed the partial non-importation act of 1806. It had not the intended and promised effect. They again resorted to negotiation, and repealed the restriction. About this time, a change happened in the British cabinet, highly auspicious to our interests. "Our friends," yes, our old friends, who had espoused our cause in time of peril and danger, who had defended our rights during all the vicissitudes of the Revolution, and who had manifested their friendship for us on every occasion since, got into power. With these men, a negotiation was opened by our Government through the instrumentality of our Ministers, Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, which resulted in a treaty, as our own Ministers declared, "both honorable and advantageous to the United States," and the best that could be obtained. It was not only "advantageous" as it respected our commerce, but the informal understanding which accompanied it, would have secured us against the abuses of impressments; so our own Ministers believed. But it was rejected without being even submitted to the Senate. The reasons have never been disclosed to the nation. I presume, however, that it was confidently expected that such was the situation of Great Britain, that any terms that we should dictate would be granted.

The terms which our Government demanded not being accorded on the part of Great Britain, a new policy was resorted to by our Government, which was held up to the nation as a sovereign remedy for all our difficulties, which were daily increasing. An embargo, not limited in its duration, was laid on our shipping. The prominent virtues of this remedy were supposed to be—that it would coerce the belligerents, but particularly Great Britain, into an abandonment of their injurious measures; and, above all, that it would save us from being involved in war. The experience of one year, however, manifested how little its supporters understood of the means and resources of other nations, and of the character of our own. The privations to which a great portion of our people were subjected in consequence of this measure, coerced our Government into a repeal, long before any sensible impression could be made on Great Britain. The embargo was abandoned, because the people would bear it no longer, and the non-intercourse system was adopted in its stead. This also had its day—but this, like the embargo, experience condemned as injurious and ruinous policy; and the public voice called for its repeal. It was succeeded by the act of the first of May, 1810, the source of our present difficulties.

When this act passed this House, we were told that its provisions held out the strongest inducement to each of the great belligerents, to precede its rival in the abrogation of the injurious edicts affecting the commerce of this country, and that whoever might lead the other would unquestionably follow. It required very little sagacity to penetrate this subject. It was easily foreseen that this measure would be employed to detach us from our neutral situation, which it was so much our interest, and had been so much our desire, to maintain. This apprehension, experience has realized. We now feel the consequences in their fullest extent.

After we had become the dupes of French perfidy, by putting in force the non-importation system against Great Britain, under the belief, that on the first day of November, 1810, the decrees of Berlin and Milan were repealed, the falsehood of which has since been placed beyond all rational doubt, it happened as had been anticipated, that finding the inefficiency of the restrictive system against Great Britain, the nation was called on, about the commencement of last session, to assume a threatening attitude towards that Power. We were then told by the supporters of our foreign policy, that war would not be necessary. That justice was withheld from us by the Government of that nation under the impression that force would not be used to maintain our rights, which impression it was only necessary to remove by manifesting a determined spirit in making warlike preparations. This prevailed with many, and the army was voted. But it did not intimidate our enemy. We were then told, that it was necessary to declare war, as affording conclusive evidence of our sincerity; but that it would not be necessary to continue it beyond a few weeks, when our objects would be attained by a just and honorable peace. We were also told, at the same time, that in six weeks after the declaration of war, we should be in possession of a great portion of the enemy's colonies. All these promises have been disappointed. We have effected nothing by commercial restrictions, nothing by arms, and nothing by negotiation; and, if there is not a change in our policy, the war promises to be perpetual.

Sir, I have led your attention to this retrospect, because it affords an apology for my declining to place implicit confidence either in the means or in the promises of gentlemen who call upon us for our confidence. This experience of eight years satisfies my mind, that they are totally mistaken in their views, touching our foreign relations. It has been the opposite of that which I conceive to be the true policy. In the present state of the world, the preservation of our neutrality ought to have been the first object, but by the measures pursued, it has been made subordinate, not to practical interest which ought to have been secondary, but even to notions of abstract right, and while their avowed object was to save us from war, were calculated, step by step, to draw us into it.

Having detained you thus long, with these preliminary topics, permit me to draw your attention to those that grow directly out of the bill before the Committee. I have said, that the causes ought not only to be just, but important in their effect on the community, to justify a resort to arms. I will say more. A nation situated as this is, who has so much to lose, and so little to gain, ought not to relinquish its peaceful state but in the last extremity. Are the causes which existed at the time when this war was declared, of that character which, according to this idea, justified its commencement; and are those now remaining sufficient to sanction its continuance?

I exclude all consideration of the abstract justice of our complaints against Great Britain. Upon that subject I never had but one opinion. I always did believe that her conduct towards this country was not only unjust as it affected us, but impolitic as it affected herself.

Before the war commenced last Summer, the Orders in Council formed the principal ground of complaint against Great Britain. I venture to assert, without the dread of contradiction, that if the repeal which has since taken place had happened and been known here before we resorted to the sword, we should have remained at peace. I make this declaration on (what I deem) the most unquestionable authority. The proof is on record. In 1808, Mr. Jefferson, then President of the United States, through our Minister in London, proposed to the British Government to relinquish the embargo as to her, on condition the Orders in Council were revoked. In 1809, Mr. Madison entered into the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, which made the same condition the sole foundation for restoring amicable intercourse between the two nations. In 1810 and 1811, the discussions between our Government and that of Great Britain were confined almost exclusively to that subject. And in 1812, preceding the declaration of war, the Secretary of State informed the British Envoy, that if the Orders in Council were revoked the non-importation act would cease immediately. During the whole of this period, our complaints were directed to the Orders in Council, and our measures, (I speak of our restrictive system,) so far as they affected Great Britain, were adopted with a single eye to their repeal. Until the war was declared, I did not suppose that it would be waged for any other object.

The Orders in Council, though a violation of our maritime rights in point of principle, were practically of very little injury to our commerce at the commencement of the war in which we are now engaged. The reasons are obvious. Our commerce to France, Holland, Italy, &c., never was of great importance. And the effect of the French "municipal regulations" had caused it to dwindle into insignificance. The exclusions, restrictions, impositions, and confiscations, so permanent in the commercial code (and practice) of Napoleon, had inspired our merchants with a due portion of caution, how they ventured their property into the power of a Government actuated by no liberal principle, and bound by no faith. From this state of things, it was not difficult to conjecture that the period was not distant when Great Britain must become convinced of the inefficiency of the Orders in Council, so far as respected their retaliatory object on her enemy. How could France be distressed by the British interdiction of her foreign commerce, when France herself was hostile to that commerce—when she adopted every measure to narrow, to shackle, and ultimately to exclude it? We had even strong evidence that British statesmen began to waver on the subject. The vote in the House of Commons, during the last Winter, showed a minority unusually strong, and indicated most clearly that before long the Orders in Council were doomed to perish. But, with this information before our eyes, we hurried on to war without waiting for the event or even without waiting for preparation.

The Orders in Council have since been repealed. The manner has indeed been objected to by the honorable Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) because the right to secure them in certain events is reserved. But surely this cannot be and has not been considered by our Government a serious objection; for without such reservation the power to revive them existed to every possible extent. The only question is, do they cease to violate our neutral commerce? This is not doubted. The remaining obstacle, therefore, to a good understanding between the two nations, and the sole ostensible cause for persevering in the war, is the subject of impressments.

This is, indeed, a difficult and unquestionably an interesting subject. Not that I place entire confidence in the sympathetic descriptions of the magnitude of the evil, which we have so often heard and daily heard in this House. I am inclined to believe fancy has colored the picture too highly. There is one reason, above all others, which leads me to that conclusion. It is this: In that section of the United States of which two-thirds of our seamen are natives, there is a strong overwhelming current of opinion against this war. Can it be possible that the country where dwells the kindred of those who are said to be incarcerated in great numbers in the "floating dungeons" of Great Britain is not only indifferent about the fate of its children, but opposes, as ruinous, the war waged for their protection? It is certainly a curious spectacle to see the defenders of seamen's rights come from those portions of the Union that have little commerce, and few if any seamen. I do not mean to insinuate that those gentlemen do wrong in espousing the cause of the oppressed, to whatever quarter they may belong; but I state the fact to show that their sympathies may possibly have magnified the evil—and to infer from it, that the opposition of those most immediately interested is to be ascribed, not to their insensibility, but to their apprehensions that this war, instead of securing seamen's rights, will banish their seamen into foreign service.

The controversy between this country and Great Britain seems to have been brought to a single point. She claims the service of her seafaring subjects in time of danger. Our Government admits this right. To give effect to the right thus claimed and admitted, she insists that her officers may go on board our merchant ships on the high seas, or in her ports—search for and take her subjects. This our Government deny, and claim the immunity of the flag so far as persons are concerned; because, under the pretext of taking British subjects, American citizens are frequently taken. It does, indeed, not distinctly appear in the late communication from our Executive to the British Government, that they mean by the terms American citizens, whether it includes naturalized persons as well as natives. With respect to those of the first description, I confess I feel no great interest for their immunity abroad or on the high seas; I am one of those who think that we act sufficiently liberal when we offer them an asylum from the oppression or poverty of their own country, receive them into our bosom, and extend to them all the advantages belonging to us; and so long as they remain within our territorial limits, they shall, with my consent, have the full benefit of the protection which our laws afford to all. But I cannot consent that the native blood of this country shall be profusely wasted to protect aliens born, wherever they may ramble. We all profess a deep solicitude for the interest of seamen. To describe their distresses and to eulogize their valor and patriotism, is one of the topics of the day. And yet we are contending for principles which, if successful, will bring a host of foreigners in competition with them to elbow them out of employment. But it is said that Great Britain does the same—that by the act passed during the reign of George II., foreign seamen are naturalized who have been in the King's service for two years, and that she has no right to object if we imitate her conduct. It is true, she has adopted such a regulation. But I have never heard of any instance where she has contended that such a person is absolved from his natural allegiance, if he comes within the power of his original sovereign. I have understood that act to mean that such persons should become entitled to certain rights—not absolved from any duties towards others, should they leave the country. That they should have the right to hold lands—be admitted under the regulations of the navigation act as British seamen on board merchant ships, and participate in the pension and hospital provisions. Should I be mistaken, however, I am not inclined to relinquish my opinion, merely because the practice of Great Britain is opposed to it.

Sir, I do not find fault with the Administration for insisting on the immunity of our flag, as it respects the seamen. I approve of the principle. It is of that character which at a proper time and with proper means is (in effect and to all general purposes) attainable, if we do not by ill-timed and imprudent efforts frustrate it. It is supposed that the present is the auspicious moment to insist on our rights. That pressed as Great Britain is by the most powerful enemy the world ever saw, who threatens her very existence; the impression which we can make upon her by our arms, will be greater than at any other time. This very circumstance renders the attainment of our object more difficult, and makes our case hopeless. Her danger forbids a compliance with our demands. In her present struggle, her naval power constitutes her security. Without that she would long since have become a French province. This every man in England knows and feels. It is well known that four-fifths of her seamen on board her navy render not voluntary but compulsory service. Should this principle be established, which in all cases would afford a secure asylum in our merchant ships, it is dreaded by British statesmen and the British people, that their seamen, allured by higher wages and easier employment, would abandon their service, and thus render their country accessible to their enemy. Hence you see every Ministry, of whatever political party or distinction, tremblingly alive to this subject. They dare not touch it in the present state of that country. No man could maintain his power a moment after having hazarded the public safety by making an experiment, the effect of which could not be foreseen, and may be productive of such disastrous consequences. This spirit is manifest in all the communications from the British Cabinet to our Government. We have seen the sentiments of Lord Grenville, Lord Auckland, Lord Holland, and Mr. Fox, men whose prepossessions were in our favor, and who on almost every other subject supported our pretensions. On this subject they resisted our demands, because they dared not grant them. While I conceive the claims of our Government as not going too far, I doubt their prudence as to the time and manner of giving them effect. I fear that instead of realizing our wishes the measures pursued are calculated to deprive us of every hope hereafter. In the present unexampled state of the world, according to my limited conception of our true interest, we ought to have seriously avoided all hostile collision with foreign Powers. We ought to have cherished the resources within our grasp. Nothing is more obvious than the remark made by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. BLEECKER,) that, with all the injuries which we received from the belligerents, our commerce was more extensive and more profitable in the aggregate than if Europe had been at peace. We might have obtained (and we ought not to have rejected) such temporary arrangements with England (with whom our commerce was chiefly carried on,) which, though they did not embrace all our interests, would have secured those of first importance and kept us at peace. The benefits of such a policy are to my mind self-evident. Should Europe be restored to tranquillity and assume something like its former appearance, (and I do not believe the present state of things durable,) we should have been able to have effected every valuable object, because such a change will probably bring with it a respect for the rights of nations, which have now no existence but in name. And should an imposing attitude have been wanting to give effect to our claims, we should have exhibited an unbroken spirit and unexhausted resources.

An honorable member from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) the other day, read some extracts from the instructions transmitted to our Minister in London, in 1792. His object was to show the deep interest which the great man who then presided over this nation felt on the subject of impressments. I sincerely wish that while gentlemen resort to his opinions to support theirs, they would consent to imitate his conduct. Nothing can be more strikingly different than his policy and that which is now pursued.

In 1793 the subject of impressments did not form the only complaint against Great Britain. The Treaty of Peace remained unexecuted on her part. To that was added the great injury which our commerce sustained by the extensive captures made by her cruisers during that year. The interest which was felt for the success of the French Revolution, against which Great Britain had arrayed herself, tended to excite the nation, even beyond the measure of its wrongs, and ripen it for war. But the wisdom of WASHINGTON saved us from being drawn into the vortex, which has since devoured all who approached it. His genius considered the true interests of his country to consist in the preservation of its peace; and he had firmness enough to preserve it, though opposed by the strong feelings of the people. Notwithstanding the accumulated wrongs which we had received, he sent a messenger of peace, and ultimately gave his assent to a treaty in which there was not one stipulation even to restrain the abuses of impressments, which the year before he had declared could not be longer tolerated. Why was this done by him, who, to say the least, had as much affection for his country's rights, as the politicians of the present day—whom fear never influenced—and who could safely calculate on the support of the people, should he resort to arms? The answer is obvious. Peace upon almost any terms was better than a hopeless, endless contest. What a contrast does his example present to the conduct of those who now direct the destinies of this nation, and who, while they reject his policy, resort to his opinions to support their own?

Upon the subject of foreign war, and the objects connected with it, the opinions of gentlemen of the majority have certainly undergone a strange revolution since they came into power. Little more than twelve years ago, they deprecated foreign war as inconsistent with the spirit of our institutions, and the genius of our Government. Nothing short of self-defence, when attacked in our own country, was considered as a justification for abandoning our peaceful pursuits, and mingling in hostility with European Powers. Every other object was deemed subordinate to the preservation of peace, because with it was connected every benefit which it had pleased Providence to bestow upon us, and which our detached situation rendered secure. We now hear those very gentlemen talk of Rome and Greece in their proudest days, when they inspired terror into the inhabitants of distant climes and carried their arms to every quarter of the globe; and their example is held up for our imitation. The almost boundless extent of our territory is become too limited, and we hear of conquests in the North and South, as essential to our security and happiness. In taking a retrospect, and contrasting former opinions with present conduct, a person would almost be inclined to distrust his observation, was there not left on record monuments with sentiments of former times entertained by gentlemen in the days of humility, when they were struggling against power. Permit me to call your attention to a resolution of the Virginia Assembly, adopted in 1798, said to be draughted by Mr. Madison, now President of the United States, upon this subject. It was then considered the standard of Republican opinion, by all who professed to be of that party. It in substance declares, that though the General Assembly view with indignation, the violations of our commerce, the impressment of our seamen, and other wrongs committed by foreign nations, yet detached as the United States are from European concerns, they should deprecate a war waged for any other object except self-defence, in cases of actual invasion. This resolution had an eye to our relations with France, from whom we had then received every injury and indignity she could inflict, and with whom we were in a state of partial hostility; but it explicitly declares, that we ought to engage in offensive war, for no object whatever. Let this sentiment be compared with the conduct of the same men now they are in power.

The project to conquer the British provinces on our Northern frontier, the object contemplated by the bill before us, presents these subjects for our inquiry:

1. Is it attainable within any reasonable time?
2. Will it, if effected, secure to us our maritime rights violated by Great Britain?
3. If not, is it an indemnity for being deprived of our rights on the ocean, and the loss of our people and our money in acquiring it? I beg leave here to observe, that I do not distinctly understand the real object of the Administration in relation to this subject. In this House we have sometimes been told, that Canada is to be restored to the British Government at the close of the war, as an inducement to her to relinquish her maritime pretensions injurious to our commerce and navigation—at other times that it is to be retained at all events to prevent collision in future, and to secure us from the effect of British influence with the savage tribes. From the conduct of our military commanders, who have approached the Canadian lines, I should infer, that the eventual restoration of the country (should it be taken) is not contemplated. If I am incorrect, nothing can be more unjust and cruel towards the innocent inhabitants, than to invite them to bear arms against their Government, as has been done, and ultimately surrender them to its vengeance. These invitations, I presume, have the sanction of the Administration, because we have not heard, in any instance, that they have either disavowed the act, or censured the officers concerned for their conduct. If I am correct in my conclusion, then, this is not a war for the rights of commerce and seamen, but, in fact, a war for the conquest of Canada.

Sir, I am one of those who doubt our capacity to obtain the conquest of the British provinces. I believe that the opinion, that we are a very powerful nation abroad, is a fanciful delusion. To be powerful abroad, requires a Government of sufficient energy, not only to bring into action all the physical and pecuniary resources of the country, but to command them promptly. The very nature of our Government, where everything depends immediately upon the people, forbids the idea that you can effect one or the other. The inconveniences and privations to which they must be subjected, are sufficient causes with the great body of the community, who do not perceive very distinctly how they are to be benefited by an offensive war, to turn their faces against it. Their Representatives, knowing their feelings, dare not press them with a heavy hand, which at once destroys everything like energy. Besides, the want of promptitude, the characteristic defect of such a Government, whose powers are divided into many hands, prevents the resources even within their reach to be obtained and applied in time to insure success. The consequence of all this is—imbecility in obtaining, and want of celerity in applying the necessary means. This may be considered as a very great evil, particularly to those who have presented to us the example of Rome in her proudest days, when she was mistress of the world, for our imitation. Sir, I rejoice that such is the state of my country. It is the legitimate offspring of our free institutions. The people are strong and the Government is weak; whenever this state of things shall be reversed, then shall we be able to inspire terror into other nations. But until that period shall arrive, we shall exhibit weakness and slowness of action, as to all offensive and external purposes.

I conceive that every community when they consent to any form of Government, (if, indeed, their consent is asked,) decide on the alternative—whether they prefer to be strong in their liberty and happiness at home and feeble abroad; or whether they are willing to relinquish their domestic rights and blessings, for the empty shadow of military glory, in which they have no concern, but to furnish the means. As they decide, so shall be their destiny. They must select one or the other—they cannot have both. To suppose, as is the fashion of the day, that with the enjoyment of all the great blessings of a free Government, there can be united the energy of despotic power, is supposing a union of opposites which never did, nor ever will happen. Let me be understood as confining these remarks entirely to foreign offensive military operations. For the purposes of defence at home, some of the great causes of our weakness, for foreign purposes, constitute the means of strength and security. Our scattered population, over an immense territory, is a cause of weakness for external operations; but it presents to an invader obstacles which no power can overcome. Besides, every man feels, what in causes of offensive war he cannot see—the great interest he has in the contest, and the indispensable necessity of bringing into the service of his country the last cent of his money, and the last drop of his blood.

The happy state of our people, and the general prosperity which hitherto has prevailed in every department of the community, forbids any rational expectation being entertained, that a large regular army, the only kind of force essentially useful in offensive operations, can be obtained in any reasonable time. Upon this subject I offered my sentiments during the last session, when the army bill was before us. It was indignantly replied, that it was degrading the country to suppose that it did not afford the materials for such a purpose. That patriotism would prompt numbers to enter the ranks from the sole consideration to avenge their country's wrongs. How much have these speculations, like the other visions of the times, been disappointed? We are now told by the President, that "such is the happy condition of our country, arising from the facility of subsistence and the high wages for every species of occupation, that, notwithstanding the augmented inducements provided at the last session, a partial success only has attended the recruiting service." This paragraph speaks a volume. A happy people, and not yet content with their happiness, they must be led into the miseries of war! The true reason why the recruiting service has failed is here unfolded, but the remedy proposed is totally inappropriate. If the happiness of the people is the cause of the failure, then their misery can alone insure success. That is the true secret. Until you make a sufficient portion of the people miserable by depriving them of their ordinary, and to them more desirable means of subsistence, your army will be composed, principally, of undutiful sons, refractory apprentices, the idle, profligate, and thoughtless, collected in the purlieus of tippling-houses, and in the streets of your cities and towns, the number of which is at present happily circumscribed. There indeed may be some exceptions, but they necessarily are few. To talk of the patriotism of such men is prostituting the term. In our country the regular armies will be composed of worse materials than in any other. In the European communities the honest and industrious are often thrown out of employment by the pressure of the times, and compelled to seek subsistence in a military life, but here, where labor is so much wanted, no man is driven by necessity into the ranks of the army. These circumstances render it extremely difficult to obtain a proper force of any magnitude; and when it is moreover considered, how many inconveniences new raised levies must encounter in a strange climate and enemy's country, it is very questionable whether we shall, with all our boasted superiority, be able to render the conquest of the British provinces absolutely certain.

Should this reasoning, however, be incorrect, and should our military character abroad be greater than the character of our people and the nature of our Government warrant us to believe, what prospect is there that the conquest of British America will insure us our rights on the ocean—the ostensible objects of this war? Will it affect the interest of Great Britain so materially as to induce her to surrender what she deems her maritime rights of the first importance, to obtain a restoration of her colonies? To a commercial nation colonies are certainly important, inasmuch as they furnish a certain market for the production of the industry of the mother country, and supply it with their products, always securing to that nation a commerce which no other nation can control. But the colonial system has its limits, which it would be imprudent to disregard; and I doubt very much whether Great Britain has not already overleaped them. Her immense acquisitions during the present war in every quarter of the world, though they have increased her commercial means, have also multiplied the points of defence, and rendered her less secure at home. In any point of view in which the subject is presented to my mind, I cannot see any great injury she would sustain by the loss of her provinces bordering on our Northern frontier. Her commerce to and from them is inconsiderable. Their population is not able to protect itself, but the mother country expends more than a million sterling annually (money collected from the pockets of the people of England) for their protection. Their loss would relieve Great Britain from a considerable burden, while the actual injury is scarcely perceptible. I, therefore, do not believe that after we shall have acquired it at the expense of many millions of money, and many thousands of lives, we shall be able to obtain our rights on the ocean by restoring the conquered country to our enemy.

To retain the British provinces as an indemnity for our losses, is an event which I cannot wish, because I can see no possible benefit resulting from it. Have we not already territory enough? Is it desirable to incorporate with us a people composed of heterogeneous materials, who are not only unaccustomed to our institutions, but many of whom entertain an unconquerable hatred for them? I believe it would have been better had we never acquired any foreign territory at all. If we had been contented with the limits embraced by the old thirteen United States, the prospects of remaining an united people, and preserving our free institutions, would, in my conception, be much more flattering. I am, therefore, opposed to new acquisitions. But it is repeatedly urged that the possession of Canada is necessary to secure us from the hostilities of the savage tribes on our Northwestern borders; was this the fact, I might yield my assent to prosecute the war to attain that object. But experience has shown that we can have peace with them, though Canada is in the possession of a foreign Power. For seventeen years after the Treaty of Greenville we were entirely exempt from Indian hostilities, and not until we waged war ourselves, did they become troublesome upon our frontiers.

Permit me now, Mr. Chairman, to draw your attention to the pecuniary part of this subject, the expense that will be incurred, and the ways and means to meet it, should the whole force, authorized by the laws of last session, and contemplated by this bill, be brought into actual service. In estimating the expense, I shall discard the estimates which are usually laid before us, and resort to experience. For never was there a wider difference between speculation and fact, than there is between our estimates and expenditures. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury it appears that there was expended between the 30th of September, 1811, and 1st of October, 1812, on account of the army, militia, volunteers, fortifications, arms, and arsenals, the sum of seven millions seven hundred and seventy thousand dollars; there is no statement to show what sum was applied to each object thus enumerated, but I presume I may safely assert, that at least seven millions were paid on account of the army, militia, and volunteers. We have no statement to show what are the number of men enlisted in the regular service, and of the militia and volunteers employed. Indeed, so far as it respects enlistments, the information is avowedly withheld as a secret, which the people must not know, and which we cannot obtain in any official form. But that very circumstance proves incontestably that there is nothing to boast of; that there has been a great failure in the recruiting service; I must, therefore, make the estimate as to the number of troops from conjecture, more than from actual detail; leaving it to the gentlemen who are in the secret to contradict my statement, if the fact will warrant a more favorable result. Our Military Establishment, previous to the last session, amounted to less than five thousand men in actual service. The expense of maintaining this force I have estimated at five hundred dollars per man, because very few of them were, during the period the expense was incurred, in any other but the ordinary peace service, which never cost us more. The amount expended for their support therefore, would be two millions five hundred thousand dollars, leaving the sum of four millions five hundred thousand dollars to cover the expense of every other species of force. When it is recollected how late in the season the recruiting service commenced, I presume I may safely venture to assert (and I challenge contradiction) that previous to the first day of October last, there were not more than fifteen thousand men, embracing regulars, militia, and volunteers, upon the average for four months, in the public service, independent of the five thousand men before stated. It follows, that during the four months for which the estimate is made, each man cost the country three hundred dollars, which amounts to nine hundred dollars per man a year. We have, during the present session, passed a bill increasing the pay of the Army and the bounty to new recruits. With this addition, each man will cost the United States little less than one thousand dollars during the same period. Should the number of troops contemplated be actually enlisted, our annual expenditure on account of the Army alone will exceed fifty millions of dollars. The portion of Virginia, which I in part represent, will be nearly seven millions, and of the small States of Delaware and Rhode Island, upwards of six hundred thousand dollars each. It matters not how the money is obtained; the people will ultimately have to pay it, and so far as it respects direct contributions, these sums will fall annually on the States mentioned to support the Army.

In Virginia, the whole amount of the public expenditures of the State is about three hundred thousand dollars. For this, the people enjoy all the leading benefits which good government can bestow. The security of life, liberty, and property; the impartial administration of justice; roads, and inland navigation. In short, every great object valuable to man, in a state of society, is provided for. And the army to invade and conquer Canada is to cost then twenty times the sum which they bestow upon the whole of their internal concerns.

Sir, it is a consideration certainly of the first moment where the money which these enormous preparations require is to be obtained. We have been told by the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. CHEVES,) some days ago, that you dare not tax the people; that they will not bear it. Really, sir, we present a strange spectacle—prosecuting a war for the support of which the people will not bear to be taxed, and yet, it is said, the voice of the people demands it. What a strong admonition does this very circumstance afford to gentlemen to abandon their lofty ideas. It is, however, said that it is not necessary to lay taxes; that the money wanted can be obtained by loans. Was this even practicable, would it be prudent to borrow to pay not only the war expenses, but the interest on preceding loans, and a portion of the ordinary peace expenditures? The present Secretary of the Treasury, before he was in power, wrote an essay on the finances of the United States, in which he stated that a Government acting on that principle pursued the course of a profligate, which would terminate in ruin. An individual who should conduct his affairs in such a manner, would not only impair his credit, but destroy his means, and certainly there can be no such great difference between private and public transactions as that the same cause should produce opposite effects.

But I cannot be persuaded that the attempt to carry on this war by loans can be successful. I believe, on the subject of disposable capital, gentlemen are much mistaken. At the close of the Revolutionary war, we were totally destitute of capital necessary for our commerce, which was carried on by the means of foreign capitalists. Since that time it is true we have prospered beyond example, and our capital has become comparatively great, but not much greater than the various pursuits of the country require. The first tendency of the scattered surplusses in a country wanting capital in the aggregate, is to concentrate itself in a banking institution, because the credit which a corporate body thus organized obtains, enables it to supply the demands of the country beyond their actual means, and renders to the individual whose money is thus vested a greater profit than if he had loaned it himself. It is not until this tendency has ceased that there will accumulate a large capital for Government purposes, to be loaned on moderate terms. It is true that the banks will in time of difficulty, when their capital cannot be used in the ordinary and more useful purposes for which they are established, loan their surplus money to the Government. This the banks did the last year. But there is a point beyond which they cannot go. The whole banking capital of the United States I have understood is about fifty millions. If my information is correct, I doubt whether the whole of their disposable means will enable them to advance the money wanted for one year's service. Indeed I have learned that the Secretary of the Treasury supposes they have already gone as far as prudence will permit them. Should this be the case, you will then have to apply to individuals for the money which the expenses of the war requires, and then it will be found that such a capital in the hands of individuals is very limited. The experience of the last year furnishes us with some evidence upon the subject. Out of the thirteen millions borrowed, only about four millions were obtained from individuals. Another fact contributes to show the correctness of the opinion. Our Revolutionary and Louisiana stock is generally owned abroad; this would not be the case was there an overflowing capital in the possession of our own people. These circumstances, combined with the difficulty of obtaining any large supplies through the medium of taxation, in a country whose population is so thinly scattered over an extensive territory, ought to admonish us to keep our expenses within the limits of our means.

Sir, I cannot conceal the apprehension which I entertain (however lightly others may think on the subject) of the consequences which may and probably will follow these measures. I fear that you will not be able to obtain the means to pay even those who enter into your service. And what will be the result in such an event is not difficult to anticipate. There are never wanting in military life men who, goaded on by ambition, are ready to turn their arms against their country, whenever a reasonable pretext and probable success shall invite them. These men are not confined to foreign climes—they abound in our own. Nothing can press itself stronger on the minds of an army, than, after having encountered the toils and dangers of war, to be left uncompensated and unprovided with the means of subsistence, and no remedy suggests itself more naturally (because its efficiency is felt) than to do justice to itself. The prospects of redress which ambitious men never fail to present in such a crisis are too alluring to be rejected. The consequence most generally is, that the arms which were intended to be employed in the service of the country are used against it. All history supports me in the opinion I here utter—even the history of our own country. The honorable member from Connecticut, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) who was an eye witness, has informed you of the disposition of our Revolutionary army (who certainly possessed patriotism beyond anything we can expect) at the close of the war. I subscribe to the opinion which he uttered most cordially, that nothing but the superior virtue and influence of its Chief prevented the catastrophe which I deprecate. When I reflect on these things, and see gentlemen, while they treat every apprehension as visionary, use efforts to depreciate the militia composed of the people, the only hope in such an attempt, I cannot look upon our prospects without concern. It is not to military power alone that the success of such efforts are alone owing; the boldness of the enterprise, and the apathy and indifference of the people arising from extrinsic causes, are auxiliaries which contribute to their success. The people of France who demolished the Bastille, who, in a torrent of enthusiasm, undisciplined, and almost unarmed, compelled the Duke of Brunswick to leave their country, who, under the command of Dumouriez, carried victory wherever they went, surrendered themselves to Bonaparte without a struggle, though he had not more than five hundred men immediately at his back.

My apprehensions are not solely confined to the danger resulting from military power; there are other consequences equally to be dreaded, which I fear may overwhelm us, should we continue in this course. There is one peculiarly delicate, but equally important—so delicate, that gentlemen have supposed it ought not even to be mentioned. Sir, shall I not be permitted to point to the yawning gulf beneath! Shall I not attempt to arrest your progress in the path where lies a serpent that will sting you to death? I deprecate disunion as an event pregnant with every evil. The moment it happens, civil liberty is banished from this country. I feel deeply interested that it should not happen. Permit me, however, to observe, that an union is connected by a consciousness which is felt that the various interests of the different sections are consulted and protected, and not by force. If you wish to perpetuate the Union, you must preserve that opinion. The moment that it shall no longer exist, the ties that bind us together become feeble indeed. The present war, though ostensibly waged for principles in which the Northern and Eastern people have a deep interest, is considered by them—and they certainly understand their interest best—as calculated to prostrate it. They feel the evils of your measures daily, and they see no prospect that they ever will be benefited by them. The physical power of the country is in their hands, and it requires nothing but public sentiment, which quickly follows public interest, and you ripen them for a state of things most of all to be deprecated. I hope we shall avert the evil by banishing the cause of discontent.

Besides the immediate physical evils which present themselves as probably resulting from our measures, there are other moral evils which I must dread. Our Government was made to secure the happiness of the people, and everything which even remotely is calculated to impair their moral sense, will have an effect upon their situation. When the people shall become attached to principles inconsistent with morality, or with their tranquil, civil pursuits, their prosperity and their freedom are at hazard. The spirit of conquest and of military glory, however fascinating, is baneful to the prosperity and liberty of every country. This spirit has shown itself in our country, of late, in an unusual degree. We have become tired of the peaceful character of our pursuits; and we want nothing but success on this first attempt, to encourage us to become a great military nation, attempting conquest in every quarter. Whenever that happens, we shall share the destiny of other nations. When the same spirit and the same councils prevail, the misery of the mass of the people is the support of the national glory.

One of the evils which I dread, as attending the war, and in my opinion not the least, Mr. Chairman, is, that we have united our exertions with the efforts of the great destroyer of mankind, who, having prostrated the independence of almost every nation on the continent of Europe, has drawn us into our present situation, to assist him in humbling his remaining enemy, whose destruction is, above all others, nearest his heart. I do not believe that gentlemen are so far lost to all sense of their country's interest, as designedly to unite the destiny of this nation with him, who lives only to destroy. I believe them, when they declare that such is not their intention. But we are united in fact. His ostensible object is the liberty of the seas: so is ours. His successes are our successes, and his defeats are our defeats. Being thus associated in fact—having one common object—if the war continues any time, we shall be associated in name also. When pressed beyond our present expectation by our enemy, we shall not make any difficulty in submitting to arrangements which may appear to us advantageous, but which are calculated to fasten us to the car of the conqueror. We may want men to enable us to obtain the object of our offensive operations in the North; France can furnish them. We may want ships to defend our coast; we can obtain them from the same quarter. But, for these things, we must stipulate an equivalent; and what can that be, but to unite in striking England from the list of independent nations?

Should this object be ultimately realized, what will be our destiny? Let the fate of Holland, Prussia, Italy, and Spain, answer the question. Can we suppose, that, with the fall of his present enemy, the ambition of Napoleon will be satiated? Will he, who has delighted in carnage and blood hitherto, become harmless, when we alone shall remain to oppose his thirst for universal dominion? It is not in the nature of man. Ambition is a passion, which, like avarice, increases as it is gratified. There are, indeed, some solitary cases, where it is exchanged for some other object. Charles V., Emperor of Germany, and King of Spain, after having incessantly labored for many years to extend his power, abdicated his Crown, and retired to a convent. But he was a religious devotee—a weakness or a virtue which belongs not to Napoleon. We have been told, by the honorable Speaker, who manifested much sensibility on account of the abuse which he supposes is bestowed on the French Emperor by the Opposition, that we have no concern with European affairs. How happens it that we are involved in an European war? Sir, we are deeply concerned in the commercial and political state of Europe. If we intend to remain a commercial people, our interest is best promoted if a liberal commercial spirit is cherished in that quarter of the world. In a military Government, such as that of France, commerce never can flourish; nor is it desired by those who govern, because its tendency is to promote a spirit of freedom, incompatible with the existence of such a Government. You see in the policy of the ruler of France a strong inclination to suppress foreign commerce, by restraining the freedom of enterprise, and lessening the security of property. Should he be successful in his attempts on those portions of Europe not yet within his grasp, society will be brought back to its state in the dark age of the thirteenth century. We are certainly interested in preventing such results. We are interested, also, in the political state of Europe. Our security depends on the division of power into different hands, so that those who possess it shall restrain each other. Is it not, therefore, unwise to unite our efforts to destroy the only bulwark of independence, and prostrate the remaining obstacle to universal dominion?

Sir, gentlemen have called upon us to unite with them in the measures which they are pursuing. Let me call on them in turn to unite sincerely with the friends of peace in their objects. Theirs is an untried course, pregnant with great dangers. To our's experience has given a high sanction. A fair opportunity is now afforded to them to terminate the course of hostility. It is not necessary that they should retrace their steps, for the leading cause of the war is at an end. Let them only stop and not continue the war for an object for which they would not have commenced it. To this, every consideration which can influence men to whom the destinies of a nation are committed prompts them strongly. In the past, they see in this nation a picture of liberty and happiness never equalled; while the rest of the world presents an aspect of complicated misery. Do we not hazard too much by foregoing the advantages of peace? Is the probability of success not too uncertain to put in jeopardy everything valuable to us? But gentlemen answer, that our honor forbids the abandonment of the war until we have obtained the object in contest. What is true national honor? I conceive that a Government which is scrupulously attentive to the happiness of its people; which performs with good faith the duties which one nation owes to another; which observes its promises; has arrived at the summit of honor. If war, conquest, and military glory, constitute the basis of national honor, then the most perfidious are the most honorable of the present age. That which gentlemen call our honor has long since been sacrificed at the footstool of Napoleon. He usurped our sovereignty by declaring us in a state of war with England long before we thought of it. He insulted the nation by declaring we were a people without honor. He degraded this assembly by declaring it was more dependent on England than the assembly of Jamaica. He told us that if we would not fight for honor, we would be compelled to fight for interest. When to this is added the perfidy, injury, and insult, of his Rambouillet decree, and the reason given for it, it bears no parallel in point of indignity to anything ever received at the hands of Great Britain. Why were gentlemen not so sensitive upon the point of honor then? I can give but one reason, consistent with the respect I have for them, the interest and prosperity of our people forbid the resort to arms.

Sir, I conceive that our honor, instead of leading us deeper into the war, ought to lead us out of it. How have we been brought into our present situation? Is it not solely attributable to the perfidy of the French Government? Will any gentleman in this House contradict me when I assert that if our Government had not believed that on the 1st of November, 1810, the decrees of Berlin and Milan were revoked, and ceased to operate upon our commerce, we should not have come into collision with Great Britain? If I recollect right, it was expressly stated in the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, in the session of 1808, sanctioned by this House, that as long as the two belligerents continued their injurious edicts against our commerce, it would be improper to enter into hostilities with either; that, under such circumstances, war with one was submission to the other. Is there any person, who has any claim to impartiality, who now believes that the promises of France were fulfilled according to their letter or spirit? Nay, is there any person who does believe that the decrees were ever repealed or ceased to operate, until we were pledged to go to war by the measures of the last session? Never was there a more fraudulent imposition than the conduct of the French Government presents in relation to this subject.—Though our Ministers, time after time, requested an official document showing the repeal, so that it might be presented to the British Government to obtain a discontinuance of the Orders in Council, yet it was parried and evaded; the reason was, there was no such document in existence. When it could render us no service, when we were committed in the war, the ante-dated decree, purporting to have been issued the 28th of April, 1811, was issued, containing upon its face the grossest insult. It states, that in consequence of this Government having put in force the non-importation system against Great Britain, the decrees of Berlin and Milan were repealed—thus putting us in the lead. This Government had adopted that measure as consequent on the repeal of those decrees. It is to be much regretted that the President became the dupe of this artifice; that he did not manifest the magnanimity to revoke his proclamation of November, 1810, when he discovered the deception, particularly as he had a precedent in the case, which grew out of Erskine's arrangement.

I cannot omit to notice an idea, suggested in the course of the debate, by an honorable member from Georgia, (Mr. TROUP.) He has urged upon the House the propriety of inveigling all British seamen into our service, by promising them the immediate benefit of naturalization. I feel astonished to hear such a proposition made by a gentleman coming from that portion of the Union. Those who inhabit the country between the Potomac and Florida, east of the mountains, ought to offer up their daily and nightly prayers to Heaven, to preserve the ocean of life unruffled. They are afloat in a very crazy vessel. You know, Mr. Chairman, there is a population among them whom necessity compels them to keep in slavery. They want nothing but means and opportunity to attempt to break their shackles; and I ask what can you expect from your enemy, if you seduce her subjects from their duty and allegiance, but that she will retaliate and strike you in the most vital part? This apprehension I know is treated as visionary; but remember the fate of St. Domingo. I have no confidence in the reasons generally offered to dispel the idea of danger from that quarter; that is, the want of means and intellect on the part of the slaves. Man is strong, resolute, and ingenious, where liberty is concerned. Before the year 1800, it did not enter into the imagination of any person in Virginia, that any danger was to be apprehended from that source. In that year a conspiracy was discovered, not only dangerous as it respected the numbers concerned, but their plans and means manifested a degree of capacity which could not have been believed. The discovery inspired terror into every bosom. I was in a situation at that time which enabled me to see and feel it. Sir, with ten thousand men landed on the Southern shores, and fifty thousand stand of arms, what havoc might not be expected? I do not pretend to say that such an attempt would be finally successful, but the consequences would unquestionably be disastrous. Every man would find in his own family an enemy ready to cut the throats of his wife and children. Would such a catastrophe not greatly outweigh all the objects of this war? Let us keep within the ranks of civilized warfare and we may perhaps avoid the danger.

I will close my remarks by stating to you the course which, if I had any influence, I would recommend. I would interdict the employment of all British subjects in our public and merchant service, as a measure not so much to propitiate Great Britain as to benefit our own seamen, and prevent us getting into collision hereafter. I would make another overture for peace upon liberal principles, in which I would manifest a real spirit of amity, content to take the good, though it might not be accorded in the form most eligible to my mind. I should not at present insist for the indiscriminate immunity of our flag, but be satisfied with a stipulation which would secure us from the abuses of impressment—such as our Ministers Monroe and Pinkney did obtain, I consider “honorable and advantageous;” and such can again be obtained if we use the proper means. There is nothing degrading in this course; we have the example of WASHINGTON in the year 1793. Mr. Adams, who certainly will not be charged as being too pacific, after our Ministers had been rejected by the French Directory, sent messengers of peace a second time. If such a course should be adopted, I venture to pledge myself you will have an honorable and advantageous peace.

Mr. ROBERTSON.—Mr. Chairman, I am well aware that the House will listen (if it listens at all) with much reluctance to a further discussion of the subject under consideration. Nevertheless, it is my intention explicitly, but consily, to state some of the reasons which influence me to support the measure proposed; some of the views connected with them, which command my approbation, and induce my aid. Sir, I purpose to make a few remarks on the bill itself, and subsequently, without following gentlemen in the wide and expansive range of argumentative, declamatory, and defamatory eloquence, in which they have thought fit to indulge, to reply to some of the observations which struck me with most force, and which my memory still retains.

The honorable Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is entitled to the thanks of this House, and of the nation, for the able and lucid exposition he has given, of the plan intended to be pursued by the Government in the prosecution of the war in which we are engaged, and of the objects for the attainment of which an increase of the Military Establishment is deemed necessary. What is that plan, and what are the objects in contemplation? The power of the nation is to be called out; a portion for a defence of our seacoast and extensive frontier; the residue to be sent forth to battle against our implacable foe, to drive him from the American continent, and thus to insure our future peace, if not our Union and independence. These objects are a vowed, and efforts and energy are necessary to their success.

The propriety of defending our country can be denied by none. This proposition is clear. Even the gentlemen on the other side of the House (as it is fashionable to speak) do not oppose it. For myself I do not hesitate to say, it presses itself on my feelings with irresistible force. When I take into consideration the exposed situation of the people whom it is my pride and honor to represent, when I view them surrounded by numerous and warlike tribes of Indians, skirted by strong holds in the possession of a nation devoted to our foe, containing in the bosom of their country a class of beings always on the watch to overwhelm them in ruin, I lose sight of other considerations, and am compelled to urge, as I do most earnestly, that no obstacles may be thrown in the way of our complete protection. I have lived for some years in the country to which I have called your attention. I have not been altogether an inattentive observer, nor indifferent to its interests. The neglected state of the militia under the Territorial government, its present unorganized and unarmed state, have not escaped my notice. But we must "blame the culture, not the soil." The inhabitants are brave, expert in the management of the horse and in the use of arms. The materials are good. It is unnecessary to dwell on these, or to mention other circumstances of an internal nature. Suffice it to be observed, our situation is insecure. I have stated, sir, that we are surrounded by numerous and warlike tribes of Indians. I will not recount their numbers, nor blazon their powers of doing mischief. These facts are too notorious to require repetition. I have stated that strongholds in our immediate neighborhood are in the possession of a people devoted to our enemy. The Spaniards on our eastern frontier are under their perfect control. They considered the English as fighting for the independence of Spain, their native country, their religion, and their King. In their towns an extensive British trade is carried on, and from their ports, where they refit, issue forth the armed vessels of that nation to the annoyance of the commerce of our country. The Indians too are excited against us. On my journey from New Orleans to this place, passing through the Creek confederacy, I received certain information that the Spanish commandant at St. Marks had assured them that their friends the British were expected soon in considerable force at that place and at Pensacola, and that they should be furnished with arms and other munitions of war to be used against the Americans. Sir, humanity to that people, as well as the irresistible claims we have to protection, require that a force should be stationed on the Mobile and Mississippi, sufficient to prevent the effect of British and Spanish machination, or to throw back on themselves the evils of hostility.

The honorable Chairman of the Committee observed, that gentlemen might object that the number of troops allotted for the defence of particular districts was too small. Sir, I do not think the number of troops allotted for the defence of Louisiana competent to effect that object. Leaving out of view her intrinsic worth, her invaluable products nowhere else to be found within the limits of the United States, let us consider her in relation to the Western country, as the superb avenue through which passes to the ocean the production of the most extensive and fertile lands, bordering on the same river, to be found on earth. The necessity of her protection will be thus rendered more obvious, and it will be admitted that the safety of Louisiana is connected with the prosperity of the fairest portion of our territory, indeed I may say with the preservation of the Union itself. But my motives would be misunderstood, my feelings outraged, if the support I give to the bill before the House was attributed exclusively to circumstances growing out of the situation of the State I have the honor to represent. No, sir, the war we are unhappily engaged in is just and necessary, not to have been avoided without a sacrifice of rights and principles enjoyed and defended by every independent nation. But gentlemen in opposition say, as they have always said of every measure, whatever its character, that we are wrong; that we have no cause for war; that the course we pursue leads to ruin, disunion, slavery; that we do not carry along with us the approbation of men of understanding; that the moral sense of the community is against us; yet, when they are challenged in the plenitude of their superior wisdom to suggest other measures, to point out some other and better course, they are silent, dumb; not a word. To elucidate their conduct by a familiar example: You are clamorously arrested in the highway; you are told that the road you travel is beset with danger, that it does not lead to your destined goal. Your informant boasts of his intimate knowledge of the route, and when you ask or expect to be relieved from the doubts which he alone may have excited, you are answered, it is not his business, he is not your guide; but the night approaches, the clouds lower—will you proceed, or stop and listen longer to this unprofitable and idle interference? Sir, a sign-post points out the way, although it does not go along with you.

The views of the minority are too obvious to be mistaken: they wish for that power which they once possessed and, possessing, abused; they wish to deprive the Government, I do not mean exclusively the Executive, of that popularity they at present possess. It is not then to be expected that they will either co-operate in, or recommend, wise and salutary measures, for that would be to strengthen their political opponents in the confidence of the people. Let us then, with a single view to the honor and interests of our country, pursue that course which its honor and interest require. Let us exercise with firmness and deliberation the rights of a majority. It is unimportant whence this majority comes; the right to govern the nation is complete; we are limited by the Constitution, but not by a minority. Let the minority pursue their accustomed course; let them clamor, and if they please advise. I would listen to their advice with caution—to their clamor with contempt.

I now proceed to examine some of the objections which have been made, not to the bill, but to the further prosecution of the war. The war is denounced as unconstitutional, cruel, the effect of French influence, and as intended to place James II on the throne of America. In making the first objection, gentlemen could not have been serious; they could not have expected that it would have been deemed worthy of an answer. The power to make war belongs to all nations; is of the essence of Government; but the Constitution of the United States gives it expressly, in so many words: "The Congress shall have power to declare war, to raise and support armies." Whether the war be defensive or offensive, depends on circumstance and accident, but cannot affect the right. If war be defensive and offensive, still the whole is equal to its parts. But to what does this doctrine lead? Do gentlemen believe it to be true? Then it becomes their duty to move for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the circumstances of the capture of the Macedonian, and if it be discovered that she was taken at more than a marine league from the shore, to cashier the American officer, declare the attack and capture unconstitutional, and restore the vessel to her former master. Then an enterprise, giving rise to a new era in maritime history, and entwining round the brows of the United States a wreath of imperishable laurel, turns out to be a violation of that instrument on the sacredness of which depends the Union and happiness of America. The war is not unconstitutional, nor can it, by any possibility, be so considered.

Sir, I listened to the gentleman from Massachusetts with astonishment when he denounced the war as unjust and cruel; and this charge is made by an American against the American nation, the only one inhabiting this many-peopled globe whose escutcheon is unstained with blood, and whose character is not blasted with human butcheries. We are held up thus in contrast with the British; the British! among the most ferocious of nations calling themselves civilized. Look to India, Ireland, America; look throughout the world; recount the millions of her victims to the sword, dungeon, and want; the murdered Irish; the starved Indian; and confess that she stands unrivalled in carnage. If the bodies of men whom she has massacred were brought together, they would literally form a mountain of slain. If the blood which she has spilled were collected, it would, without a figure, "the multitudinous sea incarnadine." But in what instance have the citizens of our country merited so foul an aspersion? We learn of cruelties practised upon them on the ocean and on the land; while their heroism and humanity are acknowledged by the enemy; an enemy compelled to appreciate, although incapable of imitating their conduct. It is not, it will not be, on our part, a cruel war. America will never forfeit her just claim to a character exclusively her own. In this she finds no rival among the nations of Europe; can find none, for they are—

"Stept in so far, that, should they wade no more,
"Returning were as tedious as go o'er."

The war is attributed by the gentleman from Massachusetts to French influence; and this assertion is made in the presence of numbers who voted for the measure, whose pure and unsullied characters have raised them high in the confidence of the people, and should have shielded them from such hateful suspicion. But the charge, wherever made, deserves to be repelled. Let us, for a moment, consider it. Where, sir, does this French influence exist? Where is it to be found? In the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia? Do the citizens of these States speak the French language? Do they read French books? Are there Frenchmen living among them? Are they con-necied with the French in trade, by marriage or consanguinity? I believe not. How, then, did French influence get among them—the scattered inhabitants of our forests—the industrious agriculturists of our country? But I ought not to have omitted Louisiana; perhaps it may be found there. Let not gentlemen be alarmed; there is no French influence there that will endanger their liberties, or disturb their quiet. The natives of that State are like ourselves, American; and they have, at least, been severed as long from French domination as we from British. Their interests bind them to us; they are well aware of the mutual benefits which result from our connexion. But, sir, if French influence exist in that country, it has not reached me. I was not generally the choice of that part of the community called French; I state it with regret, for they generally possess my esteem. But, sir, the cry of French influence is intended to throw dust in the eyes of the people, to prevent them from seeing what will not bear looking on. Suppose there should be a portion of our country where British influence is said to exist; is the English language there spoken? Are the people connected with the English in trade, in consanguinity, in all the various relations to which society gives rise? The answer presents itself at once.

"This war is waged for the purpose of placing James II on the throne of America." I entertain almost too favorable an opinion of the gentleman who made the remark to believe that he really feels the suspicion. He has adduced no argument; he has stated no fact; but he has indulged himself in a style of accusation disgraceful to himself, and insulting to this House. He has shamelessly departed from the subject to abuse a character holding no office in the Government, exercising no control, interfering not with our public councils; a gentleman, who, in the shades of retirement, enjoys that calm and tranquillity which flow from the consciousness of having performed well and strictly his duties towards his country. I had thought that, in relation to Mr. Jefferson, the Porcupines and Callenders had cropped the choicest flowers of Billingsgate wherewith to deck their effusions, until the House was presented the bouquet of the honorable Representative from Massachusetts.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) gives a very particular statement of the expense we shall encounter, and estimates—with how much accuracy I shall not pretend to say—the amount that each man enlisted in the Army will cost the Government. He has also stated that there was no probability that the additional force would be raised; that the citizens of our country would not forego the happiness of domestic situation, and the rewards with which industry is crowned, to become soldiers, of whom he spoke as tavern loungers, haunters of tippling shops, whiskey drinkers, &c.

Sir, the people of the United States never calculated on going to war without encountering the expenses incident to such a state. But if, according to the honorable gentleman's predictions, the forces cannot be raised, why the apprehensions of enormous expense? But the opinion is most unfounded. The patriotism of our country will fill up the ranks of her armies. The patriotism of the State which the gentleman represents ought not to have escaped him. In the neighborhood of my former residence, volunteers, conspicuous alike for their characters and talents, have marched to the standard of the nation; and, in abandoning the comforts of their homes, in pressing forward to fight our battles, in courting danger, and submitting to unaccustomed privations, little did they suppose that they thus exposed themselves to the contemptuous epithets so liberally bestowed by a Representative from their own State.

But it is said that, as the Orders in Council are repealed, the question of impressment is the only one in controversy between the United States and Great Britain; and, on this subject, the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. PEARSON,) has, without difficulty, settled principles about which jurists have differed in opinion. He contends that individuals cannot divest themselves of their allegiance; that the right of expatriation does not exist; that the practice of naturalization is wrong. These opinions are as erroneous as they are repugnant to every principle of human liberty, and owe their origin to feudal times and feudal States; times and States, the prolific sources of the vilest principles in politics and morals.

I believe that every civilized nation under the sun is in the practice of naturalizing foreigners. The omnipotent Parliament of Great Britain exercises this right. The rights of all independent nations are equal. Whatever course Great Britain pursues in relation to the subjects or citizens of other countries, these countries are authorized to pursue in relation to the subjects of Great Britain. Whatever her admirers may say to the contrary, if she does not acknowledge, she is compelled to act in conformity to this principle. Where is there in her history an example of her punishing, as a traitor, a Briton naturalized by a foreign Government, although found in arms against her? If a subject could not divest himself of his natural allegiance; if once a subject always a subject, were true, how is it that Napper Tandy was suffered to escape punishment? Why was he not hanged as a traitor? He was born in Ireland, became a French citizen, served in war against his native country, was taken, tried, and found guilty of high treason; but when a terrible retaliation was threatened by France, in the event of his execution, that nation, which never yields to threats, restored him to his then adopted country.

Shall the United States abandon not only her naturalized, but her native citizens, to the capricious tyranny of every petty officer in the British fleet? Shall we permit, in relation to ourselves, the operation of a principle opposed by every other nation? Shall we, after having emancipated the mind of man from so many shackles, permit galling chains to be rivetted around him? No arguments have been used, no authorities cited, to establish the principles for which Britain and her advocates contend. The right to impress seamen of any description whatever from vessels on the high seas, does not belong to any nation whatever. The sea is the highway common to all. No municipal regulations can operate on it: and vain would be the search into the laws of nations for authority to justify the practice of England. The searching vessels for men is an abominable interpolation on the right of search for contraband of war, that ought not to be admitted. But if it were doubtful, if it were lawful, the abuses which follow from the practice, and which must necessarily follow, from our being, in language and appearance, one people, imperiously forbid its exercise, and require that Great Britain should not be permitted, under any pretext, to take seamen from our public and private vessels.

But gentlemen are opposed to the further prosecution of the war. Do they contend that the causes which rendered it necessary have been removed? Have we obtained the objects for which it was commenced? Is the new and before unheard-of system of blockade abandoned? A system which, under the pretence of being a military measure, was converted into a commercial scheme beneficial to the belligerents, and destructive alone to the rights of neutrals. Have our citizens been restored to their country? Is any disposition evidenced to omit tearing them from their homes and families in future? What will be the consequence of laying down our arms, of shrinking from our present attitude? We are at the feet of Great Britain: and after having for years attempted in vain to obtain justice, we are to recommence fruitless negotiation. Admit that we are unable to enforce our demands, to support our independence, that we cannot carry on war, that the friends of the British Government in this country (to use their own expression) will not permit us; in such a situation, with such admission, to expect justice would be folly in the extreme. England would return to her habitual spoliations, would re-establish that state precisely the most beneficial to herself, the most injurious to us: infinitely better to her than peace on fair terms, for then the opportunity would be lost of feeding and enriching her navy at our expense; better than war, as the numerous prizes brought into her ports of late very clearly prove. Formerly the losses were exclusively ours. Yes, sir, willingly would she return to, and forever continue, her former career of depredation; and the next ten years would add another thousand to the thousand American vessels already carried into her ports.

Too long did we suffer disgrace and degradation. Peace, with all its blessings, may be enjoyed at too dear a price. But yet, while it was possible to preserve it, we shut our eyes against the most flagrant injuries; we affected not to hear the loudest insults. Peace was congenial to our habits, favorable to the principles of our Government. It was not to be apprehended it would be, nor cannot be now believed that it was wantonly abandoned. Whilst tranquillity prevailed it was wise to dwell on its advantages. Now, that in spite of all our efforts we are at war, it is well to inquire whether circumstances may not grow out of it favorable to our future happiness and prosperity.

The British possessions in America present themselves to our view and invite a conquest. I am struck with the contrariety of opinion which prevails among gentlemen. Some of them speak of the country as barren, the climate as inclement, the inhabitants thereby scattered over the face of the territory. If this be true, it will not be considered as worth defending, and as by its loss Britain loses nothing, the sympathy which she seems to have excited, and the doleful jeremiads to which her anticipated disasters have given rise, are as unnecessary as they are misplaced. But others say, no doubt from its importance to its European sovereign it will be defended to the last extremity; that the United States cannot take it; that the army we propose to send into the field will prove insufficient. When gentlemen differ so widely, no satisfactory conclusion can be drawn from their opinions. Sir, Canada will be defended, and it is from a belief of that fact, and from a knowledge of the force which Great Britain may bring into the field, that the troops now demanded become necessary. We have heard an estimate of that force too often to be again repeated. It has lost nothing of its magnitude and importance. Its valor has received the highest praise, and we are triumphantly asked if we expect to intimidate Great Britain.

Sir, none but cowards calculate on the cowardice of their foe. We do not expect to intimidate her. We expect to meet her armies in the field, and to vanquish them. The power of Britain must be extinguished in America. She must no longer be permitted to corrupt the principles and to disturb the peace and tranquillity of our citizens. Our frontier inhabitants must not be kept in dread and danger from her Indian allies. And never shall we be secure among ourselves, and exempt from the mischievous intrigues of Europeans, until European power is expelled across the Atlantic. The gentleman from Massachusetts says, that Canada entered into the scheme of the war. It certainly does now enter into the scheme of the war. Sir, no citizen of the United States would have given his consent to an unprovoked attack on that country merely for the purpose of getting possession of it. But I do, for one, rejoice that, under present circumstances, we thus have an opportunity afforded us, not only to make our enemy feel our power, but to drive him from this continent, and to remove one of the most frequent causes of war among nations—neighborhood and contiguity. The evils of peace, on the terms of gentlemen in opposition, cannot be borne. Let us then, with firmness, persevere in the contest in which we are engaged, until it can be terminated on principles compatible with the rights and honor of the nation.

The Committee now rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, January 12.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a petition of John James Dufour, and his associates, stating that, in 1802, an act was passed authorizing the sale of a quantity of the public land to the petitioners, upon a credit of twelve years, without interest, for the purpose of encouraging the culture of the vine, and that they are unable to complete the payment of the money within the limited time, and praying a grant of the further time of ten years to complete their payments.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him from William Duane, requesting that Congress will again take into their consideration the Elementary Treatise on Military Discipline, presented by him at the last session, called "A Hand Book for Infantry," and that such order may be taken thereon as the work may be found to merit.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from the consideration of the petition of the Legislature of the Illinois Territory, presented on the sixth instant, and it was referred to the Secretary of War.

A Message from the President of the United States was read, transmitting an account of the contingent expenses of the Government, for the year 1812.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "giving further time for registering claims to lands in the Eastern District of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to raise an additional army of twenty thousand men, for one year.

Mr. EMOTT addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I mean no common-place remark, when I declare to you, that I address you on the subjects which have been brought into this debate, and as I think properly so brought, with great reluctance. My general deportment since I have been honored with a seat on this floor, is sufficient evidence to you and the Committee that I feel an unwillingness to mingle in the war of words which is carried on here. There are causes which add to this repugnance on the present occasion. The debate has been continued for such a length of time, and in part has been conducted with so much asperity, that the minds of all have become fatigued, and the passions of many inflamed. I know, and I duly appreciate the difficulties which, under such circumstances, surround and face the speaker. But, sir, there are considerations of public duty, and individual propriety, which urge, nay, demand of me, to ask your patience, and the indulgence of the House, while I present to you and to them my view of the great subjects involved in this discussion.

I listened, sir, with great attention, and certainly with much pleasure, to the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) who addressed the House for the first time yesterday. Against some of his positions, and some of his doctrines, I must however enter my protest. The gentleman, in the silence of the minority, finds cause for censure; they are not of equal utility with guide-posts, which, if they do not accompany the traveller in his journey, at least point to his way. And yet when it occurred to him, that the minority did sometimes interpose with their advice, their directions, and if you please, their censure, they were held up by him, as fit objects of distrust. The ultimate object of the opposition being, as he supposes, power, he appears to think that when they do advise, it will be for the purpose of embarrassing their opponents, of procuring their assent to measures which will end in their downfall. Thus, if we remain silent, we do not perform our duty; and if we object to majority plans and views, or propose measures which are not stamped with the mark of Executive approbation, we do worse; we are plotting the destruction of the men in place, not with a view to the public welfare, but to individual interest. This is really placing the minority in an awkward situation; and after all we shall, I believe, have to pursue the track of former minorities. With the good pleasure of the gentleman, we will continue to mark the public course of public men, and when we believe they lose sight of, or disregard, the essential rights and vital interests of the people, for whose welfare, and at whose expense, this Government is maintained, we must be allowed to oppose them in a constitutional and orderly manner.

The gentleman from Louisiana has gone into a course of reasoning, to repel the charge and the suspicion of French influence, in or out of the Administration. With his facts, or his deductions, I have nothing to do. I hope it is true, that there is no understanding between our Government and that of France, with respect to the measures which have been formerly adopted, or are now pursuing, against Great Britain. Nay, I am willing to allow, that the persons in the majority are as pure in their views, and as patriotic in their intentions, as men in the opposition can be. But after saying this, I hope I may be permitted to ask the gentleman to reconsider the judgment he has been pleased to pass upon the Northern and Eastern parts of the Union. He believes in the existence of a British party in that country, and intimates that the charge of a French influence elsewhere is a mere cover; it is a dust, raised to draw off the attention, or obscure the vision of the people. Sir, we sometimes hear of this charge of British influence at the Eastward. The charge is made there by the wicked, and not unfrequently believed by the weak; the latter have our pity, the former our contempt.

The influence of British feelings! Yes, sir, the Eastern people are sometimes actuated by British feelings, but they are the feelings which operated on their ancestors, when they left England, because they loved liberty, and hated oppression. They are the feelings which operated on some, even of the present generation, when they staked their homes, and their firesides, on a contest for their political rights; when, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, they opposed British power and claims. The influence of British principles! Yes, sir, they are actuated by British principles, but, they are the principles of a Milton, a Locke, and a Sidney; principles which teach that Government is intended for the benefit of the people, and not for advantage of their agents; principles which teach them, that it is not only the right, but the bounden duty of the people, to mark the conduct of their rulers, and to reason on its fitness; to bestow applause where it is due, and not to withhold censure where it is merited. When, sir, they shall no longer be actuated by such feelings, and such principles; when they shall subscribe to the doctrines, that the men in power can do no wrong; that the will of the Executive is in all cases to be obeyed, and that they must speak of the acts of the Administration, only to applaud—then I shall begin to believe, that they are under the influence of French principles, and are fit for slaves.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that, in the discussion I am about commencing, I shall render myself obnoxious to the wit of gentlemen who think that, to bring into view other topics than those which arise out of the details of the bill now on your table, is to go beyond the range of legitimate debate. The bill contemplates the raising an additional military force of twenty thousand men; thus increasing the Military Establishment, or the standing Army of the country, to upwards of fifty-five thousand men. Now, sir, with the details of this bill I have nothing to do. Nay, I will confess to you that I like the bill as it stands, providing for enlistments for one year only, better than I should, were it amended, as has been proposed, by prolonging the terms, precisely for the reason that the force will be less efficient and dangerous, and more under legislative control. I meddle not with the fitness of the instrument, That is the business of other men. But, being opposed to the continuance of the war offensively, as I was to its commencement, I cannot consent to grant any further force to carry it on. The only check, or control, which the Legislature can constitutionally have over a war after it is begun, is in withholding the means; and, in voting the means, either in men or money, every member of the Legislature ought to be satisfied of the necessity of prosecuting the war.

According to my best judgment, sir, this war was improperly commenced, and is unnecessarily continued; and I shall now proceed to explain the grounds of that judgment by an examination of the causes of the war, as they existed at its commencement, and as they now remain. As this is the first time that the subject has been brought into debate, and, indeed, the earliest opportunity which has been allowed, of an open discussion, I am sure I shall be pardoned for going into detail, if I even should be tedious, as I know I shall be uninteresting. It is a right which I think I may claim, to state distinctly my reasons and motives for the votes which I have given, and may give, in relation to the war, after what has been said in this House, and out of it, about the opposition to the views of the Administration.

In making this examination, I shall pass in review, in as brief a manner as possible, the three great subjects of complaint against Great Britain; her orders of blockade, her Orders in Council, and her practice of impressment. But for one or all of these, the war certainly would not have been declared; and I may assume that, for but one or all of these, the war ought not to be continued. I cannot, indeed, but recollect, that the gentleman from Louisiana has mentioned the conquest of Canada, and of the Floridas, as causes for the continuance of the war. As respects the Canadas, I have heretofore understood that their reduction might be a consequence of the war, but never until now did I know that it was to be shifted into a cause for carrying it on. And, in regard to the Floridas, I will not consent that their conquest should, in the existing relations of this country, be either a cause or consequence of war. I will confess to you, that an invasion of the colonies of Spain at this time, under the stale excuses of convenience or necessity, strikes me with abhorrence. It is not only against the genius of our Government, and, as I hope, the character of our people, but, if persisted in, will be a foul blot in our national history.

As to the British blockades:—In order that I may not be said to misrepresent the views of the Executive Government, or of this House, I will read to you the charge of the one and the other, respecting blockades. The President, in his war Message of June last, says, "Under pretended blockades, without the presence of an adequate force, and sometimes without the practicability of applying one, our commerce has been plundered in every sea." What is thus generalized by the Executive, is made particular by the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, which, it will be recollected, and I make the observation once for all, was made the act of this House by placing it, against all former usage, on the Journals.

The report, after a dissertation on the carrying trade, and its interruption by the British, proceeds to say: "In May, 1806, the whole coast of the Continent, from Elbe to Brest, inclusive, was declared to be in a state of blockade. By this act, the well-established principles of the law of nations, which have served for ages as guides, and fixed the boundary between the rights of belligerents and neutrals, were violated." This, then, being the charge, we may inquire, whether the order of blockade, of May, 1806, was really a just cause of war in June, 1812, and whether it yet continues to be so?

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the British Government, theoretically, at least, admits the ancient rule of national law respecting blockades. Not to go further back than the correspondence of 1811, the British Minister, in his letter of July 3, to the Secretary of State, in reference to this very blockade, declared: "If the Orders in Council should be abrogated, the blockade of May, 1806, could not continue, under our construction of the law of nations, unless that blockade should be maintained by a due application of an adequate naval force." Indeed, sir, the President, in his Message, and the Committee of Foreign Relations, in their report, distinctly admit the correctness of the British theory, and urge it by way of complaint against her practices. I have not discovered that we have changed our ground on this subject. We have not yet, to my knowledge, adopted the Napoleon principle of maritime law, that a blockade requires a besieging force, and can only be applied to strong or fortified ports. It therefore follows, that the dispute with England, relative to blockades, is not about any new principle advanced by her, but about her practice in opposition to her own principles and our avowed doctrine. Now, sir, with this view of the subject, was the order of blockade of May, 1806, a cause of war in 1812?

The order of blockade of the 16th of May, 1806, with an exception which I will presently notice, declares "the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to the port of Brest, both inclusive," to be in a state of blockade, but provides that such blockade was not to extend to neutral vessels, laden with goods not being enemy's property or contraband of war, provided that the vessel going in, had not been laden at a port belonging to an enemy, and the vessel going out was not destined to an enemy's port, and had not previously broken the blockade.

In regard to so much of the order as relates to enemy's property and contraband of war, it affords no ground of complaint; as by the law of nations we could not, even in the absence of a blockade, cover the former or trade in the latter. The objectionable part of the order must therefore be that which prohibits the entry of a neutral vessel, which had loaded at an enemy's port, and the departure of a ship destined for an enemy's port. Now, the obvious effect of these restrictions, was to prevent neutrals from carrying on the colonial, and engaging in the coasting, trade of France. The inward bound vessel was not to have a cargo which had been put on board in a French port, and thus the trade from a colony to the mother country, as well as the coasting trade in the latter, was prevented. The outward bound vessel was not to be intended for a French port, and thus the trade from the mother country to the colony was prohibited. If the order had an operation beyond this, it must have been almost a thing of accident.

Let it now be recollected, that the British have, from the year 1756, contended that a neutral was not authorized, by the law of nations, to engage during war in an unaccustomed trade with the colonies, or on the coasts of their enemy. To capture vessels engaged in such trade, we know that they did not think it necessary to resort to blockades. By this order, therefore, they claimed no new right, nor did they under it exercise any new power over neutrals. In fact, while it prohibited the direct, it left free, or rather threw open to neutrals, the indirect colonial trade. The nature of the cargo, or its origin, was not a subject of inquiry; it was sufficient that it was not put on board the vessel at a French port. And we have the authority of the Administration, for saying that in this respect, it was not only calculated to benefit our merchants, but that they actually were benefited by it. In the letter from Mr. Monroe to Mr. Foster, of the 1st of October, 1811, it is expressly stated, "That this order, by allowing the trade of neutrals in colonial productions to all that portion of the coast which was not rigorously blockaded, afforded to the United States an accommodation in a principal point then at issue between our Governments, and of which their citizens extensively availed themselves."

When we look at the order of blockade in this point of view, and without the exception, it is surely not necessary to ascertain the extent of coast embraced by it, nor to calculate the number of ships it would take to blockade such coast. This may be pretty amusement for grown children, who need examples in the first rules in arithmetic, but it is unworthy of grave statesmen, when deciding on the momentous question of peace or war. It was in a special manner, as I shall more distinctly show hereafter, unworthy of the member of the Administration who has taken a lead in this war, and who, in the opinions of many, is now nursing it. Such a blockade was in itself harmless, nay, more, it was beneficial to us. It wanted no fleets to enforce it. Our merchants at the time would have seen with pleasure a like blockade of all the coasts, rivers, and ports, from North Point to the Rock of Gibraltar.

It remains then, Mr. Chairman, to be seen, whether the exception in the order of May, made it so objectionable as to call for war. The order, after stating the kind of trade which was not to be interrupted, has this expression, "save and except the coast, rivers, and ports, from Ostend to the river Seine, already in a state of strict and rigorous blockade, and which are to be considered as so continued." In truth, as the mere reading of the order will show, if there is anything substantially hostile to our rights to be found in it, it is in this saving clause. With this, the order may be considered as a blockade of the coast from Ostend to the Seine, but surely not beyond that. Indeed, the Administration so well understood this, that Mr. Monroe, in his letter to Mr. Foster of the 1st of October, 1811, declares it almost in terms. "If, says (Mr. Monroe,) you will examine the order, you will find that it is strictly little more than a blockade of the coast from the Seine to Ostend. There is an express reservation in it, in favor of neutrals to any part of the coast, between Brest and the Seine, and between Ostend and the Elbe. Neutral Powers are permitted by it to take from their own ports every kind of produce, without distinction as to its origin, and to carry it to the Continent, under that limitation, and with the exception only of contraband of war and enemy's property, and to bring thence to their own ports in return whatever articles they think fit."

An attentive perusal of the exception will establish another fact, that the order of May, 1806, was not even a blockade of the coast from Ostend to the Seine. It merely excludes that country from the benefits which were to arise to neutrals under the order, by recognising the existence of a prior blockade, and providing for its continuance. The blockade thus kept alive, is that of the 9th of August, 1804. "At the entrance of the ports of Fecamp, St. Vallery en Caux, Dieppe, Treport, the Somme, Naples, Boulogne, Calais, Gravelines, Dunkirk, Nieuport, and Ostend." And of this blockade we hear of no complaint, either as to its extent, or the want of ability to enforce it.

Will gentlemen now say, what has never yet been pretended, that, from the extent of coast, the British could not, or did not, enforce the blockade? We may ask them to look at the order, and then say whether it contains a fair enumeration of the principal ports or points. If so, and I think I may venture to say it does, had not the British at the time a sufficient naval force to blockade eleven or twelve places in their own seas, and almost in sight of their own coasts? If this is admitted, and I presume no one will undertake to question it, are we not certain, from our knowledge of the history of the times, that such force was applied? Do we not know that Bonaparte not only threatened an invasion of England at the time, but had a powerful army encamped for the purpose on this very coast? And do we yet doubt whether, under such circumstances, the British had not a naval force on the French coast, and before these places, sufficiently strong to enforce the blockade?

There is still one other circumstance in relation to the order of May, 1806, which is worthy of notice, and that is, that it was an act of the Fox Administration. To those who have attended to the history of that great man, it is well known that Charles James Fox was, at every period of his life, and in all circumstances, the open and the sincere friend of this country. When we were colonies of Great Britain, we had his exertions, and after our independence, his wishes, in our favor. To the last moment of his life, he felt interested in our prosperity. It was indeed, if we are to believe Monroe, his ruling passion, strong in death. And yet we are now called on to say, that, under the guise of friendship, he not only contemplated a vital blow at our neutral rights, but actually did the deed. We are now willing, in the face of the world, to declare that this great champion of neutral rights, and American interests, was the author and founder of a system which not only made just and proper the French decrees, but which called for war on the part of this nation. Sir, it is not doing justice to the memory of the man, or his intentions towards us, to say so.

Thus far, Mr. Chairman, I have ventured on the face of the order itself; but to make assurance doubly sure, I will now place before you the opinions of the very persons who recommended war on account of the blockade. These opinions, given at different times, will prove most satisfactorily that as long as the order of blockade of May, 1806, had a practical effect and operation, while it still had substance as well as form, it was not only not viewed by the Administration as violating our neutral rights, but was received as a benefit to this country, and a relaxation on the part of Great Britain.

The order, it will be recollected, bears date the 16th of May, and it was communicated by Mr. Monroe, then our Minister at London, to Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, by a letter dated the 17th. In this letter Mr. Monroe says, "early this morning I received from Mr. Fox a note, a copy of which is enclosed, which you will perceive embraces explicitly a principal subject depending between our Governments, though in rather a singular mode." The note is couched in terms of restraint, and professes to extend the blockade further than was heretofore done; nevertheless, it takes it from many ports already blockaded; indeed, from all east of Ostend and west of the Seine, except in articles contraband of war and enemy's property, which are seizable without a blockade. And in like form of exception, considering every enemy as one Power, it admits the trade of neutrals within the same limit to be free in the productions of enemy's colonies in every, but the direct, route between the colony and the parent country. "It cannot be doubted that the note was drawn by the Government in reference to the question, and if intended by the Cabinet as a foundation on which Mr. Fox is authorized to form a treaty, and obtained by him for that purpose, it must be viewed in a very favorable light."

On the 20th of May, Mr. Monroe again writes to this Government, and speaking of the order, he says, "from what I could collect, I have been strengthened in the opinion, which I communicated to you in my last, that Mr. Fox's note of the 15th was drawn with a view to a principal question with the United States—I mean that of the trade with enemies' colonies." In a letter of the 9th of June, after detailing a conversation with Mr. Fox, in part, relating to the order, Mr. Monroe declares, "I concluded however from this conversation, as I had done from what had occurred before, that this measure had been taken to prevent the further seizure and condemnation of our vessels on the principle in discussion between our Governments"—"several circumstances, independent of those alluded to, support this idea. It is not necessary to state them, because I trust the business will ere long be placed on a much more solid footing."

Here, then, we have a full expression of the opinion of Mr. Monroe at the time, and formed, as it would seem, with all due caution. But it may be said, that he was too credulous on this occasion; that he was deceived by the British Ministry, and that he afterwards discovered and renounced his error. Hear what he says in his new capacity of Secretary of State, to Mr. Foster, in his letter already referred to, of the 1st of October, 1811. After remarking on the order of May, 1806, that it was strictly little more than a blockade of the coast from the Seine to Ostend, he observes, "why then did the British Government institute a blockade, which, with respect to neutrals, was not rigorous as to the greater part of the coast comprised in it? If you will look to the state of things which then existed between the United States and Great Britain, you will find the answer: a controversy had taken place between our Governments on a different topic, which was still depending. The British Government had interfered with the trade between France and her allies in the produce of their colonies. The just claim of the United States was then a subject of negotiation, and your Government professing its willingness to make a satisfactory arrangement of it, issued the order which allowed the trade, without making any concession as to the principle, reserving that for adjustment by treaty. It was in this light that I viewed, and in this sense that I represented, that order to my Government."

This gentleman has, in this case at least, the merit of consistency. His opinion of the order in 1806, as negotiator, was not changed, when, in 1811, as Secretary of State, he was in possession of the views, the wishes, and the information of the Executive Government. It is possible, however, though certainly not very probable, that he may be mistaken on this subject, and if he is, we will surely find the mistake exposed and corrected by the Committee of Foreign Relations. Permit me, sir, to read to you the part of their "report, or manifesto," which contains their opinion of the order. "Your committee think it just to remark, that this act of the British Government does not appear to have been adopted in the sense in which it has been since construed. On consideration of all the circumstances attending the measure, and particularly the character of the distinguished statesman who announced it, we are persuaded that it was conceived in a spirit of conciliation, and intended to lead to an accommodation of all differences between the United States and Great Britain."

Notwithstanding this broad apology, if not justification, of the order, the committee deemed it a just cause of war; and why, Mr. Chairman? Because "it has been made by his successors a pretext for that vast system of usurpation, which has so long oppressed and harassed our commerce." Indeed! and are we to commence and carry on an offensive war, on account of the order of blockade, not for its own demerit, but because it was made a pretext for another system? But where do gentlemen learn that the order of May, 1806, was made a pretext for the Orders in Council? Certainly they do not find it in the orders themselves, nor in the attempted justification of them by the British Government. Heretofore I had understood, that the pretext for the Orders in Council, were the French decrees, and the war on British commerce commenced by those decrees.

But, not to detain you longer on this subject, let me say, that as it appears the order of May, 1806, was adopted to benefit and not to injure our commerce; as it was so understood by this Government at the time and up to the moment when war was declared; as it was really without any possible operation, good or bad, when war was resolved on, it follows that it was not a just cause of war.

If, however, the blockade of May, 1806, was a just cause of war in June 1812, is it so now? On the 29th of June, Lord Castlereagh informed our agent in England, what we indeed already knew, that in point of fact this blockade had been discontinued for a considerable length of time, and that there was no intention of recurring to it without a new notice to neutrals in the usual forms; and we have the authority of the Administration for saying, that they are satisfied on this point. The order has therefore fairly sunk beneath the horizon. It is emphatically no longer a cause of controversy or of war.

One word more on the subject of blockades, and I have done with them. The President, on the 6th of July last, sent to this House a report of the Secretary of State, Mr. Monroe, of the captures made by the belligerents during the present European war, and of the edicts bearing upon neutral commerce. In the enumeration of edicts, we have the British blockade of the Canal of Corfu, of the 18th of August, 1810, which he says "in effect was an attempt to blockade the whole Adriatic Sea." An attempt thus to close a sea upon neutrals, was certainly a novel, and most injurious, application of the right of blockade. The case was cited to us, as explanatory of the hostile views and practices of Great Britain, as a practical commentary on the Executive text, relative to British blockades. But what will you say, sir, when you find from papers on your table, which have been sent from the office of State, that the Secretary has either mistaken or misstated the extent of this blockade? Such in truth is the fact. Mr. Pinkney, in his letter of the 24th of August, 1810, transmitting the notification of the blockade, intimates that it is a blockade of the Adriatic; but in that of the 7th of September following, he declares to the Government, that this construction appears to be erroneous, and that "the canal to which the notification is now understood to apply, is the narrow passage to the eastward of Corfu." This blockade therefore of an entire sea, dwindles down to that of the strait, between the Island of Corfu and the Grecian shore. Reflections will urge themselves on the mind, on a statement so manifestly untrue; but I pass them over.

The British Orders in Council.—After mentioning blockades, the President, in his war Message of June last, brings to view the next great subject of complaint, the Orders in Council.

"Not content with these occasional expedients

'for laying waste our neutral trade, the Cabinet of Great Britain resorted at length to the sweeping system of blockades, under the name of Orders in Council; which has been moulded and managed as might best suit its political views, its commercial jealousies, or the avidity of British cruisers."

The Committee of Foreign Relations, in this, as in the case of blockades, make particular what was left general by the Executive; and they have so far at least the merit of making out to the nation, and to the world, the actual causes of the war. The Order in Council of January, 1807, the first of the series, is mentioned as a matter of history; but as this had passed away, the committee place the grievance of the nation on the order of November, 1807. "We proceed to bring into view the British Order in Council of November 11, 1807, which superseded every other order, and consummated that system of hostility on the commerce of the United States, which has been since so steadily pursued. By this order, all France, and her allies, and every country at war with Great Britain, or with which she was not at war, from which the British flag was excluded, and all the colonies of her enemies, were subjected to the same restrictions as if they were actually blockaded, in the most strict and rigorous manner; and all trade, in articles the produce and manufacture of the said countries and colonies, and the vessels engaged in it, were subjected to capture and condemnation as lawful prize." "It would be superfluous in your committee to state, that by this order the British Government declared direct and positive war against the United States."

This order is certainly extensive in its terms and operation, and gave strong grounds of complaint to neutral nations. But there was one objection to making it a substantive cause of war in 1812, and that is, that it really had not then a legal existence. Yes, sir, strange as it may seem, we were called upon to declare war, and did declare war, for a thing which rested only in history. The British Order in Council of the 26th of April, 1809, after reciting the order of 1807, expressly revokes it, and then declares "that all the ports and places as far north as the river Ems, inclusively, under the Government of France, together with the colonies, plantations, and settlements, in the possession of those Governments, respectively, and all ports and places in the northern parts of Italy, to be reckoned from the ports of Orbitello and Pesaro, inclusively," shall continue subject to the restrictions of blockade, "and every vessel trading from and to the said countries or colonies, plantations or settlements, together with all goods and merchandise on board, shall be condemned as prize to the captors."

It may be said, and to a certain extent it is certainly true, that the orders of November, 1807, and of April 1809, are similar in principle; but it cannot be pretended that they are equally obnoxious in their effects. It is truly stated in the report, that the order of November, 1807, interdicted the trade of neutrals to France, to the allies of France, to countries at war with England, and to countries from which the British flag was excluded. The order of April, 1809, applies only to the trade with France, with Holland as far as the Ems, and with a small part of the north of Italy. Again, the order of November, 1807, prohibits all trade in articles the produce or manufacture of the interdicted countries. Nothing of this is found in the order of April, 1809. In truth, the British order existing when we declared war, though a great let and hinderance to us, did not justify the conclusion drawn by the committee, that the British Government had completely usurped the dominion of the ocean, and forbid all trade. A wide spread of commerce was left untouched by British regulations, or orders; and if we credit the Administration, that which was interdicted, was neither inviting to our merchants, nor desirable for the country.

Thus standing the charge against Great Britain, I will now, as in the case of blockades, examine whether the Order in Council of April, 1809, was a reasonable cause of war, and if it remain so?

War, being one of the severest calamities that ever scourged human kind; carrying in its train every vice, and laying a foundation for the commission of every crime; it follows, that the nation which commences it should act but from necessity. If just to itself, it should not only be certain that its opponent is clearly wrong, but also that it is clearly right. Again, the agents in the Government having the power to make war, are not true to their trust, if, in addition to the cause of war, they do not look to the consequences and effects of it. If an evil exists, it ought to be certain that war will be a remedy for it, and that the good to be acquired will more than balance the injuries to result from the war.

In examining, therefore, this, and the other avowed causes of the war, whether they were, or are just and reasonable, I wish to be distinctly understood as settling the case with this people and nation. If there is a wrong done to them by the Orders in Council, before, as their agent, I will consent to carry on a war for this cause, I must be satisfied that the wrong in practice is of sufficient magnitude to justify war; that the war is to afford a remedy for the evil, and that the remedy is not worse than the disease. A paper blockade of the Island of Tristan d'Acunha, or an Order in Council prohibiting a commercial intercourse with that august Sovereign, Jonathan Lambert, and his four subjects, however much in principle it may interfere with our rights, will never gain my consent to a war either with Great Britain or France.

In considering this cause of war, we are necessarily led to view the Orders in Council, in connexion with the French decrees. Taken separately, and without regard to the causes which led to them, or the reasons alleged by each nation for their continuance, the French decrees and the British orders are undoubted causes of war. Both nations, however, sought for a justification in the conduct of their adversary, and the submission of neutrals. It is not, perhaps, material to ascertain which was the first aggressor, in this novel system of warfare; but if it was, and I have justly explained the blockading order of May, 1806, or if that order was fairly understood by Mr. Monroe, and by the Committee of Foreign Relations, it would seem to follow that France took the first step in this war on our rights and interests.

Be that as it may, this Government has, by its embargo and non-intercourse laws, and the offers made to the belligerents under them, considered both so much in the wrong as to refuse to select either for an enemy in exclusion of the other, while the obnoxious acts of both remained. This, sir, necessarily leads to an examination whether the French decrees were revoked when we were called upon to declare war against Great Britain. I speak the settled and firm conviction of my own mind when I say they were not.

I have, on a former occasion, attempted to show that the President was not authorized to issue his proclamation of the 2d of November, 1810, and that Congress ought not to have passed the non-importation law of the 2d of March, 1811, the two acts which were the precursors of this war, because the note of the Duke of Cadore of the 5th of August, 1810, was not, and was not intended to be, a repeal of the French decrees. Without meaning to repeat what was then urged, I will briefly examine the practices of the French cruisers, the decisions of the French courts, and the declarations of the French Government, in relation to the decrees, since the pretended revocation.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to bring into this discussion the decrees of Bayonne and Rambouillet, which more than volumes speak the disposition of the French ruler towards us; and which at one time appeared to have made a deep and lasting impression on the Administration. I cannot but recollect the declaration of Secretary Smith, in his address to the people, that "on the 20th of February, 1811, the French Government did officially, and formally, through their Minister, Mr. Serrurier, communicate to this Government their fixed determination, not to restore the property that had been so seized." And when I do recollect this, and bring to mind also that the information was not given to the National Legislature, before the passage of the non-intercourse law, and has never yet been laid before us by the Executive, I dare not trust myself to speak of it.

Neither, sir, is it my intention, in any manner, to bring into question the motives of the President in issuing his proclamation, or of the members of this and the other branch of the Legislature who voted for the non-intercourse law. I am willing to believe that the Executive, when he issued the proclamation, and Congress, when it passed that law, which was in effect to validate the proclamation, acted under the impression that the French decrees were revoked: but I must believe also that in this instance they were deceived by the arts and cunning of the French Government. Having been an actor in the scenes which preceded the non-importation law, I cannot, however, when I view them with the light since afforded by the gentleman who was at the head of the Department of State, acquit the President of all blame. Mr. Smith, in his address, states some things which we all know to be true. We know that much doubt existed in this House and nation with respect to the effect of the French note, and the intention of the French Government; and we know also that the non-importation law was delayed on account of the arrival of the new French Minister, who, it was confidently expected, would be able to dispel our doubts. Sir, the Minister came, and we received no information. How this happened has been explained by Mr. Smith. He had a conference with Mr. Serrurier, and prepared a note, in order to obtain his formal answer, among other things, to the question, whether the decrees had been revoked, and what explanation he was authorized to give on the subject. Let Mr. Smith inform you how this was received by the President. "But waiting on the President with it (the note, and on the 20th of February,) and after having reported to him verbally the result of the conference, I was, to my astonishment, told by him that it would not be expedient to send to Mr. Serrurier any such note. His deportment throughout this interview evinced a high degree of dissimulation, which occasionally betrayed him into fretful expressions."

As to the practices of the French cruisers, we have it in the history of the times. From accounts not contradicted, and which cannot with truth be contradicted, we know that the French armed vessels, public as well as private, and in every sea, continued their aggressions on our commerce, under the principles of the decrees, notwithstanding the pretended revocation. When told of the revocation, their answer was a smile of contempt for our credulity. But without resorting to report and general history, we have a document from the State Department which establishes these depredations; I mean the report of captures laid on our table on the 6th of July last. In this we have given to us a list of forty-five captures, made by the French, since the 2d of November, 1810; of the vessels thus taken, eight are expressly said to have been burnt or sunk at sea by a French squadron. The papers relative to the French burning, went to the Department through this House, and we know that, in some instances, the certificate of the French commander accompanied the representations, proving that he acted under orders issued after the 2d of November.

This report of captures I am sorry, sir, to have it to remark, does not comprehend all the cases of French depredations on our commerce, after the date of the proclamation of November. As it was made up from communications by individuals, this was in some measure to have been expected; but it was not to be expected that any cases known in the Office of State would have been omitted; and yet so is the fact. Among the papers which accompanied the President's Message of the last session, is a list from our agent in France, of American vessels taken by French privateers since the 1st of November, 1810, and carried into the ports of France. In it we have with others the Robinson Ova, the Neptune, the Two Brothers, and the Zebra, not one of which is mentioned in the report. Added to this, we know the protests and papers, which went from this House, proved that the French squadron destroyed nearly thirty American vessels instead of eight, as represented by the report.

As to the decisions of the French prize courts: It will be recollected that Mr. Russell, in his letter to the Secretary of State, of the 8th of May, 1811, says, "it may not be improper to remark, that no American vessel, captured since the 1st of November, has yet been released, or had a trial." It is not necessary, therefore, to go further back. In the Message of April 23d, 1812, relative to captures of vessels in the Baltic Sea, we have from our agent, Mr. Warden, three cases of condemnation by the Council of Prizes at Paris, on the 10th December, 1811; the captures having been made in 1811. The ship Julian, with her cargo, was declared good prize, because, among other reasons, "that she was visited by several English war vessels;" and the ship Hercules, because "that it was impossible she was not visited by the enemy's ships of war, in approaching the Isle of Anholt." In all the determinations of the French courts, as far as we have any knowledge of them, the principles of the Berlin and Milan decrees have been recognised and enforced.

As to the acts and declarations of the French Government: It has been more than once urged, that the admission of some of our vessels into France was a proof of the revocation of the decrees; and yet, sir, Mr. Russell, in his letter of May, which I have just mentioned, declares that the vessels whose entry had been allowed, had come direct from the United States, without having done or submitted to any known act which would have subjected them to the operation of the decrees. How then, sir, can such admission be evidence of the revocation? And how does it happen that the admission, if there was a revocation, was to proceed from the Emperor?

In the answer of the French Emperor to the deputies from Hamburg and Bremen, we find him, on the 20th of March, 1811, saying that "the decrees of Berlin and Milan are the fundamental laws of my Empire; they cease only to have effect as to those nations which defend their sovereignty and maintain the religion of their flag." And what, I pray you, sir, does His Majesty mean by this religion of the flag? It is, that the flag, if it does not give character to, shall protect the property under it. It is, that the passengers on board the vessel shall be considered as on neutral territory, and not be subject to capture. Have we really consented to maintain this religion of our flag. And if we have not, is it not certain that the decrees remained in operation against us? Again, his Imperial Majesty addressed his Council of Commerce on the 31st March, 1811, when he told them, and told us, that "the decrees of Berlin and Milan are the fundamental laws of my Empire. For the neutral navigation, I consider the flag as an extension of territory. The Power which suffers its flag to be violated, cannot be considered as neutral. The fate of American commerce will soon be decided. I will favor it, if the United States conform themselves to these decrees. In the contrary case, their vessels will be driven from my Empire." His Majesty, then, had not come to a determination about our commerce in March, 1811. Its fate still depended on his good pleasure. He was willing not to apply the decrees to us, in case we adopted them ourselves, and joined him in the war he was waging for the freedom of the seas.

If, sir, any doubt on this subject remained, it must now be at an end. The French decrees, with the date of the 28th of April, 1811, but actually made in 1812, and communicated by our agent to the English Government on the 20th of last May, will forever settle this question. By this paper the decrees of Berlin and Milan are "definitively" declared as not existing in regard to our vessels. And why? Because they were repealed in August, 1810? Not so, but because our law of March, 1811, was a formal refusal to adhere to a system, invading the independence of neutral Powers, and of their flag. To the friends of the liberty, the prosperity, and the reputation, of the country, it cannot but be a source of melancholy reflection to find our Executive Government insisting on the revocation of the French decrees, and recommending for such revocation a non-intercourse and a war with England; when in every act of the French Government, its courts, and its fleets, a direct negative is to be found to such revocation.

When, however, Mr. Chairman, the declarations of the French ruler, and the seizure, and condemnation, and destruction of our property, have been cited in proof of the existence of the French decrees, a distinction by way of apology has been made between the internal and external application of them; we have been told that they existed against us merely as municipal regulations. What, municipal regulations to authorize and to justify the captures and the burnings on the Atlantic, and the captures and the condemnations on the Baltic! We shall look in vain for such a distinction, as coming from our good friend, Napoleon the Just. He makes none such. He has not yet descended thus to trifle on this subject.

But what are the municipal regulations to which we are so willing to submit? They are, according to the Milan decree, that every vessel which shall submit to be searched by an English ship, or that sails from or to an English port, or from or to their colonies occupied by their troops; and, according to the Berlin decree, all merchandise coming from English manufactories and colonies, is lawful prize. These regulations are to remain as long as England continues to deny the inviolability of the flag; or, in other words, shall deny that the flag of a neutral shall protect the property of an enemy.

Do we wish to know in what country these municipal regulations are to operate? The French note on the breaking out of the war with Russia will give us some information on this head. The Duke of Bassano, the French Minister of Foreign Relations, on the 25th of April, 1812, addresses a paper to Count Romanzow, Chancellor of Russia, from which I will give you one or two extracts: "Count—His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, had acknowledged at Tilsit the principle, that the present generation should not have looked to the enjoyment of happiness, but on the ground that the nations in the full enjoyment of their rights, might give themselves up freely to the exercise of their industry; that the independence of their flag was a right belonging to them, and its protection a reciprocal duty of the one towards the other; that they were not less bound to protect the inviolability of their flag, than that of their territory; that if a Power cannot, without ceasing to be neuter, allow its territory to be taken away by one of the belligerent Powers, so neither can it remain neuter in permitting to be taken from under the protection of its flag, by one of the belligerent Powers, the property which the other has placed there: that all Powers consequently have the right of exacting, that nations pretending neutrality, should cause their flag to be respected in the same manner as they enforce respect to their territory; that so long as England, persisting in this system of war, should disavow the independence of any flag upon the seas, no Power which is possessed of coast, can be neuter with respect to England." "The Emperor Alexander offered his mediation to the English Government, and engaged, if this Government would not consent to conclude peace upon the principle of acknowledging that the flags of all Powers should enjoy an equal and perfect independence upon the seas, to make common cause with France, to summon in concert with her the three Courts of Copenhagen, Stockholm, and Lisbon, to close their ports against the English, to declare war against England, and to insist upon the adoption of the same measures by the various Powers." "Sweden had refused to shut her ports against England; and Russia, in conformity to the stipulations of Tilsit, had declared war against her." The great complaint against Russia, and the principal cause of the present war, as collected from this paper, is the permission to bring into Russia the produce of English colonies under foreign or neutral flags.

These municipal decrees, so called by our Administration, therefore, are, or are to be, as extensive as the Continent. All nations are to protect the religion of their flags. Any nation refusing or omitting to do this, loses its neutral character, and war is to be made upon it. Are these indeed mere municipal regulations? Have we no interests in these questions; no rights to claim or protect? The events of the last twenty years have been such as, if not to stupify, to astonish and paralyze the human mind. We lose the enormity of the conduct of the great despot of Europe in the splendor of his achievements, and success of his enterprises. How else are we to account for the indifference with which we hear of his depredations on our property, and his violations of our rights? How else does it happen, that we so carelessly receive, or make apologies for, his outrages on our people and nation?

To sum up all in a few words. The President was mistaken when he issued his fatal proclamation, and we were equally mistaken when we passed the non-intercourse law. The French decrees were not revoked. And we were called upon, by no duty to France or ourselves, to declare war against Great Britain, on account of the Orders in Council. In this point of view, it is not necessary to have reference to the diplomatic warfare of last year between our Secretary of State and the British Minister, then in this country; nor to inquire what kind of revocation was demanded by England. To all inquiries of this kind, the obvious answer is, that there was no revocation of any kind by France.

But it seems to some gentlemen that all this investigation, and indeed any investigation, on the subject, is useless. The honor and interest of the country called for this war. Sir, a well regulated sense of honor is a proud trait in the character of a nation, as well as in that of an individual; but let us not take tinsel for gold. Much has been said about submission, and the disgrace, individual and national, attending it. Is it not said, and is there not some foundation for the remark, that war with Great Britain, in the state of our relations with France, was submission to the arts, or at least the duplicity, of Bonaparte? If to maintain the chastity of our character was indeed our only object, we ought to have had all doubts removed as to the acts and intentions of the French Emperor.

Was the pretended revocation by France an act of justice to us, or at all calculated for our benefit; or was it not a mere lure to lead us on to a war with England? The depredations on the high seas were continued to the extent of French power, and our commercial intercourse with France was fettered with new duties and oppressive regulations. In the letter of instructions from the Secretary of State, Mr. Monroe, of the 26th of July, 1811, to our present Minister in France, this subject is presented in a fair point of view. After remarking that it had been expected that our trade with France would have been placed on a fair footing, he says, it appears from documents in his office, "that our commerce has been subjected to the greatest discouragement, or rather, to the most oppressive restraints." "In short, that the ordinary usages of commerce between friendly nations were abandoned." "If the ports of France and her allies are not opened to the commerce of the United States on a liberal scale, and on fair conditions, of what avail to them, it may be asked, will be the revocation of the British Orders in Council?" Sir, I have nothing to add to these observations; they are strong in character, and not more strong than just. Would to heaven I could see a correspondent spirit in the scraps and morsels which have been cast upon us, of the meagre communications of the man who was thus instructed. Nearly eighteen months have now passed since this man, who "had the most flattering things said to him from the Emperor relative to his appointment," reached France, and yet to this day we are ignorant of the great value of his labors. But if what he has done remains unknown, what he has not done is not so. The discouragements and restraints on our commerce remain as he found them.

If the British Orders in Council were a cause for declaring war, are they a cause at this time for continuing it? Sir, the Orders were revoked about the time we made the war, and though much has been said about conditions annexed to the repeal, rendering it unacceptable to this country, yet the Administration understand it differently. The President, in his Message at the commencement of this session, admits that the repeal was "susceptible of explanations meeting the views of this Government." This cause of war has therefore vanished.

Impressment of Seamen.—The injury done to our seamen under the British practice of impressment, was also made a cause of the war, and to the eye, at least, it is the only one which now remains.

Mr. Chairman, the discussion of this subject is attended with adventitious difficulties, growing out of the times and the state of the country. The public mind, in some sections of the Union, is in such a feverish state on this account, from tales oft told of bondage, worse than negro slavery, and of condemnation without trial, that the person who is willing to "hear the other party," is at once branded with foreign partialities, and threatened with the trial by mob. Besides, sir, it is intimated that a negotiation is to be had, or may possibly be attempted, which may be affected by an open discussion of the topic. In point of duty, I feel myself called upon to take some notice of the subject, but my view of it will be less perfect than in a different situation I should think desirable.

The President, in the war Message, thus introduces the subject: "British cruisers have been in the continued practice of violating the American flag on the great highway of nations, and of seizing and carrying off persons sailing under it; not in the exercise of a belligerent right, founded on the law of nations against an enemy, but of a municipal prerogative over British subjects." As this does not present the case in its true light, I shall, for the purpose of fairly bringing to view the conflicting claims of the two nations, give you an extract from the letter of Mr. Madison to Mr. Monroe, of the 5th of January, 1804, containing instructions for a treaty with Great Britain. "With this exception, (persons in the military service of an enemy) we consider 'a neutral flag on the high seas, as a safeguard to those sailing under it. Great Britain, on the contrary, asserts a right to search for and seize her own subjects; and under that cover, as cannot but happen, are often seized and taken off, citizens of the United States, and citizens or subjects of other neutral countries, navigating the high seas, under the protection of the American flag.'

The claim, then, on the part of the British is, that in time of war they have a right to enter neutral merchant vessels on the high seas, to search for and seize their subjects, being seamen. On our part it is, that on the high seas the flag shall cover and protect all sailing under it, whether British subjects or American citizens. These are distinctly the claims of right on the part of the two nations, and I shall so consider them, without regard to practice apart from right.

One or two remarks, sir, before I enter upon the subject. The first is, that I do not mean to moot the point, relative to the rights of our naturalized citizens, or the extent of our duties towards them. But this I will say, that I am willing to give them all the protection which the situation of the country and its true interests will justify. I know that the unruly passions and the meddling dispositions, of some foreigners, have raised prejudices in the minds of many persons against all foreigners. But I know, also, and I speak without reference to political opinions or prejudices, that among our naturalized citizens are to be found men, and many men, too, of great worth and respectability, and who are extensively useful to the country. These men have my good will, and it is certainly my wish, that they should be fostered and protected, as far as it can be done, without putting at hazard the great interests and the permanent welfare of the country. But, sir, to this class of our citizens, the claim that they are to be protected on the high seas by our flag, is really of little importance. Our claim never was, and I am sure never will be, that they are to be protected, if they put themselves within the power of their former Sovereign, by going to his ports, or placing themselves on his territories. And yet such is the state of the commerce of the world, that it can scarcely happen in a mercantile voyage, in this or the other hemisphere, that the vessel will not at some time be in a British port, and the crew on British ground; our right of flag will not then save our adopted citizens from impressment. For the slight benefit, therefore, to our naturalized citizens, which can arise under our claim, if established, I am sure the well meaning and reasonable part of them will not ask the country to continue the war on their account.

Another remark which I wish to make is, that I am most decidedly the friend, nay, sir, if you please, the partisan, of the seamen of the country. I have no doubt that this nation is destined to be a great maritime power; and that, in times not very far distant, we are to owe our prosperity, as a commercial people, and possibly, under Providence, our security, to our seamen. I am therefore a friend to "seamen's rights," properly understood and fairly enforced; but this shall not blind me to the rights of others. Besides, in a war to be carried on for seamen alone, and that, too, on the abstract question of the right of flag, I can see great danger to the seamen in their just claims to protection; and I must beg their friends, in and out of this House, to reflect before they act. As surely as the war is continued on this ground alone, so surely will seamen become unpopular, and their rights be neglected. When the evils of the war press upon the country, and press they will; when the many lives sacrificed, and the countless millions expended, shall be brought to view, is it not to be apprehended that seamen and their claims will be remembered, only as the causes of the scenes of expense and blood through which we are to pass? It is not dealing fairly with our seamen, to make them the scape-goats of this war.

The British then claim the right, in time of war, to take their seamen out of neutral merchant vessels on the high seas.

Is this claim a novel one? That the claim is novel, is certainly intimated by the Committee of Foreign Relations, when they say that the impressment of which we complain, is "a practice which has been unceasingly maintained by Great Britain in the wars to which she has been a party since our Revolution." Indeed it has been most roundly asserted, and by many it is believed, that the British claim was made for the first time after our war; that it originated in views hostile to our commerce and maritime rights; and that in practice it is only brought to bear upon us. In truth, however, whatever may be the justice of the claim, it is not a recent one. It has, in a greater or less degree, been practised on in all the wars in which England has been engaged for the two last centuries.

The instructions to armed ships are not frequently made public; but it so happens, that we have in print an instruction on this very point, given in 1646, by the Earl of Northumberland, Lord High Admiral of England, to Sir John Pennington, which goes beyond the present claim. "As you meet with any men of war, merchants, or other ships, belonging to any foreign Prince or State in any road where you, or any of His Majesty's fleet, may happen to come, you are to send to see whether there be any of His Majesty's subjects on board; and if any seamen, gunners, pilots, or marines, (whether English, Scotch, or Irish,) be found on board, you are to cause such of His Majesty's subjects to be taken forth, and so disposed of as they shall be forthcoming, to answer their contempt of His Majesty's proclamation in that kind." These instructions were modified in the reign of Charles the Second, so as to exclude public armed vessels, and with this modification they have come down to the present times. If it were at all necessary to the purposes of my argument, I might show that this right has been exercised both towards France and Holland, long before we had existence as a nation. Their vessels have been searched, and British seamen taken from them. But enough has been said to prove that that the claim, if unjust, is not novel.

Is the claim peculiar to the British? I am justified in saying, that this claim, in time of war, to search for and seize seamen in neutral merchant vessels, on the high seas, has been made and exercised by every maritime nation in Europe. To be more particular—I assert, and stand ready to prove, that it has been made and enforced by France as well as England, and is so now. It would be a waste of time to go very much at large into the French usages on this subject. I propose to do little more than to refer to one or two French ordinances, and then show from our State papers their practical application to us.

By the French laws, and they are ancient laws, the seamen of the country are all classed, and enrolled, and licensed. In 1784, an edict was made which is still in force, declaring, that any classed seaman, who shall, in time of peace, be found serving in foreign ships, shall be sentenced to fifteen days' confinement, and reduced to the lowest wages, and serve two years extraordinary at the lowest rate; but those who, in time of war, shall be arrested in foreign ships, or passing into foreign countries, shall be sentenced to three years service in the galleys. Under the authority of this, and similar ordinances, the French have taken their seamen out of our vessels, and in some instances our seamen with them.

Mr. Chairman, the first proof relative to the French practice which I shall lay before the Committee, is the impressment document of January last, known to the American people as the 6,057 document. The Secretary of State, Mr. Monroe, at the close of the introductory report, says, "it is equally impossible, from the want of precise returns, to make an accurate report of the names of number of citizens of the United States, who have been compelled to enter into the French service, or are held in captivity under the authority of that Government, whether taken from vessels captured on the high seas, or seized in rivers, ports, or harbors; the names of a few only, greatly below the number believed to be so detained, being within the knowledge of this Department. A detail therefore is not attempted, with respect to this part of the call of the House of Representatives." Yes, sir, it is known to the Administration, that some of our citizens have been compelled to enter into the service of the French Emperor, while others are held in captivity by him. Ask, however, for their names, and you have for answer, that all the persons detained are not known to the Government, and therefore it cannot be material that you should have the names of any. Say to gentlemen, here is a case of American rights violated, and you will be told, that the injury, in practice, is not of sufficient importance to justify strong measures against the French Government. Be it so. But attempt to prove to the same gentlemen, that the practical operation of British blockades and Orders in Council, is not such as to require war, you will then hear, that it is necessary to fight about the principle.

I have one other paper to lay before the Committee, on this subject. For some years back, the information about French impressments has been general and vague, or altogether withheld. Formerly this was otherwise. In a report respecting the impressment of seamen in 1797, made by the Secretary of State to this House, on the 27th of February, 1798, we have the names of upwards of twenty American citizens, taken out of American vessels, on the high seas, by French privateers. We have more, sir. This same report states, that two French seamen named Lewis had been impressed from on board the American ship Bruseis, by a French Commodore's ship; that Francis Gibbons, a native of France, but married and resident at New London, in Connecticut, was impressed from the American ship Edward, at Rochefort, by authority of the French Republic, and put on board a French ship of war; and that Henry Doughty, an American, was impressed at sea, from the American brig Elsa, by the French frigates Lapancey and Thetis. I could instance other cases, but these are sufficient to show, that neither the claim nor the exercise of it is peculiar to the British.

It is a claim altogether unsupported by reason. As I understand the nations who contend for this right to seize their seamen, it is founded on the principle of national law, which gives to every Government a right to the service of its subjects in time of war. I meddle not, sir, with the question, who is or who is not a subject; but as long as a person is a subject, and owes allegiance, and may demand protection, so long has the community a claim on him, when the country is in distress or danger. And this, not by any municipal regulation, properly so called, but by general law. It is a right necessarily growing out of a state of society.

If this is a right, then there must be a remedy also. To allow that a Sovereign has a claim to the services of his subject, is necessarily to admit, that he has power in some way to enforce such claim. As to sailors, the right is a dead letter, unless search and seizure on board neutral merchantmen is allowed. In every war, if the principle is established, that the flag shall protect all sailing under it, seamen would be drawn from the country and its service into neutral employ. High wages, with security against the hazards and dangers of war, would overbalance considerations of general duty. Let it be known to the seamen of England or of France, that they may safely sail under the American flag during the existing war, and my word for it, they will come to you, to the extent of your ability to employ them.

In the case of a national ship, the seaman enters under the Government; and it is therefore fair to presume, and ought to be presumed, that there is no violation of right, or breach of duty. If a seaman of a belligerent, or a deserter, is employed, the comity of nations, and the respect due to Governments, make a request for a discharge or delivery necessary. But in this case, if the demand is refused, a national right is violated, and it becomes a legitimate cause of war. Not so with a merchant vessel. The Sovereign is not concerned with the crew or the voyage. No duty exists not to employ foreigners. If the commander refuses to surrender any one of his crew, although he is the subject of the demanding nation, and even a deserter, the Government is not concerned. The refusal is no cause of war. Seizure is therefore the only remedy. It is, sir, unnecessary to view the subject in all its bearings; what has been said was intended merely to show that there are some grounds for the claim.

Is it our real interest to oppose this claim?—in other words, would it be a substantial and permanent benefit to this country, to establish the principle, that the flag should in all cases cover and protect the person? To question this, may seem strange to gentlemen; and yet, sir, after much reflection, I have almost brought myself to believe, that it would neither comport with the interest of our own seamen, nor with that of the nation, to have the right of flag, as we are made to contend for it, inserted in the law of nations.

The recent French doctrine, that the flag shall cover the property, to whomsoever it may belong, like this, that the flag shall protect the person, had at one time many advocates in this country, and there are not wanting some, even at this day, who think it altogether favorable to us. Yet, sir, our experience is sufficient to satisfy any practical man, that it is our interest to adhere to the old rule on this subject. In peace it has been the horn of plenty, which has poured riches into the country. When the French colonists could no longer cover their property by neutral flags, they were driven in consequence to sell to our merchants. All the profits on the European sale, and it was certainly great, became ours, and the ship-owners had the advantages of a double freight, as the merchant was enabled to fill the vessel in, as well as out. If the colonists could have sent their property home without danger of capture, they would have done it. The profit to the merchant would have been lost, and the ship-owner would have had an outward freight only.

In war, sir, we find the old doctrine equally necessary to us. If Great Britain is vulnerable to us, it is essentially in her commerce with her colonies and allies in this hemisphere, which passing by our door, is thrown in our way. But if the flag is to give a character to the property, all she has to do, is to borrow a Spanish or Portuguese vessel, and her commerce is placed beyond our grasp or power. We are too apt to form general conclusions from individual cases, and to suffer our judgment to be misled by fine speculations, which favor our wishes. This religion of the flag, has many charms for those who will not suffer themselves to think of consequences; when, however, it is viewed with the lights of experience, the charm vanishes. We then see the advantage and necessity of old rules, and are willing to be regulated by them. I have said, sir, the right of flag does not appear calculated to promote the real interests of our own seamen. The interest of the sailor is to have good wages, and constant employment; and he is sure with us to have both the one and the other, if foreign seamen do not interfere with him. If foreigners are admitted to be covered and protected by our flag, it must follow, from the low wages in Great Britain, and the liability to impressment, that English sailors will come in shoals to this country. They will by this competition lessen the wages of our native sailors, if they do not absolutely drive them from the ocean, for want of employment.

Mr. Chairman, it may seem absurd to say, that the security of the great body of our seamen has been found in the British practice of impressment, with all its evils; and yet there is some foundation for such an opinion. Our own regulations place all seamen, native and foreign, on the same footing, and allow them equal privileges. Is it not then fair to infer, that, but for the danger of being impressed by their own nation, we should have been overrun by British sailors, to the great injury of our own sailors? In truth, sir, in principle, the operation of the British claim is favorable to American seamen. All they require is, a regulation of the practice, so as to furnish them with a reasonable security against impressment.

In a national point of view, the right claimed by the European maritime nations, appears all-important to this country; and I venture to predict, that those who witness the close of the next half century, will see us practising on this very claim, and, if necessary, fighting for it. There can be no doubt, sir, that we are to be a great maritime Power, as we are already a great commercial nation. Indeed, to continue the latter, we must become the former. Our future wars will be maritime wars. The business of the Canadas and the Floridas, according to the common course of events, will settle itself, and if we meet a foe, it must be on the ocean.

To carry on a maritime war, we must have ships; but ships without seamen to navigate and fight them, will be useless. It will, therefore, be absolutely necessary to settle on some principle which will give us as much command over our seamen, on their element, as we have over our landmen on shore. Without meaning to intimate that we will or ought to resort to the European practice of impressment, yet, when we seriously determine on having a navy, we shall find it necessary to look to some regulation which will bring our sailors within the country, in every war, so as to make it their interest to go into our service. We shall have no means to prevent their accepting the bribes of neutrals, high wages, and safe employment, but by seizing them, when found sailing under neutral flags, after they shall be recalled.

If, sir, there is anything in this course of reflection, (and I do think there is,) then, so far from being bound in duty to the nation or to our seamen, to continue the war with Great Britain on the abstract question of right, we are ourselves interested in preserving the very right claimed by that nation. What we have to contend for, is, in reality, that the practice by the British, and all other nations, should be so regulated as to afford to our seamen a reasonable degree of security; for, as to perfect and absolute security, their habits, and the nature and scene of their employment, render that impossible. Their service will of course bring them, and that frequently, within the British territories, where our doctrine of the religion of the flag will not protect them. In point of fact, a considerable number of the impressments reported to us took place on British ground, and not on the high seas.

If this right, or claim of right, however, is made a mere pretext by any nation to seize and detain our seamen, I am willing to allow that it would be a cause of war. But, even in this case, war ought not to be waged until we have done our duty to our seamen and the offending nation, by making suitable regulations to prevent the employment of the seamen of such nation. Have we done this, as respects Great Britain? Perhaps some such regulation is to be found in the law which defines what vessel is an American vessel, and which, as such, is entitled to hoist our flag. Look at it, sir. According to the act of December, 1792, an American ship is one wholly owned by an American citizen, and commanded by a person also a citizen. The crew may be all foreigners—all Englishmen, if you please—all English deserters. In this, therefore, we find no security to the British Government.

But, we have also the law of May, 1796, which provides, that the collectors may register seamen calling themselves American, and grant certificates of citizenship. Out of this law, it is presumed, has grown the practice of granting protections, as they are called—papers procured from notaries and magistrates, oftentimes on the most barefaced perjuries, and always considered as a species of negotiable property for value received. Sir, these protections, in their abuse, are a scandal to the nation. It has made false swearing an employment, and the granting of false papers a business. The price of such a paper is as well known in the great seaport towns as is that of your stocks. All ages and complexions and tongues may have this badge of citizenship, by paying the charges in such cases provided. If this, however, was not so; if protections were only granted to real Americans; it is difficult to see how this is to prevent the employment of British sailors. It is not necessary that the persons navigating an American vessel should have them.

This act of ours was presented to the British Government, by Mr King, in January, 1797, and Lord Grenville, on the 27th of March following, in a manner highly conciliatory, and certainly with much force, stated specific objections to the law. The Executive, when, in July last, he answered the call of the Senate, for papers relative to impressments, omitted this letter of Lord Grenville, but he gives a letter from the then Secretary of State, to our Minister at the British Court, of the third of October, 1797, in which the force of the objections seems to be admitted. "Lord Grenville's observations on the act of Congress for the relief and protection of American seamen, present difficulties which demand consideration at the ensuing session." Nothing was, however, done at that or any future session. In truth, we have done nothing to prevent the employment of British seamen in our public or private ships; and they are to be found in both. And yet, with this fact staring us in the face, we are called upon to say that the war is altogether just on our part!

It will probably be urged that the British practice under this claim, in its application to us, was sufficient to prove that the reclamation of their seamen was not so much the object of the British Government, as the seizure of our seafaring citizens; that it had become so outrageous as not only to justify, but to require war. Without, sir, meaning to excuse or to palliate the taking even the cabin boy, if done knowingly and wittingly; and being willing to admit, that about the period of the attack on the Chesapeake, we had much and serious cause to complain on the subject, I must be permitted to say that I have not evidence to satisfy me, that when we declared war, the practice of the British was such as to prove that the claim on their part was a mere pretext to take our sailors. In truth, I believe, if the Administration have not deceived themselves on this subject, that they have attempted a gross deception on the public.

The instructions given at this day, by the British Admiralty to a naval commander, on this subject, directs him, "when he meets with any foreign ship or vessel, to send a lieutenant to inquire whether there may be on board of her any seamen who are the subjects of His Majesty; and if there be to demand them, provided it does not distress the ship: he is to demand their wages up to the day; but he is to do this without detaining the vessel longer than shall be necessary, or offering any violence to, or in any way ill-treating the master or his crew." Mr. Monroe may perhaps recognise in this, the instructions shown to him after his arrangement, and of which he declared himself satisfied; but whether he does or not, it must be conceded that it provides for a moderate exercise of the right. The person who is to make the search is an officer of some standing; he is only to take seamen who are British subjects, excluding thereby, not merely our citizens, but all foreigners; and he is not to take even British seamen, if, by it, he destroys the crew, or endangers the vessel. Allowing the right to exist, it is difficult more fairly to regulate its exercise.

But it may be urged that the practice of the British commanders does not correspond with these instructions; that they search and seize at large, according to their will and pleasure. I know, sir, that the habits and education of a military man, not unfrequently make him act as if power and right meant the same thing; and I, therefore, have no doubt that there have been abuses. But I do most conscientiously believe that these abuses have been greatly magnified, and are, even by the well meaning, vastly overrated. I am aware that I shall be referred to the impressment document of last session. This document, sir, is so illy understood, and has been the source of so much misrepresentation, that I must be allowed slightly to review it.

JANUARY, 1813.

The Secretary, in the report says, that the list transmitted had been received from our agent at London, and "contains the names of American seamen and citizens who have been impressed and held in bondage in His Britannic Majesty's ships of war, for the several quarters of 1809 and 1810." The list is headed, "A return or list of American seamen and citizens who have been impressed and held on board of His Britannic Majesty's ships of war, from 1st of April to the 30th of June, inclusively," and so of the other quarters. Now the plain meaning of this is, if any meaning it has, that the persons whose names were thus sent to us were impressed and made to serve on board British armed ships, at some period in the years 1809 and 1810. Indeed, this has been so stated in this House, and in the Administration prints. And yet the most superficial examination will show that this is not true. Let me read to you one or two names: "4868. David Wiley." In the column of the "result of applications and remarks," we have this explanation of his case: "Impressed on shore at New Brunswick, and taken on board the Plumper, was detained two days, when the commander put him on board a vessel bound to Aberdeen, from thence worked his passage to London, and appeared at this office 29th August, 1805; is evidently an American. Discharged." Here, then, we have a man who was not on board a British ship in 1809, and whose "bondage" did not probably continue more than two days.

Again, "4936. Richard Butler, representing himself of Petersburg, Pennsylvania. Impressed in 1797 at the Cape of Good Hope, from the Mercury of Baltimore, and detained on board the Garland." Remark. "Remained on board the Garland two months, then draughted to the Tremendous, in which he served two and a half years, was then discharged; has never received his wages or prize-money; says he was well used on board both ships. Was discharged as an American citizen at the Cape of Good Hope; his pay and prize-money lists were given to the consul at the Cape. Discharged." This man, therefore, according to the statement of our Consul, so far from having been impressed and held on board a British ship in 1809, had been impressed in 1797, and discharged in 1799. I might, sir, give you many other cases equally strong, but these are sufficient to prove that, by design or mistake, the document is wrongly headed; that the persons named in the list were not all on board British ships in 1809 and 1810; and, therefore, that, in its general results, it does not show the state of the British practice in those years.

In truth, the list is nothing more than the return of the names of persons who, within the year, had applied to Mr. Lyman, our Consul and agent for seamen, for protections against future, or for his aid in getting released from present impressment. It was his duty, as I do not doubt it was made his interest, to receive all applications, and when necessary, to lay them before the proper British authority. Jew and Greek, Turk and Christian, the growth of our own soil, and the produce of other countries, all threw themselves upon Mr. Lyman, and he, laboring in his vocation, granted patents of citizenship, or made his claim on the British Admiralty. Sir, there is not a man who, in practice or by inquiry, has made himself acquainted with the manner in which this business is transacted, but knows that many foreigners who never saw this country, or sailed under its flag, have attempted, by application to our agents abroad, to shield themselves against British impressment. The Secretary of State, Mr. Monroe, needs no information on this subject, having himself resided in London as our Minister. It was the duty of our agent to send home some account of his proceedings, and I have no objection to his making such a list as we have before us. But I do object to its being palmed on the American nation as a true history of British impressments affecting our people and nation. I pray you look at this list. In the year commencing in April, 1809, and ending in March, 1810, we have about nine hundred and forty names; and of these, about seven hundred are given with blanks in the columns for the "towns and States of which they represent themselves to be citizens"—"when impressed"—"where impressed"—"ships from whence taken"—"nations"—"masters." The time and the result of the application are only given. And from these entries in Mr. Lyman's book you are called upon to admit that the applicant was an American, and that he was impressed in the year 1809 by the British, on the high seas, out of an American vessel. Really, this is asking too much.

Mr. Chairman, I have examined the list from April, 1809, to April, 1810, with great attention, for the purpose of ascertaining the number of impressments which took place in that year, and I will now make to you one or two statements, which may cast some light on the subject of the British practice. The number which, by the list, appears to have been impressed in that year, is one hundred. It will be understood that in this number I do not include those whose names are carried out in blank, as has been stated. It is uncertain whether such persons ever were impressed; and, at all events, it is fair to presume, that their service on board British ships had commenced before 1809, or otherwise there could be no difficulty in giving dates. Of the one hundred, seventy-six were discharged, and six had deserted, leaving less than twenty to be accounted for.

Another result: Of the persons thus taken, fifty-seven were impressed on shore, and forty-three at sea. Again: Thirty of these seamen, when impressed, made part of the crews of British vessels, and thirty-four American vessels; and of the thirty-four, twelve were taken on land; leaving about twenty-two persons taken from American vessels on the high seas. It is possible, sir, that in these statements I may not be perfectly accurate; I am certain, however that I am substantially so.

I do not mean to represent that this is a full account of all the impressments which took place in 1809; on the contrary, I admit that it is not. Many impressments were certainly made of persons undeniably British subjects, who would scarcely think of applying to Mr. Lyman, and will not, therefore, be found in his book. Many persons, also, having a right to his interference, were not then known to him. My object in making these explanations, was to show that the 6,057 document does not furnish such strong evidence of British aggression as has been supposed.

The number of our seamen impressed by the British has been so variously represented, that I have, from motives of curiosity as well as duty, been desirous to arrive at something like a reasonable certainty on the subject. We hear of ten, twenty, nay, forty thousand of our citizens, confined in the floating dungeons of Great Britain, fighting her battles against their will. The evidence of this, however, is only to be found in the imagination of gentlemen. It is the old story over again, of the "six men in buckram." In part representing the greatest commercial State in the Union, it may be expected that I have some personal knowledge on this subject, but indeed I have none such to give. Is there not in this some proof that the evil has been magnified? I have sought for information in quarters where only it is to be found, among the shipping merchants and ship owners of the country. I will now furnish you with the opinion of an intelligent gentleman from Marblehead, whose means of information are ample, and whose veracity will not be doubted. I mean my friend from Massachusetts, who sits before me, (MR. REED.) He has favored me with this statement:

"In answer to your inquiry relative to the seamen of Marblehead, I have to remark that the average shipping of that port, for the last twenty years, may be estimated at about 19,000 tons, of which it is fair to calculate ten thousand tons were employed in foreign commerce, and the residue in the fisheries and in the coasting trade. Allowing six men to every hundred tons, which is the usual estimate, it gives an average of eleven hundred and seventy-six seamen in all, and six hundred in our foreign trade, each year; the number of seamen, therefore, employed from Marblehead for the last twenty years, must have been considerable, say five thousand. I have resided at that place nearly twenty years, and, during the greater part of the time, have been actively engaged in commerce. According to my own recollection, aided by that of others who have the best means of information, I do not believe that twenty of the seamen of Marblehead, native or naturalized, have been impressed by the British within the twenty years, and it is not known that one has been demanded without being released."

As there is no reason to suppose that Marblehead has been more fortunate with respect to impressments than other places, we have here something whereby to form an estimate of the number of our seamen taken by the British. My own conviction is, that the American seamen, impressed and held by the British, at the commencement of this war, did not much exceed five hundred in all, and certainly did not amount to one thousand. Permit me, sir, to mention one circumstance which speaks loudly on this subject. If the practice of impressment had been as outrageous as has been represented, it must have fallen with great force on the Eastern States, as it is there the mass of our seamen are found. We are then to expect much feeling and passion on this account. The war must be popular when the cause of it is brought home to every man's door. No such thing, sir. The war is confessedly odious there. It is in States where seamen never grew that the war has its strongest advocates. It is there that you principally find the dark pictures of sailors' sufferings, and hear the loud and long appeals to the sympathies and passions of the people about seamen's rights and seamen's injuries.

One inquiry more, Mr. Chairman, on the subject of impressment, and I have done with it. The President, in his war Message, says, that no pretext should be left for a continuance of the practice; "the British Government was formally assured of the readiness of the United States to enter into arrangements, such as could not be rejected, if the recovery of British subjects were the real and sole object. The communication passed without effect." The Committee of Foreign Relations are more direct still: "Its continuance (the practice of impressment) is the more unjustifiable, because the United States have repeatedly proposed to the British Government an arrangement which would secure to it the control of its own people. An exemption of the citizens of the United States from this degrading oppression, and their flag from violation, is all they have sought." In these passages we have two distinct propositions: that reasonable offers for an adjustment of this difficult and delicate subject have been proffered by the Government, meaning surely the Administration which commenced, and are willing to carry on the war on this account; and that the British Government would listen to no terms, however well calculated to secure to it the service of its own seamen. Is all this true? Is it true that the present Executive has attempted to negotiate with Great Britain on this subject; that he has communicated to the British Government his willingness and his wish to come to an arrangement, which, while it afforded safety to our seamen, would secure to that country the services of its seamen? What has been done by him is soon told, and ought to be known. The only measure which has come before the public looking towards an accommodation, by him, is to be found in the letter from Secretary Smith to Mr. Pinkney, of the 20th January, 1810, in which the latter is directed to resume the negotiation with the British Government, under the power which had been given to Mr. Monroe and himself. In his discussions, he was to be regulated by the instructions which had been given to them. It is added, "it is, however, not intended that you should commence this negotiation until the requisite satisfaction shall have been made in the affair of the Chesapeake." The affair of the Chesapeake, we all know, was not settled until within a short time before the war was declared, and long after the return of Mr. Pinkney to this country. It follows that Mr. Pinkney could not, as most certainly he did not, commence a negotiation. No terms have been offered, no arrangement has been attempted to be effected by the present Executive. He cannot say that his "communications passed without effect," as in fact he made none. And yet, by him, we are carried into a war on this account.

The President may, however, deem his Administration so far identified with that of his immediate predecessor, as to entitle him to the benefit of the offers formerly made. Be it so. We will then examine the sum and value of the propositions of Mr. Jefferson. The instructions to Messieurs Monroe and Pinkney, are to be found in a letter to them from Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, of the 17th of May, 1806, in which they are referred to the instructions to Mr. Monroe, of the 5th of January, 1804, as applicable to a great proportion of the matters committed to their joint negotiation, and as their guide. In the instructions, therefore, of 1804, we are to find the arrangement "repeatedly proposed to the British Government," "which would secure to it the control of its own people."

The instructions of January 5, 1804, were also drawn by Mr. Madison, in his capacity of Secretary of State, and contain the plan of a convention on the subject of seamen, with some other matters, giving the proposal and the ultimatum. The first article provides, that no person shall be demanded or taken at sea, out of a ship of one nation, by the armed ships of the other; unless he is liable to be so taken according to the laws of nations; and not then, if he makes part of the crew. In the observations on the plan, Mr. Madison asserts, and reasons on, the right of flag, and the article is drawn with a view to our claim, and to prevent search and seizure at sea. The eighth article provides that no refuge shall be given to persons deserting from a vessel, making part of the crew of such vessel; and the eleventh article provides, that "each party will prohibit its citizens or subjects from clandestinely carrying away, from the territories or dominions of the other, any seamen or soldiers belonging to such other party." These articles embrace every part of the convention which relates to seamen. In them, therefore, are to be found, if anywhere, the arrangement said to have been repeatedly proposed to the British Government. I shall not examine how far such an arrangement was desirable to this country; but did it secure to England the control of its own people, the recovery of its own subjects?

In this plan we find no provision against the employment of British seamen, even deserters. Those already in the country might plainly go into our service, and those who might subsequently reach our shores were safe when our flag should be waving over their heads. Deserters, it is true, were to be given up; but how could this be done, when they were on the high seas, or had embarked in foreign voyages? The convention, as proposed, will be found, when examined, not to secure to Great Britain the service of her seamen, or the return of her subjects.

Is it true that the British Government would listen to no terms, that they have refused to negotiate on this subject? Sir, it is not true. Lord Grenville, in his letter to Mr. King, of the 27th of March, 1797, which I have already mentioned, uses these expressions: "If it were possible at once to find an obvious and indisputable mode of ascertaining whether a seamen is really a subject of His Majesty's dominions, or a citizen of the United States, certainly the King's Government would not hesitate to accede to any regulations for applying that rule, in the easiest, most expeditious, and most effectual manner." After stating his objections to our act for the relief and protection of American seamen, he goes on to say, "for the reasons which I have here stated, the force of which I am confident no candid mind can dispute, I am under the necessity of declining, on the part of His Majesty's Government, to accede to the propositions contained in your letter. If any other proposals can be made, less liable to objection, they will be considered with candor and liberality. It is not expected, that on so difficult and delicate a business, arrangements can at once be brought forward, wholly free from all objections, or such as to supersede the necessity of frequent revision, improvement, and addition, in order to meet the different means of evasion that may be resorted to; but it is certainly not too much to ask, that the rules adopted in the first instance, shall at least afford some security against the most extensive and the most dangerous consequences to the maritime power and safety of Great Britain."

Sir, I cannot but admire the force and dignity of the letter of which I have read part. The importance of the subject to both nations is fairly admitted, and a solicitude is evinced for the adoption of some regulation which would afford security to each. A distinct avowal is made, that the British Government do not want our seamen, if they can be left in possession of their own. And a suggestion is added, that a perfect arrangement is not to be expected on the first attempt. Difficulties will arise in practice in any settlement of this business. All that is wanted is a point to start from, and a disposition in both Governments to deal fairly and justly. I am not afraid to assert, that if the arrangement of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, in 1806, had been adopted with this spirit, we should now have thoughts of impressments merely as an evil which once existed.

But, Mr. Chairman, to come nearer to the present times. In the letter from Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Mr. Madison, of the 11th of September, 1806, it is stated that the British Commissioners pressed with much zeal, "a provision, that the persons, composing the crews of such ships, should be furnished with authentic documents of citizenship, the nature, and form of ' which should be settled by treaty ; that these documents should completely protect those to whom they related ; but that, subject to such protections, the ships of war of Great Britain should continue to visit and impress on the main ocean as heretofore." This provision was rejected by our Ministers.

I will not say that such a regulation ought to have been adopted ; but I will say, that the proposition proves, that the English Government was anxious to adjust this difference ; and it proves further, that the great object of the British was the recovering of their own citizens.

The letter of the 11th November, 1806, from Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Mr. Madison, gives the history of the negotiation which led to the celebrated arrangement. Permit me to furnish you with one or two extracts from the letter, explanatory of the views and feelings of the British Government. "At our meeting the next day, the British Commissioners stated explicitly, but in a very conciliatory manner, that it was not in their power to adopt an article in the spirit of our project ; that the Board of Admiralty had been consulted on the subject, as had also been the Crown officers in Doctors' Commons, who united all without exception, in the opinion, that the right of their Government in the case in question was well founded, and ought not to be relinquished. They added, that, under such circumstances, the relinquishment of it was a measure which the Government could not adopt, without taking upon itself a responsibility which no Ministry would be willing to meet, however pressing the emergency might be. They presented to us, at the same time, a counter-project, which they intimated they did in obedience to the instructions from their Government. The British Commissioners, after supporting with great force, but with candor, the claim of their Government, assured us that it was willing to do anything in its power, to satisfy the United States on the ground of complaint, which might be done without a relinquishment of their claim."

The amount of this information is, that owing to the feelings, the views, and perhaps the prejudices, of the British people, no Ministry dare formally to relinquish the right claimed in the abstract ; but that everything short of this might be expected. We were not to look for a formal surrender of the right, but a regulation of the practice under it. Recollect, sir, that this is a declaration of the Fox and Grenville Ministry, always understood to have been most fair and most friendly to this country. Sir, I am satisfied, and so I am sure are a part at least of the Administration, that if this subject is ever settled, it will be by arrangements to prevent injuries to the two countries, in the employment and impressing of seamen, leaving the rights claimed on both sides untouched. Any attempt at negotiation with Great Britain, on the ground of an abandonment of her claim, is to my mind perfectly hopeless : and as long as I find the Administration insisting on this as indispensable, so long I must believe, that it is "within the scope of their policy" to continue the war, and to make it interminable.

Our Ministers, in their letter of the 11th of November, go on to state, that at their request the British Commissioners communicated to them a note, which was to accompany and to give character to the arrangement. The note declares, that the British Government "had not felt itself prepared to disclaim or derogate from a right which has ever been uniformly and generally maintained, and in the exercise of which the security of the British navy may be essentially involved ; more especially, in a conjuncture when they were engaged in war, which enforces the necessity of the most vigilant attention to the preservation and supply of the naval force of the kingdom ;" but, "that His Majesty's Government, actuated by an earnest desire to remove every cause of dissatisfaction, had directed His Majesty's Commissioners to give to Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, the most positive assurances, that instructions have been given, and shall be repeated, and enforced, for the observance of the greatest caution in the impressing of British seamen ; and that the greatest care shall be taken to preserve the citizens of the United States from any molestation or injury ; and that immediate and prompt redress shall be afforded upon any representation of injury sustained by them." Sir, this note, and the offers made by the British Commissioners, were satisfactory to our negotiators, and an arrangement was accordingly agreed upon. The American Cabinet, however, refused to accept it ; it was sent back, and the affair of the Chesapeake soon after closed the door on any further discussion. How unfair is it then to say, or to insinuate, that the British Government have refused to treat on this subject, or to listen to terms which would secure to it the service of its own seamen !

The opinions of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, respecting the merits and the effect of the arrangement, might be collected from the circumstances of their agreement to it, but it is not left to inference. In our public papers, they will be found to have expressed themselves with great clearness and decision. In the letter of November, they say, "When we take into view all that has passed on the subject, we are far from considering the note of the British Commissioners as a mere circumstance of form. We persuade ourselves, that by accepting the invitation which it gives, and proceeding in the negotiation, we shall place the business almost, if not altogether, on as good a footing as we should have done by treaty, had the project which we offered them been accepted. It merits attention, that everything is expressed in it that could be desired, except the relinquishment of the principle ; that, in speaking of impressments, the exercise of that act, on the high seas, is not mentioned, an omission which we know to have been intentional."

And in their letter to Mr. Madison, of the third of January, 1807, transmitting the treaty, the same gentlemen refer to the letter of November, as containing their opinion, that although the British Government did not feel itself at liberty to relinquish formally by treaty its claim to search our merchant vessels for British seamen, its practice would nevertheless be essentially, if not completely, abandoned. They go on to remark: "that opinion has been since confirmed, by frequent conferences on the subject with the British Commissioners, who have repeatedly assured us, that in their judgment, we were made as secure against the exercise of their pretension, by the policy which their Government had adopted, in regard to that very delicate and important question, as we could have been made by treaty. It is proper however to observe, that the good effect of this disposition, and its continuance, may depend in a great measure on the means which may be taken by the Congress hereafter, to check desertion from the British service."

You will scarcely think it possible, sir, that evidence can be furnished, which will more strongly negative the assertion, that the communications to the British Government, on the subject of impressment, passed without effect; and yet such evidence does exist. I will now call your attention to the letter from Mr. Monroe to Mr. Madison, of the 28th February, 1808, dated at Richmond. In this letter, Mr. Monroe says: "The idea entertained by the public is, that the rights of the United States were abandoned by the American Commissioners, in the late negotiation, and that their seamen were left, by tacit acquiescence, if not by formal renunciation, to depend for their safety on the mercy of the British cruisers. I have, on the contrary, always believed, and still do believe, that the ground on which that interest was placed, by the paper of the British Commissioners of November 8th, 1806, and the explanations which accompanied it, was both honorable and advantageous to the United States; and that it contained a concession in their favor, on the part of Great Britain, on the great principle in contestation, never before made, by a formal and obligatory act of the Government, which was highly favorable to their interest."

In a subsequent part of the same letter, Mr. Monroe, speaking of the note, and the omission in it of the terms "high seas," remarks, "it is impossible that those terms could have been omitted intentionally with our knowledge, for any purpose other than to admit a construction, that it was intended that impressments should be confined to the land. I do not mean to imply that it was understood, between the British Commissioners and us, that Great Britain should abandon the practice of impressment on the high seas altogether. I mean, however, distinctly to state, that it was understood, that the practice heretofore pursued by her should be abandoned, and that no impressment should be made on the high seas, under the obligation of that paper, except in cases of an extraordinary nature, to which no general prohibition against it could be construed fairly to extend."

Again, and it is the last reference I shall make to these documents, not because much and material matter does not remain, but because I am really tired of the subject. Mr. Monroe, in his Richmond letter, declares: "We were, therefore, decidedly of opinion, that the paper of the British Commissioners placed the interest of impressment on ground which it was both safe and honorable for the United States to admit; that, in short, it gave their Government the command of the subject for every necessary and useful purpose. Attached to the treaty, it was the basis or condition on which the treaty rested. Strong in its character in their favor on the great question of right, and admitting a favorable construction on others, it placed them on more elevated ground, in those respects, than they had held before."

The statements thus made by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, establish a few facts of great importance, which cannot be too generally known or too frequently repeated. Kept constantly in recollection, and applied as touchstones to offers which have been, or may be made, to the British Government, they will show the sincerity of the Administration, or their insincerity. They prove that the British will negotiate on the subject of seamen, inasmuch as they have done it. They prove that the British will come to an arrangement with us: for this, they have offered. And they prove that the British will accede to propositions relating to impressments, which are safe and honorable, and therefore satisfactory to this country; for this, we are told they did. But they prove, also, that no Ministry in England dare openly and avowedly relinquish the right of search, or recognise, to the extent demanded by us, the right of flag. The practice may be so regulated, and was offered to be so regulated, as to bring the claim into disuse. And what to us is a right claimed but not enforced? When I find the Administration dealing less in abstract propositions about seamen's rights and national honor, and attending to what is really to be desired and is known to be attainable, I shall believe in their pacific dispositions, and not till then.

From the time I first saw the arrangement made by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, with their account of the negotiation, and the explanatory statement of Mr. Monroe, I have believed, that the subject of seamen was placed by them on a safe and proper footing. And it has always been with me, feeling as I do for seamen and their rights, a matter of great regret that the arrangement was not agreed to here. A short experience would have satisfied us as to its practical operation. If by it our sailors were protected, a great good would have been gained. If otherwise, our claim for other terms could not have been resisted. The gentlemen, however, who negotiated the arrangement, have changed characters, and with it, it would seem, their views. They now make a part of the Administration, and, as such, feel themselves authorized to say, that the British Government have refused to settle the difference on suitable terms. They advised war, and require its continuance on this account. I am not to doubt, that some new light has led to this course; and it is possible, that with means of information, I may be induced to give up my opinion also. As yet, however, I have seen nothing which destroys the force of their reasoning.

I have now, sir, finished the remarks which I intended to make on the British claim and practice of impressment. We have for years past had so much idle declamation on the subject, that a dispassionate investigation of it appeared to me to be called for. In the course of these remarks, I have attempted to show that the claim was neither novel nor peculiar, and it is not wholly unsupported by reason; that our true interest calls more for a fair regulation of the practice than an abandonment of the rights; and that the conduct of the British, of late, has been such as to warrant an opinion, that an arrangement may be made, having for its object a proper regulation of the practice, leaving the rights of both nations, whatever they may be, untouched. Sir, with this view of the subject, it is not possible for me to consent to the adoption of measures, having for their object the further prosecution of the war offensively on our part; and I cannot, therefore, vote for the bill on your table. The war has not yet assumed a character. We have, indeed, added much, and are about to add more, to the public debt. Already a portion of our citizens are burdened with oppressive exactions in the form of duties, and heavy taxes are staring all in the face. But yet our homes and altars remain safe and unpolluted. Let us seize this moment to give the nation peace, and the people happiness. This is the appointed time, and if we do not improve it, I fear my country is to suffer in its prosperity and its institutions. For Heaven's sake, let us pause!

Mr. Chairman, I intended, when I first rose, to have made some observations on the effects and consequences of this war; and to have examined what the Administration is pleased to term its pacific advances; but I am really so exhausted that I have not the ability to go on, if the Committee had patience to attend to me. With respect to the advances, I will make but a single remark, and that is, that from the circumstances under which they were made, they were exactly calculated, if not intended, to produce the result we have witnessed. Sir, I have done.

Mr. MAÇON said after failing in his attempt to amend the bill, he had considered it of very little importance; indeed, in its present form, he was not anxious whether it passed or not; and he had intended not to have troubled the Committee on the subject, but the strange course which the debate had taken had called him up almost against his own consent. He could truly say that he would not have offered a word to the Committee, had not those who oppose the bill have brought into the discussion French influence, operating by a sort of magic on every act of the Executive. The conduct of the Executive had undergone the strictest scrutiny by these gentlemen, and their own arguments would, in his opinion, convince every impartial man, that it had been perfectly fair and upright to all foreign nations; the least attention to the documents, which have from time to time been published, would also convince every man of it, and satisfy all that the great object of the Government had been peace, and that peace was maintained until it could no longer be done without surrendering almost every national right worth preserving. Mr. M. said he would endeavor in his observations to follow the example which had been set the last two days: not to utter a word to wound the feelings of any one; nor would he refer to the documents, because every member possessed them, and they had been published for the information of the people; and he was sure that the Committee must be tired with hearing a sentence here, and a paragraph there, read from them. The true way to understand them was to read the whole. But he had never been in the practice of making many quotations from books or documents, and he thought it unnecessary to make any now. He was clearly of opinion that the gentlemen who were opposed to the Administration had the right to say whatever they thought of it, and to select the subject on which they would speak; and as they had made the selection, he hoped they would have an opportunity now of delivering their sentiments. He, however, regretted that they had selected this bill; because, of all the bills which may be brought before the House the present session, not one, he thought, would require despatch more than this. The loss of a day now may be the loss of the next campaign. He had expected that this general debate, which seems to include everything but the bill, would have been delayed until the loan should be under discussion.

The points made in the debate seem to be: impressment; the right to expatriate; the right to naturalize; and French influence; neither of which have any connexion with the bill, which is to raise troops for one year. Sir, said Mr. M., I will not retort a charge of British influence, and so balance one assertion against the other, because I do not believe that there is much of either in the nation; but if I was to say there was none, I should not say what I believe. People may honestly differ in opinion as to the effect which the success of England or France over the other might have on the interests of the United States, without being under the influence of either; and this, no doubt, is the case with thousands.

I will, before I proceed further, notice some of the observations made by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT.) If I have not understood him or any other gentleman correctly, I hope that I shall be corrected; because it is my sincere desire to state their sentiments fairly; and it is not always possible to take down their own words. He said, if there was any English influence, it was the influence of Locke and Sidney. As well might he have spoken of the influence of any other patriots who lived before us. Their influence will be respected wherever their works shall be read; but that sort of influence is not the influence of which we have heard so much, and which I intend hereafter to notice. He also mentioned the influence which drove the first settlers to Plymouth. Yes, sir, that influence was truly British, and that sort of influence Great Britain has been exercising ever since the first settlers, by their own industry and exertions, got into a situation to be useful to her; and that influence, or rather that persecution, compelled the first settlers of Carolina to leave the other provinces, and to settle a second time in the woods, and, as soon as they were able, to pay taxes. That same influence followed them, and made their condition much worse. It pursued the people in every part of the Continent, until they declared themselves independent; and, from that day to this, she has not treated the United States as she has treated other independent nations.

JANUARY, 1813.

H. OF R.

Mr. Chairman, I was astonished when the gentleman told us he was not a friend to standing armies; and, almost in the same breath, said that, at the last session, he voted for raising the twenty-five thousand men, and that he did not mean to go to war when he gave the vote. For what purpose, then, could they be wanted? Experience had already shown that the old establishment was quite sufficient in time of peace. Indeed, a very considerable part of that was raised soon after the affair of the Chesapeake, and under an expectation that war would follow, and not for a regular peace establishment.

The same gentleman told us, that impressment by the British Government was no new thing. This is certainly true as far as regards her own subjects, and from her own vessels; but the systematic impressment of foreigners from foreign ships, is a new thing; and that, too, when the men and the ships both belong to the same nation. That Government never attempted to impress Spaniards, Dutch, French, Swedes, or Danes, from vessels belonging to the same nation with the person; and it is this new doctrine, which operates solely on us, of which we complain. The question between us and England has nothing to do with the doctrine that free ships shall make free goods, or free men, if gentlemen please. And why draw that into the debate on the impressment of American citizens from American vessels? No law or precedent can be produced for this abominable and wicked practice. It was never attempted to be justified, notwithstanding impressment is no new thing with her. Every Sovereign, said the gentleman, has a right to the service of all his subjects in time of war. But this right is like some others which Sovereigns claim; it is without a remedy. Of what avail is the proclamation of the Prince Regent in this country, ordering the British subjects home? None. Many of them are still here, and, probably, will remain until the termination of the war, and the British Government will never dream of punishing one of them for disobedience. But, admit this right in Sovereigns to its fullest extent, and it does not give one Sovereign the right to impress the citizens or subjects of another; nor does it justify such an act; of course it does not touch the act of which we complain: that is, the impressing of American seamen from American vessels.

It is curious that, throughout this whole debate, there seems to have been drawn a distinction between the rights of a man who cultivates the soil, and of him that follows the sea, and that this distinction should have been drawn by those who claim to be the champions of commerce and of a navy, and who have told us that agriculture and commerce were inseparable. Ought it not, then, to follow, that the rights of those employed on land or water should also be inseparable? This strange doctrine, as was observed by the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) may dust the eye, but cannot stagger the understanding of any one.

The same gentleman said, that we had taken no measures to exclude British seamen from American vessels. For what purpose were protections given to American seamen? Surely to protect them against impressment, and to show that we had no desire to protect others; and what more ought to have been done, he did not tell us. I ask, did any nation ever do more? Besides, has not the United States, over and over again, offered to make an arrangement with England on the subject of sailors, which should be satisfactory to both, by securing to each the use of their own sailors? and has she not always refused to make any arrangement about them? And it may be fairly asked here, what measures Great Britain has taken to prevent her officers from impressing our seamen? None that I have heard of, and she is the aggressor. We have not injured her, while she has been impressing our sailors whenever she wanted and could find them. If the United States wanted sailors ever so much, they could not impress one of hers, and she knows this; and she would not suffer one of them to be impressed by any foreign Power; and we must determine to defend the rights of ours, or it will be idle to talk about navigation, commerce, and a navy. Indeed, if commerce and agriculture be inseparable, you must defend the rights of the persons concerned in both, or both must be injured. There are no neutrals able to carry our products to market, and if you will not protect your seamen they will not carry them.

It is worthy of remark, that, for twenty years past, the Government of the United States has been trying to settle the question of sailors with Great Britain, and that every attempt has failed, and that it is just now discovered that we have always begun wrong. My colleague (Mr. PEARSON) and the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PITKIN,) it appears, could settle this great question without much difficulty. If they can, I wish most sincerely they would. I am, however, apprehensive that they are a little mistaken, because General Washington, when President, having Major Pinckney, now Major General Pinckney, for Minister at London, tried without effect. Mr. Adams renewed it with Mr. King for Minister; Mr. Jefferson with Colonel Monroe, and Mr. Pinkney, now the Attorney General; and Mr. Madison, with the last named Pinckney. All these Presidents and Ministers, with the aid of every Cabinet, have failed. Every description of political opinion, with the greatest talents, have been employed and done nothing. At the end of twenty years we have gained nothing, and lost our labor; the question is as unsettled as ever; and we have been worsted in this way, that, while we were negotiating, they were impressing seamen.

We have been told by my colleague, that it is not the right, but the abuse of impressment of which we complain. It is true, sir, that we do not complain of Great Britain impressing her own subjects; she may do as she pleases with them, that is no concern of ours; all we ask of her is to keep her hands off our people; and we deny her right to impress American citizens; and if the abuse be the impressing them, of that we do complain, and not without just cause, because she has impressed many of them, and compelled them to fight her battles; and I have understood, after we had declared that war existed between her and us, that she detained those she had before impressed as prisoners of war, and this may be a part of her public law. Indeed we have heard much about universal law and public law, neither of which from the statements made seem to have much regard to right or justice, which ought to be the foundation of all law. One universal law seems to be, that Sovereigns can command their subjects to return home in case of war; another, that no person can expatriate himself; and Great Britain is no doubt willing to acknowledge another, by which she might impress sailors from all the world. As to the first, we need not trouble ourselves about it; and the second, the United States have not acknowledged; and we are now contending against impressment; and permit me here to observe, that the Republicans have always considered the impressment of citizens a more serious injury than the spoliation of property.

Is it not strange, sir, that some of the gentlemen should talk so much about public law, and that others should say there is now no public law, that the Emperor of France had destroyed it? That he and the British navy together have destroyed it, was certainly true; in the work of destruction they were united; force with them now constitutes reason, and they are each of them endeavoring to make their will a new law of nations; and if we suffer American citizens to be impressed from American vessels, to serve on board the British navy, we ought never to talk about law again. If ever there was a universal law, it was that of expatriation; the right to live in the country men preferred. In every age and in every nation men have left their native country and settled in others, and so expatriated themselves; and from the days of Joseph to the present time all nations have naturalized foreigners. If I am mistaken in this, I will thank any gentleman to put me right; but it would seem by the present debate that sailors had not the right to expatriate themselves which other men had; if this be true, it would follow that they could not be naturalized; and yet the Constitution of the United States does not except them from the general rule. I should really like to hear how a man lost his rights by going to sea.

But does Great Britain admit that she cannot naturalize? Certainly not; she naturalizes sailors by hundreds and thousands, while she denies that any of her subjects can expatriate themselves and be naturalized in another country. Nay, does she not naturalize by impressment, provided the person impressed serves a certain time on board her navy? And does not every Government in Europe naturalize? Prince Eugene was not a German; Marshal Saxe was not a Frenchman; and the celebrated Keith was not a Prussian: there is no end to examples which might be produced. The very man who now commands in Canada is believed to be the descendant of a naturalized Swiss. We all recollect D'Ivernois, who has written so much against this country and France; he was not only naturalized, but also knightified, if I may make a word; Dumont and others might be mentioned, but it is useless. We have examples enough in our own country: the Germans in Pennsylvania and the Carolinas, when provinces; the Greeks in Florida, when Great Britain owned that country. And has she not naturalized citizens of the United States in Canada; and is she not indebted to the Huguenots, whom she naturalized, for much of her prosperity? With respect to naturalization, she may be compared to a gulf, which takes everything in and lets nothing out. We have been told that France does not admit the right of expatriation. We all know that some years past she was very anxious to naturalize the fishermen of the United States; and very lately she has naturalized Irishmen: indeed, at one time, she seemed willing to naturalize or fraternize with all the world. The truth is, they are both willing to get subjects by naturalizing, but unwilling to lose one by expatriation. The Irish have gone into the service of almost every Government in Europe, and we have not been informed that the English Government punished them for it. But the sailors of all countries are poor, though liberal and generous, and it may be added almost friendless; they appear even to want friends on the other side of the House: their poverty and want of friends is no doubt the reason why the universal law, or public law, or some other law, forbids them the rights of expatriation and naturalization. But admit all we have heard about England and France not permitting their subjects to expatriate themselves, and it only proves that they have municipal laws to that effect, which it is impossible to execute; and their having laws on the subject shows plainly that they do not consider them deprived of the right by the law of nations. While on the subject of universal law, permit me to notice another which has not been mentioned, and which, like the others, is not regarded. It is this: that no Government shall assist rebels; to assist those whom monarchs deem rebels is with them the sin not to be forgiven. Each of them is always willing to have it enforced in his own case, and generally willing to aid those that another may deem rebels. The Governments of Great Britain and France have both acknowledged this law, and have both violated it whenever an opportunity offered, and they thought it their interest to do so. Great Britain assisted the Dutch and Vendéans; France the Scotch and the United States. Monarchs are not apt to be very nice about their actions, though they may make a great fuss about their principles; except Francis the First of France. They have generally been willing to benefit themselves by taking advantage of any commotion in a neighboring kingdom, or any other circumstance which may happen. England and France have been remarkable for taking part in the rebellions which have existed in each other; and if one existed in either at this moment the other would be as willing to take part as ever. I have brought this subject into view to show that the notions about universal law are illusory, to say the least of them, and that the great Powers of Europe have never in their acts respected them, and we shall always find ourselves mistaken if we look for public law anywhere but in the actions of nations. Treaties are only law between the persons which make them. Indeed public law can only be collected from facts; that is, from what nations have done. But, admit I am mistaken in this, and that it is a settled code derived from reason, the result will not be changed, because reason would justify the right to expatriate and to naturalize; and the facts prove that all nations have naturalized, and no one more than England, who, we have been told, never gives up her pretensions; so that, let us do as we will, she will continue to naturalize and to declare that her subjects cannot expatriate themselves. But this same England has yielded the point in the case of Napper Tandy; and France did not punish the great Condé or Marshal Turenne; and she has in a case very similar yielded to the United States, I mean the case of General Charles Lee; he was saved from her pretensions; and the same energy, decision, and unanimity, which saved him, would now save our seamen from impressment.

My colleague has stated that the Orders in Council were repealed in six days after the declaration of war. The fact is undoubtedly so, if their modification, as I understand it, be a repeal. However, be this as it may, it is easy to discover the cause of the change in the British policy. This will be best done by going back to the embargo; there can be no question but that produced the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, which she refused to carry into execution, notwithstanding we now hear so much of her good faith. The non-importation, together with the Message of the President to Congress, at the last session, and the act to raise 25,000 men, which passed the 11th of last January, produced the modification of the Orders in Council. Having mentioned the non-importation act, it is due to truth to say, that it has produced effects on Great Britain which I did not expect. Can it be supposed that the Orders in Council were modified without a cause? No one will suppose so, who is the least acquainted with the plundering which took place under them; as long as we would suffer ourselves to be plundered under them, so long they would have continued in force; and so long as we suffer her to impress American citizens, so long she will continue to impress them. Is she not acting towards us, in the modification of the Orders in Council, in the same spirit that she did during the Revolutionary war, when she attempted to tamper with us and divide us; first offering one thing and then another, and at last everything but independence, and that was conquered. Observe her now, as soon as circumstances convince her that we intend to defend our rights, which she had so long violated, she modifies her orders, but does nothing to prevent impressment, and we must conquer the rights of sailors and free trade, or never again talk about being a great maritime power or a free people.

We have been told that we might shortly have peace, and that this House was the place to begin the good work; though I do not know how it is intended to begin. I will heartily join in any measure which may produce so desirable an end, and at the same time maintain our rights. I rejoice, sir, that these gentlemen now think we can legislate on foreign affairs, and not violate the Constitution or usurp the Executive authority; nay, it seems we may now begin a treaty here without injuring the Constitution; we may judge from the documents before us what would suit Great Britain, and we know that would not suit us; of course it will not be very easy to suit both; yet I am perfectly willing to make the trial, and must add, that I never expected to hear the gentlemen talk about settling an affair with a foreign nation by paper measures. I had thought they considered them not only ridiculous, but absurd also, and that their way was powder and ball. Great Britain knows as well as any man in this nation that she can have peace, under her present regulations, whenever she will quit the vile practice of impressing the citizens of the United States. Our sincere desire of living in peace with all the world, the many and honest attempts we made to settle our disputes with her, and the laws we passed to avoid war, induced her to believe that we could not resist; and, now that we have resisted, we hear it said that under no other Administration would we have been at war. Can it be doubted that General WASHINGTON would have resisted had not Mr. Jay have made a treaty? or can it be doubted, when he demanded Commodore Barney, that he made the demand with an intention to enforce it if refused? His character forbids a doubt; he would not have sacrificed the rights or property of his countrymen. Permit me here to state what a Federal friend of mine said in Carolina, who served in the American Army during the Revolutionary war: A friend of his said to him, after Hull's surrender, that we must now make peace. Never, he replied, till that disgrace is wiped away; my country is at war, and I will go with her; take away the disgrace before we talk of peace. This is Federalism in the district which I represent; it is the sentiment of all parties in that part of the country. All the gentlemen from Massachusetts who have spoken, except one, (Mr. WIDGERY,) have declared the war to be immoral and unjust on our part. If it be immoral and unjust in us, what must it be in Great Britain, who has for years violated our dearest rights? They did not tell us; I wish they had. But some of these gentlemen voted at the last session to raise the 25,000 men; for what purpose could they be raised, unless for war? I have before endeavored to show that they were not wanted for the Peace Establishment; and surely they could not be wanted only for the purpose of paying them. Not one of the gentlemen who oppose this bill, and who voted for the act to raise the 25,000 men, have told us the purpose for which they wanted them; and have not these gentlemen, at this session, voted honorary rewards to those who have most distinguished themselves in this immoral and unjust war, as they call it? This vote, while it was a just reward to merit, was also an incitement to others to do the like, and was encouraging the war. I am no navy man; but I gave the vote, approving the conduct of those who fought in the Navy, with as much sincerity as I ever gave one. These brave men know that the war is neither immoral or unjust; and they know also that they are defending and supporting the rights of their injured country.

One of the gentlemen from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) could not miss the opportunity, which this general debate afforded, to mention the negroes in the Southern States. I had supposed, after former debates, they would not have been drawn into questions where there was no necessity for it. The names of many persons could be mentioned who were slave owners, whose memory will be dear to the nation, as long as virtue and patriotism shall be respected; I will only name one—and he not a native of the Southern States, but of New England, and no man from that part of the Union was more distinguished during the Revolutionary war than he was—I mean General Greene, who commanded the Southern Army. The Carolinas and Georgia acted towards him in a way that no States acted towards any other man. After the war he settled among them, and, if I am rightly informed, became a slave-owner. A regard to his situation in that respect might have induced the gentleman to have spared his observations; but they were also mentioned by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFY;) it was not expected from that quarter, and if his observations were intended to warn us, he ought to have considered that others might notice them; but more of this hereafter, when I shall attempt to answer some of his observations.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PIRKIN) said, that if we carried on the war till Great Britain relinquished the right of impressment, it would last as long as the war in Europe. He, like all other gentlemen who have spoken against the bill, or rather the war, gives the real question the go-by. The question is not, that she shall relinquish any right she may have to impress, but that she shall not impress American citizens, which she has no right to do; and I sincerely wish the question could be fairly put to every man in the nation. I am confident the answer would be, she shall not impress one. I should be very glad to hear some of the gentlemen state the difference between Algerine capture and British impressment. What situation can be more degrading than to be taken by force from your own vessel, and put on board her's to fight her battles, and probably against your own country. Tripoli had not done us the hundredth part of the injury which Great Britain has done, and all, as well as I now recollect, were willing to compel her to respect our rights—and she was compelled. The same unanimity now would have the same success. This same Great Britain, and France her rival in wickedness, while at war, have acted as if by concert to injure us; they each interdict our trading with their enemy, and establish a license trade between themselves; but, strange to tell, we have British seamen in our service. Then the British service is not quite as agreeable as ours; but they are not impressed, and I imagine not in the public ships. The merchants when they want sailors generally take the first they can get; but there is a great difference between the merchant service, which is voluntary, and impressment on board an armed ship. Besides, the British Government refuses to make an arrangement, by which her sailors could not be employed in American vessels; her present system is more convenient; it enables her officers to get men wherever they want them; if they can only find them, no matter whether native, naturalized or foreigner, a sailor is a sailor with them. The gentleman also said, we had done nothing to protect our seamen, and that we ought pass a law, that a certain proportion of every crew should be citizens. This I have long been willing to do, but that would only be a paper protection, and the British officers would not regard it, more than they do the present protections; nay, if we had the right to brand ours, and were to do it, I do not know but they would put the same brand on theirs, for the sake of making them so much alike that they could not be distinguished, and then under the plea that they could not tell one from the other, continue the convenient mode of getting men in every part of the world by impressment. But are we not now trying to protect them, by carrying on the war for sailors' rights and free trade?

The same gentleman, when he described the flourishing state of the country before the war, forgot to mention that more than thirty millions of the public debt had been paid during the last twelve years, and Tripoli compelled to respect our national rights, and that too without internal taxes or a tax on salt.

He also told us, in the first part of his speech, that we could not contend with Great Britain on the ocean, and, as he sat down, I understood him to say, we ought to carry the war on there. It appears very strange to me, that we should make our effort where we are not able to contend with her. I regret that the gentleman and others who have spoken, are not in the House—the cause of their absence is known to every one.

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. BLEECKER,) read to us a letter written by Mr. Russell from Paris, that contained what he believed to be true, and his duty to communicate to the Executive—and his letter from London appears to be written under the same impressions; in both cases he had done his duty, and nothing more. It is however, remarkable, that the letter from Paris is precisely what it ought to be, and that from London precisely what it ought not to be. As the gentleman seems fond of examining the documents, I will remind him of one, which was published some years past, and obtained the name of the X, Y, Z, communication; in that he will find related conversations, not with authorized agents of the Government, but with every man and woman (none it is believed were refused) who would say a word about a French party in this country; and who these people were, is not known to the public to this day, except one, whose name I do not recollect, and he denied the correctness of the statement concerning himself. These good men, the Envoys Extraordinary, thought it their duty to send the Executive a statement of the conversations which they had with these unauthorized people, and a very large edition of the communication was printed for the information of the nation. And pray what has Mr. Russell done? Related a conversation which he had with the Chief Minister of the Prince Regent.

When the arrangement made with Erskine was announced, what a fine fellow the President was; he was truly the President of the people; what a misfortune he had not been sooner elected; everything would have been right; he was quite a different man from his predecessor; though in my opinion his predecessor would gladly have made the same arrangement at any time. But how was it when the British Government refused to ratify the arrangement? The tone was changed; the man in the White House had taken the young Minister in; he had made the arrangement without peeping behind the scene, to examine the authority under which the young man acted; and in some part of the correspondence it was then discovered that an insult had been offered to the King, which his Minister here nor nobody else could discover till after the arrangement was rejected, and which no man can believe to be an insult or intended for one.

The same gentleman told us, we ought to make war on France, or acknowledge that we are wrong in making war on Great Britain. With respect to making war on France, it will be recollected that a gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. McKEE,) at the last session, made a motion in a Committee of the whole House, to include France in the declaration of war; that it was seconded by myself, and I believe some other member; only ten voted for it; three on that side of the House and seven on this. As for acknowledging that we were wrong in the war with England, that can hardly be expected. I believe it cannot be shown that we are, and it certainly has not yet been done.

The gentleman said we ought to insist on Great Britain to abandon the practice of impressing; I suppose he meant American seamen; but the manner in which this ought to be done he did not inform us. He is too high-minded to think of another mission, to beg that justice which she has so often refused to our supplicating Ministers; in fact we are insisting that she shall abandon the wicked practice in the only way not tried before, that is, force. If we were to send another Minister in the present state of affairs, we may fairly conclude that he would return, as all the others have done, with his finger in his mouth.

Canada, he said, is not worth conquering; it is a curse to Great Britain, and we cannot conquer it. I believe we may conquer it, and that it is worth conquering, if it was only to get clear of a meddling and bad neighbor, who is always willing to make a strife in our family. It cannot be forgotten, that it has been stated in this House, that more produce went down the St. Lawrence than the Mississippi, and the greater part of it is understood to be the produce of the United States. It would appear, from this, that it is not a curse to Great Britain, and certainly she does not consider it one. Whether it be obtained this war or not, it will be had some time or other. Notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, it is absolutely necessary, in my opinion, to the peace and happiness of the nation, as much so as the mouth of the Mississippi was. These two great rivers seem to have been intended by Providence for an inland navigation from North to South; and their waters (if I am correctly informed) can be more easily united than some of the canals already projected be finished.

I understood the same gentleman to say, there was no patriotism in the ranks of the Army. My opinion is very different; because I believe that respectable and patriotic men have enlisted, though not wealthy. In every country, there is more patriotism among the middling and poor people, than among the rich and the avaricious. The middling and the poor are contented; the rich and avaricious are never satisfied. And this is peculiarly the poor man's country, because it is the only one in the world where he is equal to the rich. The history of the Revolution will satisfactorily prove that there was patriotism in the ranks of the Army which achieved the independence of the country: and the ranks are no doubt filled with the same sort of men now that they were then. It is not long since we were told, and told again, of the patriotism of the tars—that a seventy-four could be manned in an hour—and now, it would appear as if all countries were alike to them. He also informed us that the militia were good for nothing, and that an army could not be raised. If it is so, the war must be at an end, and we must beg for peace, as we have heretofore begged for justice. The militia of the Western country is the best answer to this charge; they are at this time performing a duty never surpassed. Bunker's Hill and King's Mountain are lasting monuments of the exploits of the militia; they were equal to those at Thermopylæ and Marathon.

The gentleman appeared to console himself with the recollection that Napoleon must die. Can he or any other man living tell what will be the consequence of his death on the civilized world? Can he tell whether it would produce peace among the belligerents, or new wars? Europe is now in that state, that it is impossible to foretell now how it will settle down, whether he live or die. The Greeks thought the death of Philip of Macedon would put an end to their troubles; but they were sadly deceived. Alexander added to them; and no doubt the countries which he conquered thought his death would relieve them; but it was a signal for new wars and new troubles. If we calculate that the death of Napoleon would change the conduct of the European Governments towards us, we shall be deceived. No Government in Europe can wish well to ours: it is formed on a plan which they do not like. We must depend on ourselves—on our own means and resources;—any other dependence would be like an idle man sitting in the shade and calculating to grow rich.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TALLMADGE) regretted that party names had been introduced among us. No man regrets it more than I do; but it is more to be regretted that love of party should prevail over love of country. It must be recollected, by every man acquainted with the history of the nation for the last twenty-five years, that the gentleman's political friends began party names; that they had their choice; and, while they were in power, Federalism and energy were their words. Republicanism, then, meant anything or nothing. They had not, however, been long out of power, before they began to talk about Republicanism and the rights of the people, and now every Federalist claims to be a good Republican; and if they are kept out of power twelve years longer, I have no doubt they will be as fond of being called Democrats as they are now desirous of being called Republicans. The gentleman mentioned his Revolutionary services. No man respects them more than I do. He is one of those whose names are honorably recorded in the Journals of the old Congress. He also told us that he would not vote men or money. I cannot forbear regretting that he did not tell us what he would do, because, while I have the Journal fresh in my memory, I cannot make a single comment on this, to me, strange declaration; which, if he will pardon me, I will say, appears to differ widely from the record. God be praised! I have never said anything against the patriots of the Revolution.

The same gentleman, and some others, have said, that the war is now carried on for naturalized citizens alone. This, I apprehend, is a mistake. It would puzzle him to show, when the British officers wanted men, that they paid any regard to the fact whether the men were native or naturalized citizens. Their want was the only rule which regulated their conduct in impressment. The Constitution of the United States makes all citizens equal, except that a naturalized citizen cannot be elected President. It is true, as has been before stated, that the great point now in contest is the impressment of American citizens.

We hear so much about foreigners, that a stranger might suppose we were contending for their rights. The fact is not so; but the time has been, when the United States would have contended for their rights when in her service. Does not every man recollect some of them, who have been in her service, whose names are still dear to the nation?

I come now, sir, to the question which has been forced in the debate. From my heart, I wish we may never again have another discussion about foreign influence. It ought not to contaminate our walls. I hate to name it, or to hear it mentioned; the very idea is degrading to the House, and disgraceful to the nation. Why the idle charge of French influence should have been introduced, I cannot conceive, nor can I persuade myself to think that the gentlemen themselves believe it. What, in the name of God, is there in the administration of our Government, or in the known principles and characters of the men who administer it, like the administration of the French Government, or the principles and characters of the men who administer that! The principles of their abominable Government are not more unlike ours, than the men who administer it are unlike the men who administer ours. It was at one time apprehended by certain men, that our Constitution would be destroyed for want of energy in those whom the people had elected to administer it; and a want of energy in the French Government has never been suspected. Having already stated my opinion about foreign influence, I will now state a few facts to remind the Committee how much more noise would have been made about French influence, if France, bad as she is, had only have done that which England has done. And I do not mean to say that she would have done it, had she been able. Suppose a French officer had treated Captain Phillips of the Navy, and his crew, as a British officer did; which was, to have the crew mustered on deck, and take two or three men from it: what a cry would have been made about French insolence and cruelty! It is due to Mr. Adams, to say, that he very properly dismissed the Captain from the service. Had the Chesapeake been wantonly attacked, almost on our shore, by a French ship, all the moderation of the late President could not have prevented a declaration of war against France, for so unheard-of an insult and outrage. You will, sir, recollect my having said, that the attack on the Chesapeake was as much an act of war as the attack on Copenhagen. So much was said about this observation, that I was almost induced to think that I might be expelled for it; and if I had continued to repeat it, I do not know but I might have been. Had France continued for twenty years to impress American citizens to fight her battles, especially under the flag of the great Napoleon, should we have borne it? No; man, woman, and child, would have united in war against her. Henry, who has been brought into the debate: had France sent him amongst us, who would not have given any price for the papers, to prove the object of his mission, especially if, about the same time, her Minister here had received seven hundred thousand pounds sterling, in bills of exchange? What a mighty noise would have been heard from one end of the Continent to the other! Had France, in time of peace, have blockaded our ports and killed one of our sailors, the public mourning and weeping for the death of the unfortunate and innocent Pierce would have been ten times as great as they were. Vengeance for the murder would have resounded through every State and family; and would we not have declared against her? That it was exactly as Napoleon treated the rest of the world, and that we must resist him by force? Had it have been believed that a French Consul interposed in our elections, he would have been kicked out of the country, and told we wanted none of his fraternizing.

I will now notice a newspaper which was known to be edited by a foreigner, and one who declared he never would become a citizen. The editor made a great noise in the country by the number of papers which he circulated, and by his having been fined, in a State court, five thousand dollars for a libel, which he tried to make the people believe was wrong—I mean Peter Porcupine. Suppose that he had been a Frenchman, avowed openly his determination to remain a subject of France, and that in his paper he constantly abused the Federal party and called them the English faction. That the second man the nation ever produced was dead before the paper was established, the venerable Franklin; that he abused him in his grave, and endeavored to bring his name into contempt by ridicule, nay, he called him nothing but old lightning-rod. That he had advised the Democrats to put on the black cockade, (which they did,) and all that would not put it on, ought to be considered inimical to the country. That he constantly declared the Government of Napoleon to be the best in the world; and that this paper, which it is believed never had its equal for scandalous publications, was supported by the party then in power, the Democrats. Would there not have been as good ground to talk about French influence as any which has been stated? Again: suppose, about this time, it had been said by an influential Democrat, that the Constitution was good for nothing; that parchment Constitutions would not do; that one ought to be made at the point of the bayonet; that no Government would last which was not sealed with blood; and about the same time a publication appeared in a Democratic newspaper in favor of fixing a dynasty to govern the nation from their own party; and in another, one favoring a division of the States. Could not those who now think they see French influence in everything which is done, have easily suspected that all this was connected with French intrigue? That the Constitution had been considered almost unlimited in their hands, under a clause which was not intended to give any power, and that under it a sedition law was passed to operate only on the Federal party, by which the editors of the ablest Federal newspapers and others were punished for publications defending their opinions; and that every Federalist, no matter what his Revolutionary services may have been or his qualifications and respectability, was turned out of office, because they were Federal, and that was their only fault. Would not these doings have furnished some ground to suspect that it was tinged with French Democracy?

It is worth while to examine what causes are most likely to give one nation influence with another, and how far they may support the opinion of the great influence which France is suspected to have in this country. Language may be considered the first—people who speak the same, cannot easily believe that those with whom they talk in their own tongue can be foreigners; they intermix in company without any difficulty, and without knowing or thinking that they live in different countries: the French having been the language of most of the Courts of Europe, has undoubtedly been a means in aiding them to get the secrets of other Governments, and of overrunning so many countries. I have long regretted that so many of our people were anxious to learn French. I hope it will never be naturalized in the United States. We have difficulties enough to encounter by speaking the same language with her rival: the inconvenience of both speaking the same was felt during the Revolutionary war, and gave rise, as I have heard, to a conversation between a Mr. Ellery of Rhode Island, and a friend of his. The friend thought it would be advisable for us to learn Greek, and make it a national language; Mr. E. replied, that as we had declared independence, he could not consent to give up any part of it, not even the language, but that he was willing to compel the English to speak Greek. The sameness of language must give the British an influence in this country, which no other nation can possess. Marriages identify the people of different countries—in the United States more British subjects marry than the subjects of any other Power. Commerce between countries—where people of both join the same company; and more of such companies are formed between the Americans and English than the Americans and any other people. Secret service money—England and France both have the character of knowing how to use it to advantage; it would seem that it was necessary for people to be able to talk together to carry on the nefarious bargains and doings which grow out of this fund. The sameness of language affords England opportunities for intrigue in this country, which no nation ever did or will have; they, France and England, are both willing enough to have such men as Henry amongst us; and if France had sent him, we should have heard ten times as much about him in this debate as we have; his communication would then have been a good bargain at twice the sum which is stated to have been given for it; what sum was actually given I do not know, but if it was fifty thousand dollars, as stated, I am content. Places of amusement—the plays and players of our theatres are generally English, and almost everything connected with them tends to give us a good opinion of an Englishman, and a bad opinion of a Frenchman; everything there makes the Englishman the delight of the company, and the Frenchmen the contempt of it. And do you not recollect, sir, (Mr. NELSON was in the Chair,) if you do not, your venerable and respectable father would, was he living, that, when we were boys, the old men took great delight in telling us that one Englishman could beat three Frenchmen at sea, and two on land; nay, we were taught to consider the French the meanest people in the world, and to confirm it were told they eat frogs; and the English the greatest, and were told they lived on roast-beef and pudding. Our early prejudices were all enlisted against France—and everybody knows they are not readily got clear of.

It must appear strange to the people, that in this debate the justice of the war should have been questioned, after so many useless attempts on our part to settle every dispute we had with England by negotiation, not one of which originated in any wrong we had done. We had acted honestly and fairly to all nations; our forbearance had been so great, that the gentleman from Massachusetts said, some time past, that the then majority could not be kicked into war; and how often has it been declared in this House, by men of both parties, that we had just cause of war against Great Britain and France both, and that war ought to be preferred to any restrictive system; and now that we are at war, it seems that anything would be better than war. The restrictive system would have produced the desired effect, had it been continued and enforced; and our long forbearance and anxiety to live in peace had no other effect than to produce new insults and new wrongs.

While I think of it I will state a fact to the Committee, which is this, that as far as I am acquainted with naturalized citizens in North Carolina, they almost all agree in politics with my colleague, (Mr. PEARSON,) though some of them are among the number of my friends. He appears not to be friendly to naturalization, and I am willing to continue the law as it is. This fact proves the sincerity of us both.

I must return to Porcupine's paper, which, as well as I now recollect, never contained a sentence in favor of the Revolution, or much in praise of the Constitution, if it was praised at all; no outrage was committed which it did not approve; a few of the outrages of that time shall be stated: The Rogue's March was played under the window of the man who drew the Declaration of Independence. The man who first took up arms after the fall of Charleston, and whose body had been almost riddled in defence of his country, was a member of Congress, and was insulted at the circus. Another member, of no common cast of mind, was insulted at the theatre; a man who will do his duty in whatever situation he may be placed. Another, returning home with his family, was insulted and almost mobbed; he is now one of the Cabinet, mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY.) If I was not almost exhausted I would give some of the details of these then fashionable transactions. I will only add, it was nothing in those days for a few men to whip a printer whose publications they did not like. All these outrages and violations of law, it is believed, were not only approved by the editor of the before-named paper, but other Federal papers also. This same editor claimed to have more subscribers for his paper than any other editor in the Union. And after he returned to Europe, he wrote and published about some of his former supporters. Had this have been a French editor, and acted toward the Federal party as he did toward the Republican, and the subscribers to his paper Republicans, could not those who look at everything now done to find French influence, have had as good a field to hunt in as any they have yet found? At the very time these events took place, the majority talked as much about French influence as the minority now does; they had clues, tub-plots, ocean massacres, and a hundred other equally ridiculous and unfounded tales, which circulated for a day. I have mentioned these things not with an intent to wound the feelings of any man living, but with a view of trying to persuade those who talk so much about French influence to look at both sides of the question about foreign influence; and if they will I hope we shall never hear of it again in this House.

Mr. Genet, when he was Minister of France, began to intrigue, for which he was dismissed. Mr. Liston, when he was Minister of England, began the same work, for which he was not dismissed. If the Republicans had then been in power, and Liston a French Minister, could not a strict examination of the documents have placed it as easily as many other acts have been to French influence?

While all these things were doing, and many others quite as strange, the gentlemen call themselves the followers of General WASHINGTON. If they be truly his followers, they ought to adhere to his principles and attend to his last advice. Every act of his went to perpetuate the Union and to attach the States to each other. I fear the sentiments contained in his farewell address to the nation are getting out of fashion with those who claim to be his exclusive followers; or why do we hear within these walls, the foundation of which he laid for union, union, union; disunion spoken of, "peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must;" and why listen to idle and unfounded tales about foreign influence, which can never injure us as long as we stick to the old maxim—united we stand, divided we fall? Straws show which way the wind blows! What has become of the newspaper called the Washington Federalist? The name was, I have understood, changed to the Independent American; out of that, I believe, was raised the Federal Republican—all good names; but why lose the name of Washington to a paper supported by his exclusive followers? And this is the first time to my recollection that they have adopted Republican in their calendar.

I have heard that Federalism is not now the same that it was when Mr. Adams was President: we shall know more about this if ever they get into power again; be this as it may, every man has a right to change his opinion; it is a right which no Government can take from him, and when convinced that he is wrong, it is his duty to change. But I had thought, when Mr. Adams was President, we were told that he followed the plan of General Washington, and that he was then a favorite with the party who elected him, but a great change has taken place in regard to him. I always thought him an honest man, and I think so still. After Mr. Adams got out of fashion, Colonel Burr became so great a favorite with the Federal gentlemen who were then in Congress, that they voted thirty-five times for him to be President, when they must have known that not one elector who voted for him intended him for President. Afterwards, Mr. Madison was a favorite; but, after the refusal of the British Government to ratify the arrangement made with Mr. Erskine, they examined the matter, and discovered he had not done right, and he got out of fashion. Then the late worthy and venerable Vice President and Colonel Monroe became favorites. Colonel Monroe got out of fashion about the time he was appointed Secretary of State; and, lastly, Mr. De Witt Clinton became a favorite. I hope he will not be injured by it, but he seems to be losing ground, as we have been told, it was not his merit that induced the Federalists to support him for President, but the demerit of Mr. Madison. This does not appear to be a good reason, because they might have selected a man from their own party, who they thought had merit. But all these things may be the doings of those who, a former member of this House called ultra Federalists; and it will be recollected that all these men became favorites, on the old doctrine of, "divide and conquer;" and it ought not to be forgotten that, when Messrs. Ellsworth and Davie returned from France, their political friends were a little shy of them; indeed, I should not be surprised if Messrs. Jay, King, Wolcott, and Dexter, should not much longer be favorites. If we may judge from the public prints, Commodore Rodgers is no longer one, though he, like the others, is understood to be a Federalist; but these men will never say, "peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must." I would really thank any gentleman to tell me what is now meant by the party name, Federalist.

It is a fact on record, that General Washington did not approve of self-created societies, and I have understood that some of the people who claim to be his exclusive followers, have their self-created Washington Benevolent Societies, wherever they can establish them, and that they are political societies, and they were intended to oppose some other society; perhaps the Tammany. This could not justify the proceeding. As to myself, I do not care if there was one in every three miles square in the nation, so that I am left free not to be a member.

We naturalize, without hearing a complaint from any quarter, emigrants from Great Britain, of every trade and profession, merchants, lawyers, doctors, and even divines; to which may be added tradesmen and mechanics; they all go where they please, live among us, and take part in the politics of the day. If foreign influence could be introduced into the country by naturalizing, we should have more of British than of French; but naturalizing seems well enough for everybody but a sailor, but do not permit him to become a citizen; he will be in the way of native sailors, who want encouragement; besides, we know that Great Britain will impress him, and we know as well, when her officers want men, they care not whether they are American or English. The native American has never complained that the naturalizing of foreigners of his trade or profession, injured him; nor has a complaint been heard from a native seaman against naturalizing foreign sailors; and we have had experience enough to know that our merchants could complain, and complain almost against their own complaint. Let their property be captured, or expected to be captured, under a new order in France or England, and more complaints will be made about it, than the impressing of a dozen citizens. The situation of the merchant, when plundered, is bad enough, but his property is not taken away, without a trial of some sort before a judge learned in the law, whose duty it ought to be to decide according to law; he also employs lawyers to have justice done him. Not so with the sailor; when impressed, there is no learned judge to decide his case, or lawyer to have justice done; force is law to him, and his oppressor judge; he is put on board ships, and compelled to fight battles, in which neither he or his country have any concern: deprived of the right to complain or petition; he is poor, friendless—Great God! can it be possible, that we shall yield the point of impressment, for the sake of carrying on a little trifling trade by hook or by crook!

All agree that we ought to fight for the rights of native seamen, and all agree that some of them have been impressed; why not all, then, join heart in hand, to maintain their rights? Is it because the British officers impress from our vessels others besides natives? This cannot lessen their just claim to the protection of their country. We have, however, been told that only ninety-three persons were impressed in one year from American vessels; if only three of them had been the sons of the gentleman (Mr. EMOTT) who gave the information, I ask, would he have been contented with the long investigation of documents, to ascertain if any of the diplomatic meanders turned towards French influence? No, sir, he would not; he would have demanded of the National Government to have his children restored to his arms; he could demand this in a way to be heard. Far different is the case with these unfortunate parents, who have had their sons impressed; they are too poor and friendless to be heard; the rights of the nation may be abandoned by little and little, until none be left; exactly as you may take a cent at a time from one thousand dollars, until none be left. All must determine to protect American seamen on board American vessels, or not hereafter pretend to claim any jurisdiction over the vessels when they are out of the limits of the United States. If a single citizen should be impressed on American land, the whole nation would be in a flame; the right to protection is the same, whether on American land or an American vessel.

It has been said, that we do not act justly; that we encourage British seamen to run away, because we do not apprehend them and send them back, when they have run away from their vessels; they run away before our people see them, of course there is no encouragement to the running away. As to the sending them back, we are not bound to do it; and if it depended on me one should never be sent back, until the British ceased impressing and plundering our citizens, and I would agree that every man who engaged in the war on our side should have the right to be naturalized, though he fled from British naval tyranny.

It is remarkable that, while we hear not a word said to justify England for impressing and plundering the people of the United States, that so much should have been said to prove that we ought not to have gone to war with her, and that we were wrong in doing so. This is the best way that could have been devised to keep her aggressions out of view; not to say a word about them, and talk a great deal about the hardships of war, and the taxes which must be imposed to carry it on, winding up all their lamentations for the state of the country, with, if it was not for the war, a little trade could be carried on. Impressment, then, is a mere trifle, compared with this trade, and it may be that Great Britain understands it so, and is willing to gratify us with this trade for kin-sake, as long as we are contented to be impressed for kin-sake. The citizens who are impressed would tell her, if telling would release them, that nations are no kin.

This surely has been the most unfortunate Government from its establishment to the present time that ever existed; almost everything that has been done is wrong: It was wrong to fix the seat of Government here; it was wrong to place this House and the houses for the offices so far from each other; it was wrong to give paper protections to American seamen; it was wrong to have a little mercy in the revenue laws; it was wrong to repeal the internal taxes; I believe that was called oppression—though I am no prophet, I venture to predict, that to lay them to carry the war on will be wrong also; to take Canada would be wrong;—indeed it would be difficult to find anything which has been done right, according to the modern Federal creed. How are we to get things right? Give up the Chair you are in to one, the White House to another, and they will soon give you a sedition law which will put all right. The great discovery which these gentlemen have made, that so much has been wrong under every administration, would surprise the people, were they not this moment astonished at the discovery of perpetual motion by Redheffer—two such great discoveries must add vastly to the character of the nation.

The attempt to take Canada is so wicked that some of the gentlemen are quite alarmed at it. We hear of the unoffending Canadians, but not of the unoffending sailor; at one time they are the most unoffending and loyal people in the world, at another they are French, and not fit to be united in our Government. We have heard much of the same sort formerly said about the people of Louisiana, and they have become a State, without any trouble to themselves or the Union. What has become of that high Federal spirit which disdained to buy Louisiana? where is it when Canada is mentioned? The Federalism which desired to conquer Louisiana and keep it by force of arms, is changed when Canada is the question. The outrageous conduct of Great Britain is as much worse than that of Spain, as her impressment and plundering were worse than the refusal of the right of deposit. For one, I am willing to have Canada and Florida, and have them you must before many years. The situation of Mobile is such as to compel you before very long to take possession of it. Canada and Florida would rid us of bad neighbors, and make us more happy.

It has been said by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) that it was a favor conferred on a sailor to be naturalized by England, because then he had a right to go on board her vessels; I really wish the gentleman would tell me whether he ever heard that an American sailor had applied for the favor; sad experience has taught him that he can get on board some of her vessels without being naturalized and without his consent. If it be a favor to be naturalized there, it is no favor here where there is no authority to get him on board without his consent. Though we have this day for the first time heard it said by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) if we mean to be a maritime nation, we shall have to come to impressment or something like it, I hope he is mistaken, and that there never will be an authority in this Government to impress the citizens into its service. I have long expected that the navy men would some day or other think and talk of impressment, and it has been an objection with me to the building of a navy. The difference of the situation between an American and British sailor is beyond all comparison.

The same gentleman told us, what he had before told us, that the Canadians were not fit for our Government. From the observation, I suppose he meant those who may be called French Canadians; I have so often heard this asserted of them and the Louisianians, that fatigued as I am—though I do not believe that the blood of one nation is better than that of another—I must say, that the English was scarcely a second rate Power before William the Conqueror; and that from his time they have been a first rate one. In truth, the liberty which that nation has enjoyed, is owing to the descendants of the Norman barons.

The gentleman also told us, that the army might turn their arms against the country. It is possible that this may be done, though I do not believe that it will. This is however going on the ground, that there is no patriotism in the officers or privates. I see men who were in the Revolutionary army; I ask them if there was no patriotism among them? It was to be found in every grade. The Pennsylvania line was once, during the war, highly agitated. At that very time they convinced the world that there was patriotism in the ranks; they convinced the emissaries who got among it, as well as everybody else; and what might now be thought strange by some people, there was a good many Irish in it. They neither thought of turning their arms against the country or of joining the enemy; they wanted only the pay which was due them. The Newburg letters have been alluded to in the debate. Does the conduct of the army at that time furnish a fact on which to ground an opinion, that it would have turned its arms against the country it had defended, and the independence it had maintained? The case of André proves, that it is not necessary for men to be rich, to be patriotic; every effort which was made to induce the honest and patriotic farmers to let him go, was an inducement to them not to let him go. The argument that the army might turn their arms against the country, is no stronger against the present army than it would be against any other, and ends in this; that we must never maintain our rights by force against foreign nations, because the army which maintains them may turn their arms against their own country. Only settle this point, that you will not defend your rights by an army, and England and France will immediately make more free with our people and property than they have done. The officers to this army have not been appointed by the same rule, by which those for the army of 1798 were. In the present, men of every political opinion have been appointed. In that, no one who was not believed to be of the ruling party was appointed. It would seem from this that there was not the same reason to apprehend danger to the liberties of the people from this army as there was from that. It was about that time declared in the House of Representatives, that no Administration ought ever to appoint a man to office who did not agree with it in politics. I then thought the doctrine wrong, and think so still. This is not a question about a standing army in time of peace. No man is more opposed to one than I am in time of peace; and whenever it shall come, if I should then have a seat in the House, I shall be willing to reduce the number to as few as any other member. But we are at war, and that war ought to be carried on by regular soldiers: if you attempt to carry it on by militia, and it should last a few years, you will destroy the agriculture of the country, and that would be wrong. This war is like everything else which has been done—to begin it was wrong, to continue it was wrong, to make a bad treaty to get peace will undoubtedly be wrong; and can we expect a fair and equal one without we are in a situation to enforce our rights? We have been told that the Administration ought to insist that Great Britain should abandon impressment—insist how? not on paper, because that had been sufficiently tried before the war. To insist with effect, must be by force. Only let a treaty be made, in which the rights of the nation shall not be secured, and you will then hear a noise about wrongs. The war is not approved by the people. There is no fact to prove this within my knowledge. The President, under whose administration it was determined to defend our rights by force, has, it is believed, been re-elected. After all, I verily believe, had the gentlemen been in the majority they would have voted for war. I could lay my hand on him who is too magnanimous to deny it.

The gentleman commented very largely on an expression used by me some time past respecting the patriotism of the people of the Western country. I repeat it again, that the patriotism of the Western country was never surpassed by Greece or Rome in their best days. The gentleman himself did not deny it, in his eloquent argument to prove that we ought not to conquer the world. There is no danger of our attempting it, if we cannot get men or money to maintain the rights of the nation. I have no more desire than the gentleman himself to conquer the world, though I am willing to get clear of a bad neighbor or two, by adding Canada and Florida to the United States.

The gentleman also told us, that as long as we remained free, we should be feeble. I never heard before that freedom made a people feeble. This is the strangest of the strange things which I have heard during this debate. I had thought that the little freedom which England enjoyed had made her a full match for France; that it was the freedom of Holland, Venice, and Genoa, which made them able for so many years to maintain and defend their rights;—the Greeks and the Romans were not feeble when free. I had thought that the strength of the nation depended in a great measure on its freedom, when the governors had energy enough to bring its resources into operation.

He, like many others, told us that England would have accommodated. Neither he nor any one else has proposed to offer her more than has been offered, and which she sarcastically refused. It would require a Redheffer to discover what project could have been offered without yielding the point in contest. No accommodation could be more agreeable to her than her system of impressment and plunder. It is out of my power to notice more of the gentleman's observations, though I had intended to do it.

The idea of possessing Canada appears to alarm some of the gentlemen as much as the expectation that the world would be at an end last year did many good people; and the attempt to fix French influence on the Administration is not better founded than the old tale of the tub plot, and if a serious charge could be made against it we should never hear of this.

If we mean to be respected as a nation we must determine never to relinquish the point we are now contending for. Let us imitate the example of our fathers, who determined to be independent, and not to think of peace without it. Let us determine not to think of peace until the rights of American seamen are secured, and let us convince England and France that we can be free, united, and maintain our rights. I cannot, sir, finish what I intended to say—I must sit down or sink in my place—we must maintain the rights we are contending for, or the nation will sink!

The Committee then rose and reported the bill.

The several amendments made in Committee of the Whole were agreed to by the House.

Mr. FITCH again moved to strike out the 4th section, giving the President exclusively the appointment of all officers under the rank of field officers.

The question was decided in the negative by yeas and nays. For the motion 34, against it 74, as follows:

YEAS—John Baker, Abijah Bigelow, Harmanus Bleecker, Adam Boyd, Elijah Brigham, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Thomas B. Cook, John Davenport, jr., William Ely, James Emott, Asa Fitch, Edwin Gray, Jacob Huffy, Richard Jackson, jr., Philip B. Key, Lyman Law, Joseph Lewis, jun., Archibald McBryde, Jonathan O. Moseley, Timothy Pitkin, jr., Elisha R. Potter, John Randolph, William Reed, Henry M. Ridgely, William Rodman, Richard Stanford, Silas Stow, Lewis B. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Laban Wheaton, Leonard White, and Thomas Wilson.

NAYS—Willis Alston, jr., William Anderson, Stevenson Archer, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, William Barnett, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, John C. Calhoun, Francis Carr, Langdon Cheves, Matthew Clay, James Cochran, William Crawford, Roger Davis, John Dawson, Joseph Desha, Samuel Dinsmoor, Elias Earle, William Findley, James Fisk, Meshack Franklin, Thomas Gholson, Isaiah L. Green, Felix Grundy, Bolling Hall, Obed Hall, John A. Harper, Aylett Hawes, John M. Hyneman, Richard M. Johnson, Joseph Kent, William R. King, Abner Lacock, Peter Little, William Lowndes, Aaron Lyle, George C. Maxwell, Thomas Moore, William McCoy, Alexander McKim, Arunah Metcalf, Samuel L. Mitchell, Jeremiah Morrow, Hugh Nelson, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, Stephen Ormsby, Israel Pickins, James Pleasants, jr., Benjamin Pond, Samuel Ringgold, Thomas R. Robertson, John Rhea, John Roane, Jonathan Roberts, Ebenezer Sage, Lemuel Sawyer, John Sevier, Adam Seybert, George Smith, John Smith, William Strong, John Taliaferro, George M. Troup, Charles Turner, jr., Robert Whitehill, David R. Williams, William Widgery, and Richard Winn.

And the bill was then (half past six o'clock) ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

And on motion, the House adjourned until tomorrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 13.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to impose a duty on the importation of iron wire; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of John Thompson; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements of the annual revenue of the United States, from the commencement of the Federal Government until the 30th of September, 1812, with an account of expenditures within the same period, made in obedience to a resolution of the 24th ultimo; which were read.

The bill from the Senate "giving further time for registering claims to land in the Eastern district of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. STOW, after observing that it was the peculiar province of this House to provide the ways and means for the support of Government, and that in the commencement of an arduous conflict with a powerful nation, it became them to lay a secure foundation for its adequate support; offered the following resolution, with a view to its lying on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare, and lay before this House, with all convenient despatch, such bills as may be best calculated, in their opinion, for providing, with certainty, means commensurate with the national expenditure, and to preserve, unimpaired, instead of abusing the public credit, on which the public resources so eminently depend.

The House having agreed to consider the resolution—

Mr. CHEVES, after observing that the subject of taxation had not been agitated in the Committee of Ways and Means, at the present session, remarked, that he should fail in his duty at this time, when a resolution calculated to impair the public credit was introduced, if he did not couple with it the facts connected with the ways and means of the present year. It would be remembered that, previous to the declaration of war, the House had passed certain resolutions, founded on a detailed report of the Committee of Ways and Means, accompanied by a report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The principle of the report was, that a revenue adequate to the current expenses of the year, and to defraying the interest of the old debt, as well as the new debt to be created within that year, ought to be provided. This principle, however, on which the war was commenced, had been more than attained without the aid of additional taxes, which therefore were not necessary for the year 1813. The revenue for the year 1814 must be provided for; and this subject might be acted on at the present session, or at such session as might be thought expedient by the proper authority. He had risen, he said, merely to do away the impression that the public credit would suffer in the year 1813 from the omission to impose taxes. His opinion was that the subject could not be too soon acted on, although without it the credit of the country would be supported.

Mr. Stow disclaimed any intention to impair the public credit. He had no such view.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

MOUNTED RANGERS.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the House took up the resolutions moved by him a day or two since; one of which proposed to require the Military Committee to inquire into the expediency of raising twelve companies of mounted rangers; and the other, to inquire into the proper mode of compensating the mounted volunteers who had lately gone into service.

The first of these resolutions being under consideration—

Mr. WILLIAMS remarked, that the act authorizing the raising of seven companies of mounted rangers would not expire before the end of the next session of Congress. The real question, therefore, was, seven having been already provided, whether five additional companies were necessary for the protection of the Western frontier? He conceived not; and more especially, when, by the bill now on its passage through this House, twenty regiments were proposed to be raised for precisely the term which was contemplated in the resolution.

Mr. JENNINGS said, that he had not been aware that the law authorizing the raising seven companies of mounted volunteers, did not expire until the next session. But the gentleman was mistaken in supposing the twelve months' infantry would answer the purpose he had in view. Mr. J. described the nature of the service on the frontier, the rapidity of motion which was necessary either in advancing or retreating. By the time Spring arrived, Mr. J. said, the Indians would pour in on every quarter of the frontier, and other force was necessary to protect its population than infantry.

The first resolution was negatived, as was the second.

The third, respecting the pay of the mounted volunteers, was agreed to, amended as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means inquire into the expediency of making provision for compensating the militia or volunteers who may have been called out, or whose services may have been accepted by the Executives of either of the States or Territories of the United States.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The bill, in addition to the act passed at the last session "to raise an additional military force"—the object of which is to raise twenty regiments of men for one year, if deemed necessary by the President to the public service—was read a third time, and the question stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. CURTIS spoke in reply to former remarks of Mr. QUINCY, in support of the bill.

Mr. KENT.—Mr. Speaker, it is with great reluctance I rise to trouble the House with any remarks of mine, at a time when their patience must be so completely exhausted, by the unusual length of the debate which has already taken place upon the subject before you. The bill on your table proposes to raise an additional military force of twenty thousand men, and it has been objected to on account of its expense, and the consequent danger growing out of it to the liberties of our country. We are, sir, in a state of war; and what is evidently the course which we should pursue whilst in that situation? We should advocate and support such measures as are calculated to bring that war, justly made on our part, to a speedy, honorable, and successful conclusion. Viewing the bill on your table as a measure of that description, I shall give it my support, regardless of that additional expense, which gentlemen so emphatically dwell upon. Nay, sir, it is better to expend the thirty millions of dollars (even if that sum was necessary) so repeatedly spoken of on the other side of the House as the cost of the war for two years, to accomplish our object, than to expend the same sum in five years, even if we could effect our object with equal certainty.

However commendable economy may be in every other situation of life, in war it is inadmissible; it loses its character; it becomes parsimony: you might as well attempt to unite profusion and avarice as war and economy. All that the utmost prudence can require of you when in a state of war, is to make your means ample; lay your plans well; and to the judgment and the skill in these particulars only can you look for economy or for savings; for the want of an inconsiderable supply of men or money, a campaign might prove disastrous, to recover which would require an immense sacrifice of blood and treasure.

The Army has been represented as dangerous to the liberties of the country. At one moment we are told that, when it shall be completed, it will be unequal to the conquest of a petty province adjoining us, and not exceeding in population the State of Maryland; the next moment we are told that it will endanger the liberties of seven millions of freemen. Arguments thus paradoxical need no refutation. Sir, I do not pretend to have any military experience, and I am willing to concede the point to those possessing it, that men enlisted for three or five years are preferable to those enlisted for one year as proposed by the bill; yet I feel confident that every object will be accomplished by this bill that is intended. It is not proposed to rely solely on an army of this description to carry on the war; you have nearly a sufficient military force authorized for five years, and you want the men to be raised by this bill only as auxiliaries, till the ranks of that army can be filled. With these observations on the bill before you, I shall proceed to make a few remarks upon what has fallen from gentlemen on the other side of the House; in doing which I shall endeavor to confine myself to what has not been noticed by others, or, if attended to, not sufficiently so.

If I understood an honorable gentleman from Connecticut correctly, who addressed you the other day, (Mr. PITKIN,) he said we were contending for the employment of foreigners. We contend, sir, for nothing which, as an independent nation, we are not entitled to, and which the laws of nations do not guarantee to us. What have been the propositions heretofore made by our Government to Great Britain upon this subject? I find, by a recurrence to the correspondence of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney with that Government, in 1806, that we made the following propositions, the most material of which were omitted yesterday (not intentionally I hope) by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT.) Here Mr. K. read the following proposals from the public documents of 1807 and 1808. We offered—

1. To afford no refuge or protection to British seamen.
2. To deliver them up if they took refuge among us.
3. To make laws for restoring them.
4. To aid in searching for, seizing, and restoring them.
5. To keep them in our prisons when requested.
6. To prohibit our citizens from carrying them off.
7. To prohibit their employment.
8. To make penal laws for punishing their employers.
9. To make it our duty to restore them.
10. To extend the foregoing provisions, not only to deserters, but to all sea-faring people.

These propositions went completely to secure to Great Britain the services of all her sea-faring subjects, except such as were naturalized under our laws, which amounted to but few, indeed; thirteen hundred British seamen only having been naturalized since the commencement of our Government, and, in all probability, an equal number of our seamen have been naturalized by Great Britain during the same period. Yet, to my astonishment, have I heard it stated, during this debate, that our Government had made no serious propositions to secure to Great Britain the services of her seamen.

But equitable as these propositions were, they were rejected. Notwithstanding, sir, our Government, anxious in their pursuit after peace, have gone still further; they have, through our late Chargé d'Affairs in London, (Mr. Russell,) proposed to Great Britain to exclude from our naval service, as well public as private, all her seamen, including those which may hereafter be naturalized, and notwithstanding the liberality and justice of this proposal, it, like all others, has been made without producing the desired effect. And what more, sir, could have been asked of us, required, or granted, than is contained in these offers? Nothing more, unless, indeed, they had asked for our independence, and, yielding to the requisition, we had granted it. When an American vessel is at sea, it is amenable to no laws but those of its own country and the laws of nations; and where, in either of these, will the advocates for impressment find their justification? Sir, had not the practice of impressment been treated as a casual, a trivial circumstance, during this debate, I should not have presumed to trouble the House with my desultory remarks; and my principal object in addressing the House, was to ask their attention to a document which appears to have been overlooked, and which, if necessary, will place the abomination of that practice in colors too strong to be mistaken.

Here Mr. K. read the following extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe, dated January 4, 1804—

"The whole number of applications made by impressed seamen to our Consul in London, between the month of June, 1797, and September, 1804, were two thousand and fifty-nine. Of this number, one hundred and two seamen only were detained as British subjects, which is less than one-twentieth of the whole number impressed. Eleven hundred and forty-two were discharged, or ordered to be so, and eight hundred and five were detained for further proof, with the strongest presumption that the greater part, if not the whole, were Americans, or other aliens, whose proof of citizenship had been lost or destroyed."

It is, then, evident, from this document, that, for every British seaman obtained by this violent proceeding, a number of Americans, or other aliens, with whom Great Britain has no right to meddle, not less than twenty for one have been the victims to it. Sir, have we become so lost to the real independence and sovereignty of the country, that we are prepared to yield to this degrading, debasing, and humiliating badge of vassalage!

The Romans, of old, had a practice of making the Governors of those countries they conquered pass annually beneath their yoke, as a mark of submission; but we, doomed to humiliation far greater, are made to pass daily, nay, hourly, beneath one much more galling. Some gentlemen object to the propositions made by Mr. Russell, and assert that he was not authorized. They should recollect that Mr. Russell's letter, containing this final offer to the British Government, was communicated to this House by the President, and, had it not met with his concurrence, it is presumable he would, in his communication, have expressed his disapprobation towards it. Nay, a similar offer has been made by the Secretary of State to Admiral Warren.

I know not whether the feelings of shame or indignation predominate in my breast, when I see gentlemen constantly laboring to place their own Government in the wrong; and, in contradiction to the official records of this House, insist that we are contending for the employment of foreigners.

The language of our Government upon that subject, is this, sir: that, if the oppressed and unfortunate inhabitants of Europe, escaping from their tyranny and panting after their long-lost liberty, seek a refuge in our happy country, upon their compliance with our naturalization laws, we are willing to extend to them those blessings we enjoy; but should they become dissatisfied with the advantages which the interior of the country afford them, and they think proper to depart from our shores, we say to them, we will not risk our peace for their protection beyond our territorial limits. So far from our contest with Great Britain being for the employment of her subjects, it is a contest for shielding a large and valuable portion of our fellow-citizens from British thralldom, under the lash of which they have too long labored; and who will dare discriminate in that protection which is equally due to all, that is due to the meanest individual in the community, and withhold it from a class of men who have done honor to the American character, and covered themselves with glory?

What American citizen is so lost to a sense of his duty as to abandon the freedom of commerce for a pittance of trade, to be held only at the sufferance of a jealous and implacable foe? Who is it that is willing to see one of his fellow-men placed in one scale, and balanced with a cent in the other? for that is the real contest. War was declared under circumstances that left us nothing to hope for from the justice or magnanimity of our enemies, and the abandonment of the high ground vauntingly assumed by the Prince Regent in April last, and reiterated by his Minister here, at the moment when the declaration of war was under discussion, can be attributed only to an apprehension of war; for, whatever might have been the effects of our restrictive system upon them, they never attempted any modification or relaxation of their Orders in Council, (which went to regulate our foreign intercourse,) until the act laying an embargo, and avowed as a preliminary measure to war, reached that country.

We made war, not for one particular injury, but for a long catalogue of wrongs, and until there is a final adjustment of the most prominent of those differences, that peace which can be procured without it must be precarious, indeed, if not dishonorable. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) said, the other day, "that, whenever propositions for a reconciliation with Great Britain had been made, they had been invariably preceded or accompanied by some measure calculated to insure their rejection." I cannot account for such an assertion, unless, in the language of the poet, I should say:

"Trifles, light as air,
Are, to the jealous, confirmation strong
As proofs of holy writ."

Was not the arrangement with Mr. Erskine proof positive to the contrary? What unfriendly measure accompanied that arrangement? None. Did not good men of all parties rejoice at it? Was not the restoration of a friendly intercourse between the two countries hailed as a national blessing from Maine to Orleans? Nay, was there not a contest on this floor among gentlemen about who should be the first to attest their approbation of the President's conduct on that occasion? Yet the arrangement was rejected on the ground that Mr. Erskine was not authorized. It was immaterial, sir, whether he was authorized or not, as respects the disposition of the Government or the people of this country towards Great Britain; if he was authorized, the arrangement should have been fulfilled; if he was not, all they had to do was to authorize him or some other agent; and harmony and friendship, so much to be desired, would have been instantly restored between the two countries.

A gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) observed yesterday, "that we had no cause of war when it was declared." In order to refute that remark, I will ask the attention of the House for one moment to what were the sentiments of that gentleman and his friends at a former period, when the differences between this country and Great Britain first assumed a serious aspect. Here Mr. K. read the following extract from a memorial from the town of Boston, similar ones to which had been presented from every seaport town in the country—

"While your memorialists have witnessed with mingled feelings of indignation towards the perpetrators, and of commiseration for their unfortunate countrymen, the insults and barbarities which the commerce of these States have sustained from the cruisers of France and Spain, it is their object in the present memorial to confine their animadversions to the more alarming, because more numerous and extensive detentions and condemnations of American vessels by Great Britain, and to advert to the principles recently avowed and adopted by her courts relative to neutral trade—principles which, if admitted or practised upon in all the latitude which may be fairly inferred to be intended, would be destructive of the navigation, and radically impair the most lucrative commerce of our country."

Shall I remark to the House, that to this memorial is attached the respectable signature of James Lloyd, now a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, in the other branch of the Legislature? The language and sentiments of these memorialists were just, and were correctly pointed at that time against Great Britain alone, and met the approbation of both Houses of Congress and of the nation. It was, sir, the publication of these papers which first attracted the attention of the American people, and pointed their indignation against the Government of Great Britain for intolerable aggressions, which, to this day, are unatoned for.

Sir, I should be glad to know in what subsequent act of the British Government the gentleman and his friends found a mitigation of those indignant feelings so justly and ably portrayed in those memorials; by what subsequent act of aggression were they reconciled to those destructive "principles adopted by the British courts," and spoken of by them with so much abhorrence? Were those acts of unrepaid violence converted into innocence by the attack on the Chesapeake frigate the June following; by the degradation of our flag; the murder of our citizens, and the seizure of four of her crew, one of whom they hung, another they flogged to death; and, changing the scene from tragedy to farce, as a reparation for this injury, (for the pittance of a pension offered the wounded and the friends of the slain never should be taken into consideration,) the other two were restored after five years imprisonment? Was the wrath of the gentleman and his friends appeased by her Orders of Council of November, 1807, less than one year after the date of these memorials, by which we were required to send all our produce into her ports, there to pay whatever duties His Britannic Majesty's Government might think proper to impose upon it, and they would then permit us to proceed to a market, upon the condition that we would on our return pass again through her ports and pay a similar duty on our return cargo?

Sir, the history of the world does not furnish an instance of equal audacity, of equal outrage, offered to a free people; and that was the moment when we should have arrested the progress of her injustice; the whole nation would have been with us. But inasmuch as war was not declared against Great Britain at that time, I rejoice at the marked disapprobation of the people of my native State towards such an invasion of their rights. The moment a cargo arrived, which had been contaminated by the payment of such a tribute, it was carefully collected and consigned to the flames, and their detestation of such an attack upon the sovereignty of the country conveyed to the skies in "curling smoke."

I could proceed, and step from aggression to aggression, committed upon us by Great Britain, from the date of these memorials until the moment war was declared, but I will forbear; the inconsistency of the gentleman, and the unsoundness of his remark, is too obvious to require it.

I am as anxious for peace as any gentleman in or out of this House, and would willingly make any sacrifice consistent with the honor and integrity of the country to obtain it; but I know of no mode by which you can come at it but by a successful application of the bayonet; for every overture for a reconciliation before or since the declaration of war has been rejected.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) appears to think his own Government capable of everything treacherous and dishonorable; but considers our enemies incapable of any act that is not loyal and honorable. I do not envy the feelings or patriotism of any gentleman that could for a moment permit him to make such a comparison.

Great Britain has had it repeatedly in her power to place us in the situation towards her enemy, which repeated acts of injustice on her part has placed us towards her; but every occasion has been contemptuously rejected, and if she suffers in the conflict in which we are engaged, the sin will be with her, not with us; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts, and those who think proper to act with him, would make the same exertions to serve their country which they make to serve a party, we should be the most happy and prosperous people under the sun. The gentleman from New York (Mr. BLEECKER) the other day observed, "that since the declaration of war the constant cry has been that all opposition must cease." I know of no act of the Government, sir, or of those connected with it, that will bear the gentleman out in such a remark. Where in this happy country can be found one instance of oppression or persecution? And I feel confident that, should the Government err, it will be on the other side. But I would ask that gentleman, when in a state of war, forced upon us by the aggressions of a foreign Power, what would be the course pointed out by sound discretion and real patriotism? The first inquiry would be, has the Government been administered agreeably to the Constitution; was war declared by the constituted authorities of the country? Being answered unquestionably in the affirmative, the proper course to be pursued in such a situation then is, to invite harmony and union among the people, to put down our common enemy; this being done, if abuses exist in the Government, correct them; if there should be corruption in the body politic, cleanse it; and I pledge myself to go as far as any gentleman in measures thus salutary.

During this debate, repeated reference has been made to what passed between Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, and the British Commissioners, pending their negotiations in England in 1806; and it has been supposed by some gentlemen that some concession was made at that time by the British Government relative to impressment.

Sir, I positively state that the British Government conceded nothing upon that subject, and the practice of the British naval officers, and the correspondence of the parties support me in this declaration. The British Commissioners in their letter to Mr. Canning, dated August 10, 1810, state that they did not, in what passed between them and the American Ministers, "pledge their Government to abstain in future from the practice of impressing from American merchant vessels, but did mean to pledge the British Government to make its cruisers observe the utmost moderation, caution, and forbearance in the exercise of that practice."

Sir, the treaty was silent upon the subject of impressment, and the British Commissioners say, "the treaty was in itself complete and unconditional, and subject to no reservation on either part, except what was expressed in the note of the 30th December," wherein Great Britain reserved the right, notwithstanding the treaty, to chastise us, if we did not resist France in the way and manner most agreeable to her.

Again, sir, the British Commissioners, in their note of November 8, to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, and which contains all the concession, if it can be called concession, upon the subject of impressment which was made, they remark: "that instructions had been given, and shall be repeated and enforced for the observance of the greatest caution in the impressing of British seamen from American merchant vessels." The treaty made with the British Government (and connected with the discussions pending its negotiation was the promise to be cautious in the exercise of the practice of impressment on board American vessels) was concluded in England on the 27th of December, 1806, and delivered to our Government the 15th of March following, and in the month of June next, three months only after the receipt of the treaty, so cautious and moderate were the British officers in the practice of impressment, that they attacked one of our public vessels before alluded to, and impressed four of her crew. I mention this, sir, as one instance only of the melancholy proof of that "caution" in the practice of impressment, promised by the British Commissioners, and which was all the concession made by them to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney relative to impressment, the practice of which, when extended to the vessels of the United States, reduces us to a species of vassalage, which we are bound successfully to resist or sink in the attempt.

H. OF R.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, apparently laboring under the effects of a serious indisposition, and addressed the Chair.

I rise (said he) with a heart saddened by the disgrace of our common country, and sickened by the way in which the business of the State has been managed.

Of the temper and virulence which have manifested themselves in this debate, I shall not have any occasion to divest myself in the course of the very few remarks which I fear I shall be enabled to make, because towards them I have no purpose. Indeed, when I look around me, I am exceedingly sad; and I know not now if it will be in my power to go on.

I had intended, if time and health permitted, to address to this Assembly some few observations, confined principally to the change which has taken place in the relations of our country since the declaration of war, not only respecting that belligerent with whom we are engaged in hostilities, but her adversary also. But the course that this debate has taken imposes upon me a painful duty, which I trust God will give me strength to discharge: the duty of reviewing past transactions in the Government, which, from my heart, I would, instead of bringing them up on the present occasion, gladly discharge from my memory. But self-defence is the first law of nature. The merest reptile, the worm itself, will turn when trod upon. Nor is the force of the blow lessened by its being dealt, as in the present case, by the hand—I will not say under the garb and circumstances—of Friendship.

It was my lot, sir, and I may assuredly say my misfortune, to take some little share in those transactions which brought about a civil revolution in the Government of this country. I hope that I am understood. I feel I shall be understood, when I speak of this, by all wise and good men; and it is with them only that I wish to hold intercourse—to commune. It is of their good opinion alone that I am ambitious, if indeed ambition dwell anywhere in my heart.

Let me endeavor to recall to recollection the state of things about the period when I had the unhappiness to dedicate myself to political life.

Through the opposition, bold but just, which was made by myself, and those associated with me to the measures of that Administration, an entire change was effected in the control of the Government. One Administration was ejected from power, and another took its place. Is it necessary for me to descant upon the topics of difference which then separated the two great parties in the Government? Is it necessary for me at this time of day to make a declaration of the principles of the Republican party? Is it possible that such a declaration could be deemed orthodox when proceeding from lips so unholly as those of an excommunicant from that church? It is not necessary. Those principles are on record; they are engraved upon it indelibly by the press, and will live as long as the art of printing is suffered to exist. It is not for any man at this day to undertake to change them. It is not for any man who then professed them, by any guise or circumlocution, to conceal apostasy from them, for they are there—there in the book. What are they? They have been delivered to you by my honorable colleague—what are they? Love of peace, hatred of offensive war; jealousy of the State Governments towards the General Government, and of the influence of the Executive Government over the co-ordinate branches of that Government; a dread of standing armies; a loathing of public debt, taxes, and excises; tenderness for the liberty of the citizen; jealousy, Argus-eyed jealousy, of the patronage of the President. From these principles what desertions have we not witnessed? Will you have a list of them? I shall not undertake it; but I will state to you in one word one of them. I do pronounce, and I challenge any man to prove to the contrary, that the vote which was taken last evening, to strike out the section of the "Additional Army Bill" which gives exclusive power to the President to appoint all officers of that army under the grade of field officers, was the test, the touchstone, of Republican and Anti-Republican principles. And, had that clause been in a Military Bill at that day before this House, not one of the supporters of the then President of the United States would have failed to vote for expunging it. If you can bring me a single instance in which the party then calling itself Republican did vote for enlarging the patronage of the President of the United States—especially his military patronage, where it was then brought into question—I will give you my life. There is no instance of it. I say that the vote taken on that question last night is a test of strength of parties in this House.

Principle does not consist in names. Federalism is a real thing—not a spectre, a shadow, a phantom. It is a living addition to the power of the General Government, in preference to the power of the States; partiality for the Executive power, in distinction to that of the co-ordinate Departments of the Government; the support of great military and naval force, and of an "energetic" administration of the Government. That is what is called Federalism. Yes, an energetic Administration, not in its real, but technical sense; for it has a sense as technical as any in our laws. That is Federalism. And, when I am opposing the course which looks toward the rearing up of great Military and Naval Establishments, of an extent not only incommensurate with the necessity but the ability of my country, I care not with whom I vote; I will be true to my principles. Let any man lay his finger upon a vote in which, since I have had the honor (if, indeed, it be an honor) of a seat in this House, I have departed from those principles, and I will consent that, quoad hoc, I am a Federalist. But it will be in vain to search for such a vote.

So strenuous, sir, had been the contest—so hot the spirit of rivalry between the two contending parties—that, after the Revolution of 1801, a curious spectacle was presented to this nation and to the world—a spectacle which, I am bold to say, never did before make its appearance in any Government, and never will appear again. It was this: that, as if the character that each party had borne when in collision with one another was indelible, the two parties, after power was transferred from one to the other, did actually maintain the same character which they had derived from impressions received during their late conflict: and the admiring world saw with astonishment the case of an Opposition minority attempting to force upon a reluctant Administration patronage and power, which that Administration put by, and sternly refused to accept. Yes, sir; for a time, so completely had the Republicans been imbued with the principles which they professed whilst in a minority, that, after becoming the majority, the Federalists pressed on their old adversaries power and patronage, to which they absolutely opposed themselves, repelling for a season every project of the kind. Is it necessary for me to allude to the reduction of the Army—to say by whom it was made? Sir, the proposition for it was originally made by the personage now addressing you; it came from what was then considered the Governmental side of the House. And by whom was it opposed? By gentlemen who had so long fought under the banners of a Government of "energy," that they were not content to submit to the diminution of its patronage or its power, even in the hands of their political opponents. I speak of facts. Such a case will never occur again. Nay, indeed, in a little time, the sweets of power had their effect on one side of the House, as the frowns of adversity had upon the other; and, after a while, the court and country parties as easily changed sides as right and left do when a man turns upon his heel.

Yes, sir, the tone of this House was soon changed. We succeeded, however, in the reduction of the Army; but I will trust to the recollection of gentlemen, upon all sides of the House, by what instrumentality this change was effected.

The Commander of that Army was retained in his position. I have not leisure, health, or strength, to go into the details; gentlemen will remember them. Meanwhile, peace with this country was negotiated in France by the Commissioners sent by Mr. Adams, and was followed up very soon afterwards by the short respite that the truce of Amiens gave to European combatants, wearied rather than satiated with slaughter. These events placed this country in the happiest condition. Of the proceeds of the direct and internal taxes voted by the predecessors of the administration of Mr. Jefferson, one moiety at least came into the Treasury after their dismissal from office. But these proceeds were not necessary to give an overflow of money into the Treasury, which we never ceased to have until we departed from those principles of government and that policy which brought us into power. We sailed on for some time in the full tide of successful experiment, unobstructed by squalls or adverse gales, if we except only the Yazoo breeze. That question was, if I forget not, the first cause of a breach between those persons who had a direct lead in the Government of the country. There were men who did not hesitate, in opposition to all the heads of your Departments, to throw themselves into the breach at that time attempted in the Constitution of the country, to defend it, and to defend it with success. It appears, from some documents that have lately been laid upon our table, that errors of that day have been perceived, and that tender consciences which at that time revolted, are now entirely reconciled to the compromise which was then stamped with the reprobation of almost every honest man from Georgia to Virginia. There were considerations of personal feeling which gave to other parts of the Union, and to certain individuals therein, a bias on that subject; and I should be extremely sorry to be considered as passing anything like general censure upon the advocates of that measure in or out of this House. I refer only, of course, to those who were not parties concerned in the fraud.

At that time, sir, all was prosperity and joy. At that time were accumulated in the Treasury those surplusses which, in one year, nearly equalled the sum for which, in the present year, the revenue is deficient, notwithstanding the loan of last year, and to make up which deficiency the head of the Treasury has been able to devise no other means than a resort to new loans. Yes, sir, there were then those surplusses in the Treasury, the ghosts of which lingered along its vaults for a time after their corporeal bodies departed, and were then heard of no more.

But to proceed. The expenditures of the Government, during the first four years of the Jefferson Administration, exclusive of payments on account of the public debt, averaged only eight millions of dollars a year. In the four last years of the Jefferson Administration, those expenditures were very greatly increased, amounting in the year 1808, (the last of the four,) without any increase of Army and Navy expenditures, to upwards of sixteen millions of dollars—rivalling the expenditures of any one year of Mr. Adams's war, and amounting to one-half as much as was expended by the Father of his Country in his eight years of the Presidency, during which he was called upon to establish public credit, to maintain a bloody Indian war, and to lay the foundation of that character of integrity which the Government has so long sustained abroad, notwithstanding the misconduct of its rulers. Yes, sir, it is a curious but notorious fact, that in 1808 and 1809—and I speak of 1809, for, although the present incumbent came into office on the third of March of that year, expenses were incurred and voted in his predecessor's time—the expenditures of the Government outraged all belief when compared with the objects on which they were lavished. And here, Mr. Chairman, let me put it to you, and to the gentleman on my right, if it be within the compass of any man's powers to detract more from the merit of an administration of the Government of the United States in managing at least one branch of the revenue than has been done by that honorable gentleman? What has he said? I will not repeat his words; to do so would be odious, invidious; but I well know, if what he did say had come from the other side of the House, it would have been set down to the rancor of party spirit; to personal spleen; or to want of respect for the White house, or the Red house, or some other house. What has become of that vast amount of money? No man knows; and, to the best of my knowledge and belief, so help me God, no man will ever know.

I find, as I anticipated, a difficulty in dragging along my miserable body, and my feeble mind in this discussion; a difficulty not less, perhaps, than that of dragging along with me the attention of members of this House: I ask its patience, its pardon, and its pity.

But to continue. In this prosperous state of our country, the war in Europe was renewed, or about to be renewed. The Government of the United States would naturally, from the situation of affairs in that quarter of the world, experience a temporary diminution in its revenue, which it need not feel or regard, because it had been enabled to make that noble provision for a sinking fund, for lessening the national debt, for paying off the mortgages on the estate of every man in the country and of those who are unborn. It had made that noble provision, which was attempted to be diverted to the necessities created by the policy of the last four years of Jefferson's Administration, and the actual diversion of which, I believe, was the first act of this Administration. It had made that appropriation of eight millions of dollars for a sinking fund, not to be touched for any other purpose, and which, at the time of the appropriation, no man dared to believe would be gambled away.

The war in Europe brought to this country, among other birds of passage, a ravenous flock of neutralized carriers, which interposed the flag of neutrality, not only between the property, but even between the persons of the two belligerent

Powers; and it was their clamor principally, aided by the representations of those of our merchants who saw and wished to participate in the gains of such a commerce, that the first step was taken in that policy of restriction, which it was then foreseen would lead to the disastrous condition in which we now find ourselves. Yes, it was then foreseen and foretold. What was then prophesied is now history. It is so. "You," said the prophet, "are prospering beyond all human example. You, favorites of Almighty God, while all the rest of the world are scourged, and ravaged, and desolated by war, are about to enter into a policy called preventive of war; a policy which comes into this House in the garb of peace, but which must end in war." And in war it has ended. Yes, sir, we have been tortured, fretted, goaded, until at last, like some poor man driven from his family by discord at home, who says to himself, "anything, even exile, is better than this," we have said that we will take war; we will take anything for a change. And when war came, what said the people? They said, "anything for a change!"

At that time circumstances occurred, and I hope the House will pardon me for alluding to them. It is absolutely necessary that I should do so. They have been spoken of by others before me; they were at the time, and have been since detailed in the most solemn manner on the floor of this body. A denial of them has been challenged and never received. At that time, I repeat, circumstances occurred, which made it my duty to oppose the projects of the Executive Government of this country in its relations with foreign Powers.

At that time nothing that the Spanish Government could do, not even the invasion of our own territory, not even the capture and carrying off, not from our decks, but our soil, a portion of our citizens, could rouse this House to a spirit which would, in my judgment, have comported not only with its honor, but was absolutely indispensable to its dignity. We were wanting in the assertion of the rights of our own country over its soil and jurisdiction, by which assertion, then, we might have averted the calamities which have since befallen us; but a project for that purpose, recommended by the committee to whom that subject was referred, did not meet the approbation of the House. And from that day and date, the black cloud has thickened over us; has become more and more dense. From that day and date, have we departed from those counsels—in my humble judgment, at least—from those principles, adherence to which had induced the people of the United States to clothe us with their power and confidence.

What have we done since? From that day, with a short interruption, the policy of this Government has actually subserved, as far as it could, the purposes of France. I speak of facts; of facts susceptible of proof, which may be felt, seen, touched, heard, and understood by all except those too indolent to examine them, or too ignorant for the light of truth to have any effect upon their understandings. I say, sir, that the policy of this Government has, from that time, subserved the purposes of France. And how do I prove it? Why, sir, by way of meeting the French decrees, which prohibit to us all intercourse with Great Britain, we cut off the intercourse between us and the whole world. We virtually held out to our great commercial cities—to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Charleston—the same language as Bonaparte had held to his own cities: “I know that you are suffering, and ‘unhappy; that the grass is growing in your streets; that the ships at your wharves are rotting, until they are fit only for fuel; that your trade is dwindling to nothing; but what is all that to my Continental system? What are a few seaport towns—enterprising, wealthy, and prosperous, as indeed they are—what are they, compared to my Continental system?” And, sir, what was our “restrictive” system? Similar in point of effect—certainly contemporaneous in point of time—to Bonaparte’s “Continental system.” Sir, it is a matter susceptible of demonstration, if I possessed the physical power to go through with it, that the system recommended by the then President of the United States, of laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in our ports, for the purpose of “keeping in safety these essential resources,” took place in consequence of a communication from our Minister in Paris to this Government, transmitting certain correspondence of his with the French Government. And although, in his Message to both Houses of Congress, recommending the measure, the President does use the term “belligerent Powers,” I do attest the fact, and I call upon other gentlemen, who know it, to attest it also, that, while the Message purposely referred to both “belligerents,” not one scrip of manuscript relating to the other “belligerent” accompanied that Message; nor was there anything contained in that Message relating to that “belligerent,” but a scrap from an English paper, about the size of a square of its columns, containing some speculations of a London editor; and I say that there did not exist in this House, nor in this nation—if there did, let the evidence be produced—any knowledge of the existence of the Orders in Council, which have been put forward as justifying the embargo. If their existence had been known at the time, would the President in his Message recommending an embargo have failed to notice the fact? Would he not have used it as one of the strongest inducements to the adoption of this system? Would those “orders” not have been published in the National Intelligencer, which is considered—and certainly not without cause, in view of certain things which we have lately seen in it—to be the Court paper? Produce the National Intelligencer of that date; there is not one syllable to be found in it concerning the Orders in Council. No, sir; in his Message on the occasion referred to, the President did not produce any acts of the “belligerents” referred to, but only the correspondence between General Armstrong, our Minister at Paris, and that Government, on the subject of the construction of one of its first decrees. It was in consequence of the more recent decrees of France, and not of the British Orders in Council, that the embargo was recommended and laid. And yet, in the discussion which came off on that measure, it was represented as a weapon against England, which would be more efficient than any war, and must bring her to our feet: it would give effect to the object, which Bonaparte had in view, of destroying her by consumption, by cutting her off from the commerce of the world. Although I state these facts, I know that it may be proven—and I am sorry that it can—by reference to the Journals of this House, and by a report, too, of an honorable and respectable committee of this House, that the embargo was designed to obviate the effects of the Orders in Council.

But, sir, it is indisputably true, that there was no mention in the embargo Message of those Orders in Council—no allusion to them in debate upon it—no knowledge of them at the time that the embargo law was passed, that can be proven by any document whatsoever entitled to the least respect; and I will even go so far as to allow as evidence the authority of any newspaper. The members of that committee had heard so much of the Orders in Council, and the effect that it was pretended that the embargo would have upon them, that in their report, speaking of them, they absolutely transposed cause and effect. It is unfortunate that it should be so; but it is nevertheless true. Events subsequent to the period to which I have now brought myself have been detailed in this debate in a manner so clear, so lucid, so convincing, by two honorable gentlemen from New York, that there is no need of my repeating the narrative: but I must be permitted to say that the statement made yesterday by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) will be refuted when Euclid shall come to be considered a shallow sophist, and not before. My honorable friend from the same State, who spoke a few days ago, called upon gentlemen to handle that part of the subject—the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and the inveiglement thereby of this country into a war with England—in a manner more able than, he was pleased to say, he himself had done it. The attempt to do this would, indeed, be to gild refined gold, to paint the lily, to add to the perfume of the violet—in all cases a most ridiculous and wasteful excess. And yet, sir, the situation in which I unhappily stand, and in which it was my lot to stand at the conclusion of the last session of Congress, compels me to say a word on this subject. You will remember, sir, that it was my misfortune, during the first session of this Congress, to oppose the attempt to impress upon this House and the nation certain most preposterous, absurd, and false propositions; for the temerity of which effort I came under the censure—implied, at least, if not to say direct—of this honorable body. The contrary propositions, which I undertook to maintain, were, first, that the Berlin and Milan decrees were not repealed on the first of November, 1810, and that the only evidence of any such repeal, up to that date, was the President's Proclamation of the second of that month; and secondly, that the British Orders in Council did, in point of fact, establish no serious insurmountable obstacle to negotiation between that Government and the United States. Why, sir, I shall not here go into any argument on this point; if I had the ability, I have not the will; and, if I had the will, I have not the ability. Nor can it be necessary, when the Emperor of France himself comes into court, and cannot reject his own authority, as borne in his own laws. Yes, sir, he did come forth, and, in his antedated decree of the 28th of April, 1811—though it unquestionably ought to bear date full twelve months later—does, in the most offensive of all possible ways, establish the fact, not only that the Berlin and Milan decrees were not repealed (as all the world knew except the President of the United States,) on the first of November, 1810, but that they were in his mind when he issued his decree, dated 28th April, 1811. They were repealed, finally, in consequence—of what? Of your doing that which for years he had been attempting, by menace and blandishment, to induce you to do—that is to say, embark in war with England, taking sides with France, “causing,” as the phrase was, “our flag to be respected.” And this, too, after your having posted up in the ledger of this House that war with one of the “belligerents” was equivalent to submission to the other!

My other proposition was, that the Orders in Council constituted no insurmountable obstacle to negotiation between this country and Great Britain. And what was the fact in regard to them? Why, that almost at the time that this position was taken on this floor—a few weeks only thereafter—the Orders in Council were repealed.

I put it to you, sir, and to the great mass of the people of this country—to the honest, laborious, unsuspecting, kind-hearted, confiding, generous, and just people—had the fact been known that the French decrees were not repealed, and that the Orders in Council were repealed, whether any man, in any station, would have had the confidence to propose a declaration of war against England, taking part against her, and siding with France in the conflict in which those nations are engaged?

And, whilst I am upon this subject, permit me to say, suppose the proposition which was repeatedly made—in more than one instance by the person who is now addressing you, and supported with the greatest ability by gentlemen on the other side of the House—to postpone our declaration of war against Great Britain until the autumn, when we might be in some state of preparation and readiness for it—had succeeded, what would have been the consequence? At this time we should have been at peace; we should have been lying secure in that snug safe haven of neutrality, in which the good sense of the greatest and best men of this country have always attempted to moor the public ship. Now, where are we? And shall this war be called a popular war; a war of the people; a war called for by the public voice, into which this country has been plunged, not more by the agency of the friends of Government than of its enemies, in the hope of the latter that this Administration would sink and founder in it, and they rise to power thereupon? Is it possible that that can be deemed a war of the people, a popular war, which has enabled a gentleman known to be of the most respectable connexions, and possessed, I believe, of considerable talent—but who, put in competition with the veteran politician now at the helm of Government, is but a boy in politics—a person whose pretensions are so extremely inferior, to rival the present Chief Magistrate in the confidence of the people, and for a time, as you know, make him tremble for his reelection? It is, however, some consolation to reflect that, in all free Governments, the public voice will sooner or later be heard upon all their measures, and in condemnation of those which the opinion of that public detests and execrates. This is a great law of politics; it is to the political what gravitation is to the physical world; it cannot be counteracted. Statesmen know it, feel it; they do not reason to it, but from it; they never lose sight of it, but are guided by it in all their measures. And those of us who live to see the next Congress, will live to see the effects of that law in this House.

Sir, we have passed so many laws, we have had so many objects for enticing the belligerents on the one hand and coercing them on the other, and enticing and coercing them together, that I feel some little difficulty, in the present state of my brain, in referring to them by title or date; but it is the law passed on this subject, in consequence of which the celebrated letter of the 1st of August of the Duc de Cadore was written, to which I desire most particularly to refer. If, after the proclamation of the President of the United States of the 1st of November thereafter, issued in consequence of that letter, revoking so much of our non-intercourse law as related to France, an unbroken warfare being kept up by France on our commerce—a fact as notorious as the existence of any fact in nature—was it not good cause for reinstating the law in relation to France, and putting her on her ancient ground? Then I would be glad to know, for one, whether our continuing at war with England was any better cause for keeping up the interdiction in relation to her, after she had revoked her Orders in Council? In other words, it being admitted by gentlemen on one side, as it has been contended by gentlemen on the other, that the revocation of the Orders in Council by Great Britain was such a one as did satisfy the terms of the non-intercourse act, what was the reason that the proclamation required by our law in such case did not issue? Why, sir, the state of war between the United States and Great Britain being offensive on our part—being of our own making—was held to be a cause why we cannot execute our law as relates to her. Now, whilst the continued war upon us by France, by seizures of our merchant vessels and their cargoes, is not considered an obstacle to its execution in regard to her, is it not as clear as the noon-day sun, that if the making of war by France on the United States did not constitute any good cause for withholding the revocation as to her, when she professed to have repealed her Berlin and Milan decrees, there was no reason why it should not have been extended to Great Britain also, when she actually repealed her Orders in Council?

I am extremely at a loss to say whether my judgment, my memory, my imagination, or my command of words, fit me for the expression of the few scattered ideas I have on this subject; I fear that they may fail me. But I believe it will be conceded, on all hands, that if, after the revocation of the British Orders in Council, the President of the United States had, as he honorably might have done, made that repeal the basis of negotiation with Great Britain, there is not a man in this country—certainly there is none among his admirers and adherents—who would not have hailed him as the restorer of the peace and prosperity of the country, which had been so idly (I had almost said so wickedly) disturbed. But, regardless of every consequence, we went into war with England as an inconsiderate couple go into matrimony, without considering whether they have the means of sustaining their own existence, much less that of any unfortunate progeny that should happen to be born of them. The sacrifice was made. The blood of Christians enjoying the privileges of jury trial, of the writ of habeas corpus, of the freedom of conscience, of the blessings of civil liberty, citizens of the last Republic that ambition has left upon the face of a desolate earth—the blood of such a people was poured out as an atonement to the Moloch of France. The Juggernaut of India is said to smile when it sees the blood flow from the human sacrifice which its worship exacts: the Emperor of France might now smile upon us. But no, sir, our miserable offering is spurned. The French monarch turns his nose and his eyes another way. He snuffs on the plains of Moscow a thousand hecatombs, waiting to be sacrificed on the shrine of his ambition; and the city of the Czars, the largest in the world, is to be at once the altar and the fire of sacrifice to his miserable ambition. And what injury has the Emperor of Russia done to him? For what was he contending? For national existence; for a bare existence; for himself and the people who are subject to his sway. And what, sir, are you doing? Virtually fighting the battles of his foes; surrendering yourself to the views of his adversary, without a plea—without anything to justify your becoming the victims of his blasting ambition.

Yes, sir, after having for years attempted to drive us by menace into war with England, when he has seen us fairly embarked in it, and the champions of human rights bleeding in his cause, the Ruler of France has turned with contempt from your reclamations; he has left your Minister, who was charged with those reclamations, to follow him in his Russian campaign, to whip up his jaded Pegasus, and, travelling at his heels, to overtake him if he can.

For these injuries and insults what atonement has been made? What satisfaction has been received for your plundered property? And what is the relation in which you stand to France? At this moment, when it is well known that it would not require one additional man in the Army or Navy to make good, in the eye of nations, your character as an independent and high-spirited people, you are prostrate at the feet of your's and the world's Undoer. Is there anything yet wanting to fill up the full measure of injustice you have sustained? Gentlemen on all sides are obliged to admit that the provocation which we have received from France is ample; that the cup of it is overflowing. And yet, what is our situation in relation to that destroyer of mankind—him who, devising death to all that live, sits like a cormorant on the tree of life; who cannot be gluttied, nor tired, with human carnage; the impersonation of death; himself an incarnate death?

All this, I say, does prove—and if it does not I call on gentlemen to disprove the fact—that there is a difference in the standard by which we measure French aggressions and the aggressions of any other people under the sun. When Spain was the ally of France she was—what? She was secure from our indignation. There was not a murderer, a barbarian, in all our Western wilderness that was not safe under the Spanish cloak. For why? Because the King of Spain, such as he was—for he wore only the semblance of a crown—was in alliance with France; and he must not be touched.

But what has Revolutionary Spain done? What offence has she committed against France? That she is not only helpless, destitute of resources, unable to return a blow, but, above all, is covered by France, are considerations which cannot justify, on the part of France, conduct towards her more infamous than that of the English at Copenhagen—conduct cowardly as it is unprincipled. But, sir, I forewarn gentlemen of the Southern country—I do beseech them, with a sincerity which no man can have a right to question—to beware how they transfer the theatre of war from the rocks and snows of Canada to the sand-hills, the rice-fields, the tobacco plantations of the Southern States. For them to think of voluntarily consenting to make that region the theatre of the war would compel me to believe that they are on the verge of that madness which precedes the destruction of all doomed by Heaven to perish.

Sir, I have just touched, with trembling and faltering hand, some of the preliminary observations which I had intended, at some time or other, to make, into which I have now been prematurely forced to enter, not more unexpectedly than unavoidably, by the strange turn which this debate has taken.

There are two other points—for, in respect to the Orders of Council, I shall not say a word about them—upon which I am very anxious to offer myself to your attention: the one the celebrated point of impressment, which, though it has been very ably handled, is not yet exhausted: the other the Indian war on our Western border. And I also wish to say something on the subject of negotiation. In the midst of a war with one of the greatest Powers of Europe, why should the gleam of the tomahawk and the scalping-knife, the cries of massacred women and children reaching our ears—why should these fright us from our propriety? Why, we are told the Indians of the West have been stirred up to war with us by British agents. But what is the fact? That we have no Indian war but a war of our own seeking, as I have already, in the course of this session, read to you certain proofs; and I will now give you another. It is this: It is agreed on all hands—no man has attempted to dispute it—that, in the affair of the battle of Tippecanoe, the commander and the officers distinguished themselves by the greatest gallantry. How has it happened, then, that while we have been freely voting medals to those gallant officers of our navy who have distinguished themselves on the ocean—and I hope we shall vote them something more substantial—not a whisper has been heard in relation to those who have been engaged in this expedition against the Indians? The subject has not been even inquired into.

Do we know, at this moment, as a Legislature, the causes of that disastrous business—I call it so from its consequences—or by whose authority this war was made? Or, is it come to this: that Governors of our Territories are to consider themselves as so many Hastings and Wellesleys of our country, and that, while they do not involve us in war with Christians like themselves, they may go to any extent in exterminating the Red Barbarians here as in the East Indies Governors and Proconsuls of the British Government do there in regard to uncivilized Powers of that quarter of the globe? Is it discovered that our Territorial Governors may at pleasure invade the territory of other nations—for, inconsiderable and contemptible though they be, the Indian tribes are nations—in like manner that the British authorities make war upon those nations of the East? Yes, sir, not only is this a war of our own seeking—not only we had it in our power to keep the peace—but in the country which was the scene of the battle, and in the adjacent country, it was the most popular war ever waged. The frontier people of this country have been in the habit of driving the heathen before them; and to them the chase of the deer, the elk, and the antelope, is not so grateful as that of the red men they hunt. I believe that it is the cause of serious regret to many of the people of the West that there is now no longer any motive to drive them from their lands. As to the Red Men, the Big-Knives have, without any foreign prompting or instigation, driven them off from a country more extensive than that over which the Emperor of France yields his sceptre. So I put aside this item of Indian war altogether as a matter of account in the list of our grievances against the British Government. There is not a shadow of foundation for believing that these Indians were or could have been instigated to take up the hatchet against us until hostile arms had been taken up against them. When driven to the wall they must fight or die—the last alternative left to them—for which nobody can blame them.

It was, sir, a saying of one of the best men who ever wrote, in correspondence with a friend, that he had not time to write a shorter letter; and I can truly say that I have not time to deliver a shorter speech. I know that this question will be taken to-day, for I have been so admonished; and my own very severe and sudden indisposition, which I am almost ashamed to name, will compel me to detain your attention much longer than under other circumstances would have been the case.

A word, now, on the subject of impressment. Our foreign trade had grown beyond the capacity of either our tonnage or seamen to manage. Our mercantile marine was an infant Hercules; but it was overloaded beyond its strength: the crop was too abundant to be gathered by our hands alone. The consequence was, and a natural one too, that not only the capitalists flocked into our country from abroad to share in our growing commerce, but the policy also of our Government was adapted to it, and a law was passed to enable us to avail ourselves of the services of British seamen and seamen of other countries. And, in doing this, we availed ourselves of the pretext—which, as long as the countries to which they belonged winked at it, was fair for us to use—of taking these British seamen for Americans. It was in 1796 that commenced the act, to which reference has been made, and that system of “protections,” as they were called, the very mention of which, at this day, causes a burst of honest indignation in the breast of citizens whose situation enables them to ascertain their true character. If these “protections” so termed, have not been forged all over Europe, it is only for the reason that the notes of a certain bank of which I have heard have not been forged, viz: that, the bank being broke, its notes were so worthless that people would not even steal them. The “protections” are attainable by everybody; by men of all ages, countries, and descriptions. They are a mere farce. The issuing of them has gone far to disgrace the character of the country, and has brought into question and jeopardy the rights of real American citizens. This question of impressment, delicate as it has been said to be—difficult as in one view it certainly is—is, of all others, in my judgment, the most compact. With the gentleman from New York, I will say that the tide of emigration has brought to the shores of our country many most valuable characters; some of them persons with whom I have the honor of being in habits, not only of intimacy, but friendship. I believe there does not exist one man of this description, who comes bona fide to this country to settle himself and children here, that would require you to go to war on his account. And, sir, I believe that the belligerent position itself in which you now find yourself will relieve you in a great degree of this evil, for many seamen who have so long, by virtue of these "protections," passed themselves off for American, will find it to be very convenient to be Portuguese or Swedish seamen, or seamen of some other State than the United States—some State that is not at war with England. Sir, there is a wide difference between the character of American seamen and seamen of every other country on earth. The American seaman has a home on the land, a domicile, a wife and children, to whom he is attached, to whom he is in the habit of returning after his voyages; with whom he spends, sometimes, a long vacation from the toils of maritime life. It is not so with the seamen of other countries. For the protection of men of the first description, I am disposed, if necessary, to use the force of the country, but for no other. I know, indeed, that some gentlemen who have spoken much on the subject of the principle of impressment, will tell you that the right to take from a neutral vessel one seaman, if carried to its extent, involves a right to take any, or all seamen. Why, sir, in like manner it might be argued that the taking illegally of one vessel at sea involves the right to take every vessel. And yet, sir, who ever heard of two nations going to war about a single case of capture, though admitted not to be justified by the laws? Such a case never did and never will occur.

Of one thing we are certain: it rests upon no doubtful ground: that Great Britain, rather than surrender the right of impressing her own seamen, will nail her colors to the mast, and go down with them. And she is right, because, when she does surrender it, she is Sampson shorn of his strength: the sinews of her power are cut. I say this openly in the House of Representatives; and I am not communicating to the enemy a secret of any value, because she has herself told us that she can never surrender it. She has told us so, not when she stood in the relation of an enemy toward us, but in the friendly intercourse of the British Ministry with our late Commissioners at London. Turn to the book: I wish the honorable gentleman, if he has it, would for a moment let me have the use of it. You are told in that book that every effort was made by the American Commissioners to effect a relaxation of this right; that the British Ministry evinced the sincerest desire to give satisfaction to them on this point: but what? The Admiralty was consulted; they waked up out of their slumbers the Civilians at Doctors' Commons to deliberate upon it; and they came to the conclusion that the Government of Great Britain could not give up that right. Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, the Commissioners of the United States to negotiate a treaty with the Government of Great Britain, in their correspondence with their own Government, give this fact to excuse themselves for failing to accomplish their object, and to prove that everything had been done that could be on their part, and everything conceded on the other side that the most friendly disposition could warrant—and here I do not speak of masked friendship, but of real friendship. Although everything possible had been done, this right of impressment of her own seamen was a sine qua non on the part of Great Britain—one which would not, could not, must not, be surrendered. And, sir, if this question of the right of impressment was one on which we were to go to war with Great Britain, we ought to have gone to war then; because we were then told by the highest authority in that Government that this was a point which never would be given up.

I find, sir, that I cannot trust my broken voice to read the book, now that it is in my hand, but must rely upon my recollection for facts.

Now, this question lies as I have said, in a very small compass. The right of Great Britain to take her own seamen from your merchant vessels, (if it be a right,) is one which she has exercised ever since you were a People, wherever occasions for its exercise have occurred. Will you not only go to war, but wage a bellum ad internecinum for it? Will you wage an endless war of extermination for this right, which, you have known for two and twenty years of your national existence, she will not relinquish? A gentleman from Tennessee, of whose capacity few men have more respectful opinion than myself, has quoted the diplomatic correspondence as far back as 1792, to show what General WASHINGTON's opinions were on this question of impressment, and this opinion of the Father of his Country is now held up to the people of the United States for the purpose of enlisting their prejudices in the conviction that, by involving the country in warfare, we are at this moment treading in the footsteps of that great man, and acting upon his principles. Nothing can be more untrue. To say that the Treaty of Louisiana was negotiated two years after the letter of instruction quoted from the WASHINGTON Administration, and that that treaty contained no provision on this point, is a reply in full to this course of argument. But what does the correspondence referred to prove? What every treaty, what every negotiation, has proven: that England would not give up this point, although she made offers for guarding against abuse—offers more favorable to us than ours to her. And yet the Administration of this Government have had the hardihood or the folly to plunge the nation into a war for it—for a point on which General Washington, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Jefferson, men differing from each other as much as may be in every aspect, had been content to negotiate, rather than go to war for its assertion.

What was the offer made to our Government by the British Ministry? If I do not forget, their offer was that they would not impress American seamen if our Government would not employ British seamen. Their offer to us was not accepted, but it was beyond question, in my opinion, more beneficial than the proposition which we on that occasion made to them.

But it may be said that the right of search cannot be endured; that the protection of our flag must be held inviolate; that if a search of our ships be permitted for British seamen, they may actually take American seamen. Sir, there is no doubt of the fact that by mistake, sometimes perhaps by wilful misconduct, on the part of officers engaged in the search, such a thing may happen. But, should we not think it exceedingly strange that the misconduct of an officer of the American Government, in one case in twenty if you will, should be a cause of war for any nation against us? It is one of these cases which does occur, and will forever occur, to a neutral Power, whenever a general war is lighted up. It is one of the prices which this country has to pay for its rapid accession of wealth, such as is unheard of in the annals of any other nation but our own. And this, sir, is the state of things in which we have undertaken, in children's language, to quarrel with our bread and butter; and to identify ourselves with one of the belligerents in a war in which we have no proper concern. I will not touch at all the abstract question of the right of impressment: it has been so much more ably handled by others that I shall not say a word about it. I address myself to the common sense of the planter, the farmer, the agriculturist of our country—are you willing upon such grounds as these to continue this war? I have no doubt what will be their answer.

On these subjects I have delivered my sentiments more than once before in this House. I think of them with horror as the accursed cause of this war. Not that the men who are in power are worse men than other people, but that they have brought upon this land of peace and freedom issues the end of which it would be impossible for any human being to divine.

One thing is certain, that the right of search does practically exist, and has been acknowledged by all nations. The President of the United States and his Secretary of State, as great masters of the Law of Nations, will be among the first to acknowledge it; they have acknowledged it, and, by our treaties with foreign Powers, this country has heretofore acknowledged it, so far as concerns the right to search for contraband goods and enemy's property. Suppose that there are notorious abuses under this right: should we be justified in declaring that no search whatever of our merchant vessels shall be allowed? There is no doubt that, under the color of the right of search—for I am advocating its lawful purposes only—abuses have been committed on neutrals; and as long as men exist it will be so. The liability to abuse of this right is the price which neutrals pay for the advantages which they derive from their neutrality; and I should like to know whether it would be for me to join in the contest in which these belligerents are engaged for the recovery of my neutral rights. Where are those rights when great maritime Powers become belligerent? There are neutral rights undoubtedly, but there are also neutral duties. And shall a neutral nation, a nation which has in that character prospered and flourished more than any people on the face of the globe, sacrifice those rights and those advantages, and resort to war against one of those belligerents—and for what? For a point of honor! Yet, whilst in this Quixotic spirit we have gone to war with England; although we have been robbed, reviled, contemned throughout by the Emperor of France, we can see no cause of war with him!

What shall we say of the French doctrine in relation to this subject of impressment? If that has been dwelt upon in this debate by any honorable gentleman of this House it has escaped my notice. What is the French doctrine on this subject—established at the time when the United States stood in relations of peace and amity to that Power, when every heart beat high with sympathy for the success of French freedom; when some of those who have since transferred their admiration, I will not say their love, to the present Head of the French Government, to the enemy of French freedom, and all freedom, to all commerce, and right, and religion—at the time when some of those who have since so lamentably changed on this subject felt an interest for freedom and France scarcely inferior to that which they felt for freedom and America? What were then the doctrines of the French Government? That all who spoke the English language should be treated as Englishmen, unless they could give proof to the contrary; the onus probandi lying on those who spoke the language of Locke, and Newton, and Milton, and Shakspeare. Yes, sir, whilst the English Government establishes no such doctrine, the French Government acts upon the principle that speaking the English language is prima facie evidence of your being a British subject, and would justify their treating you as an enemy, the burden of the proof to the contrary being thrown upon yourself.

Sir, I have nothing to say on the subject of the Presidential Election—I have nothing to say of your choice of an occupant for the House that stands half-way between here and my lodgings. On that subject I have taken a bond of faith that, let whosoever may be in authority there—if the principles which I profess be such as the Government (the Administration) cannot practise upon, or at least such as they never will practise upon—and knowledge, experience, has taught me to distrust them—whosoever they desert the principles they and I have heretofore professed, I will maintain them: I never will be ashamed of them. They shall lift up their heads in States if not in Courts. They shall not be disparaged; and we have them on record. And, more, in the same volume in which they are to be found is contained the record of the antagonist doctrines, against which at that day we held up our hands. But, sir, be any man at the head of an army, unless it be a very small and contemptible one in force; of an army such as that of which we are now engaged in augmenting the force—an army to fill up the ranks of which it will take at least every tenth man in the country fit to bear arms—any man so posted may at his will step into the Presidential Chair; the form of an election by the People may remain, but the substance has gone. Yes, sir, whilst we are talking of thirty-five, or fifty, or sixty thousand men, we forget that the organization of such an army is a draught from that part of our population fit to bear arms, such as has been felt, and felt for half a century in succession, by some of the first countries in the world. In Europe, requisitions by Government for every tenth man fit to bear arms are considered enormous draughts. On paper such numbers make a formidable show. Many of them, however, we know, are not fit to bear arms. The actual number of no army in existence ever equalled the returns of that army. It is a fact exemplified in a manner not more curious than instructive, by a writer in the last century, that the number of men very rarely equals two-thirds of the number on the returns of an army: And just so it is with your militia. Is it supposed that all those men whose names are borne on the returns are in health, are in a situation to be at once capable and willing to bear arms? Unquestionably not. No, sir. Let me not, however, be understood to disparage the militia. It is not the least of my objections to this bill that it passes sentence of degradation on the militia; it cashiers them—runs them out of the regiment of the nation. I am a poor militiaman myself, sir; and I do not really choose to disparage my vocation; to consent that the militia of this country shall be degraded, held up to ridicule, have the finger of scorn pointed at it—for what purpose? To raise, at their expense, a great standing, military, mercenary force. Yes, sir, mercenary—mercenary. The militia are to be laughed at! And, why? Will you show me a militia officer or a militia private, who has gone as far in disgracing his country, whether we regard its reputation for courage or discretion—I do not mean that part of valor which consists in discretion—as the commanders of your armies of the centre, and your armies of the periphery, and of the circumference? Can you show me an instance of the kind? Sir, I honor the militia. They may be jeered at on this floor, but they compose the Constitutional army of this and every free country; and that country in which they are not honored, if already not in the jaws and gulf of despotism, is at the brink of that abyss. Honor, I say, to the militia.

I have another objection to the raising of this large additional army; that is to say, the financial situation of this nation. I do not know whether it is expected of me or not that I should go into that subject: certain I am that it is not hoped: certain I am that the opening of this view of the question must be deprecated by every member within the reach of my voice, and by no one more than by yourself. I slur it over, therefore, observing only that the state of the finances of this country presents to the world, and not less to ourselves, a sort of libel upon the policy of the country; or, that the policy of the country is a libel upon its finances. A parallel between them, so far from running on all fours, has not even a single leg to halt upon. What is the fact? When men of acknowledged ability—of acknowledged richness of invention—under the operation of every consideration that can operate on human passions and understanding; when such men, in their conduct, present such a picture as is presented to this country and the world by the head of the American Treasury, it may require sagacity, penetration, to discover the cause, the object, the motive, of such an exhibition, but surely none to discover the fact—which I will not characterize by the epithet which it deserves. For what is the fact? That, in the last session of Congress, it was represented to us that it was indispensable to the financial credit of the country—to the prosecution of this just and necessary war—to infuse into it proper vigor and energy, to place the country in “an armor and an attitude,” and all that—that a monstrous mass and burden of taxation should be imposed on the country. This was to eke out heavy deficits which might occur under that system of borrowing so often tried, (and rarely failing when it is conducted as it should be,) but ever failing when it is not bottomed on punctuality and good faith on the part of the borrower. And yet, sir, at this session of Congress, the Treasury finds itself without any resources for carrying on the Government and the war; and we have had presented to us a fresh prescription of taxes, which we were asked to swallow, being, as we were told, all for our good. Well, sir, after having had piled up on your table your batch of new tax bills—not, to be sure, the result of any very great labor on the part of those who prepared them; for, like most other bills of late presented to you, they are copied from the records of those very days of the Reign of Terror of which we sometimes hear—Mr. Secretary of the Treasury comes forward with his recommendation of a fresh resort to the resource of borrowing. He shows to you a beggarly account of empty boxes; and to fill them he proposes new loans, loans, loans! I know, sir, that in speaking of Mr. Secretary Gallatin it is necessary for every man in this nation to observe an especial caution; and, perhaps, it is fortunate for me that it is not in my power at this time to speak of this matter in the feeling by which I am animated in regard to it. But I may allow myself to state the naked fact, that the Secretary of the Treasury, by whose influence these tax bills were reported and have been voted upon in committee of supply, and who now tells you that they are not wanted, and, by fair inference, that they never will be, has, to say the least of it, trifled with the respect due from him to this body. He has trifled with the dignity of this House: I say so boldly—I say that he must show cause why, at the last session of Congress, these heavy taxes were represented to be indispensable to the carrying on of the Government, and now, forsooth, that there is not, nor has been, any occasion for them. How much must my respectable colleague on my right be relieved by this information, after having sacrificed himself for the good of his country by moving the reconsideration of the tax upon salt! Yes, sir, all this time the balance-master of the Treasury has really been trifling with the dignity of the House. He has been either false to himself or false to the nation; and, if he has not, let it be shown that he has not, and I shall be the first man to make him the amende honorable—in the strict, true, dignified sense of that term.

I must now say a word on the subject of Mr. Russell, and his overtures, his "negotiations," so called, with the British Government. I know, or at least believe, that he had no more power to negotiate with the British Government than I had, because there is only one mode in which such a power could be conferred under the Constitution and the law. Now, sir, if he had been really nominated and appointed with the consent of the Senate in quality of Minister Plenipotentiary to London, he then would have had power to negotiate with the British Government; but not otherwise. While I state this, I hope I shall not be misunderstood to suppose that it was competent for Lord Castlereagh, or anybody else, to question his authority any further than as resulting from his instructions. It was competent for the English diplomat to call for his instructions and powers; but I should forever lift up my hand and voice against the right of any foreign Government to question the mode by which this authority was devolved on the agent: I do not find that in this case it has been; but I have no hesitation in saying—broad as the declaration may be thought, fatigued as I am, and as little under my command as my judgment in such a case may be supposed to be—that the proposition of Mr. Russell to Lord Castlereagh, in regard to the point of impressment, was an insult, not upon him, Lord Castlereagh, but upon me, you, and the whole body of the American people. What was the offer? I cannot quote the words, but the substance is impressed upon my memory. It was, that England should, in addition to forthwith repealing the Orders in Council, immediately consent to discontinue the impressment of persons found on board American vessels, with the understanding that the British Government would assent to enter, as soon as may be, into definite arrangements to the same effect. This proposition called upon her to yield—what? That which, in the letter of the American Commissioners of November 11, 1806, the gentleman told us England would never yield until she yielded the Tower of London, or words to that effect—a point which she had announced to this Government, sub sigillo, that she never would yield. That very thing being yielded, Mr. Russell informed the British Ministry he was ready to commence a negotiation for the suspension of hostilities between the two countries! It was an insult upon every man in the country, to call that a proposal for negotiation. The declaration in the year 1806 (the very one to which I have referred) is contained in the letter in this book, in which our Government was informed, by our Ministers at London, that England would not, under any circumstances, abandon this right; and that, even if the Ministers were to consent to do so, public opinion would not allow of it. Permit me, sir, in passing, while noticing this letter of the 11th of November, to call the attention of the House to a fact which I mentioned twice while the House sat with doors closed, but which I have never seen referred to in any of the public prints, and heard mentioned but by one gentleman in private conversation. It is this: We all know of the declaration of the British Commissioners, superadded to the rejected treaty, after the promulgation of the French decree of November, 1806; we all know the handle made of this note as a ground for the rejection of that treaty; and yet proof exists, in this volume, that, more than one month before the existence of the British Commissioners' "note" of the 31st of December, and nearly six weeks before its existence was officially known to the President of the United States, that treaty—the terms of which and authors of which have improperly been brought into question before this House—that treaty of 1806 was condemned. Condemned, how? I believe that I can refer pretty readily to the evidence of the fact in this book, although I have not doubled down or dog's-eared it.

[Mr. R. here read from a letter from Mr. Secretary Madison to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, acknowledging the receipt of information from them, under the date of November 11, 1806, of the agreement of the Ministers of the two Governments upon the projet of a treaty, with a copy of the draught of it. In that letter the Secretary states the views of the President, (Mr. JEFFERSON,) as follows:

"The turn which the negotiation has taken was not expected, and exacts as much of regret as of disappointment. * * * The result of his (the President's) deliberations is, that it does not comport with his views of the national sentiment or of the national policy, that any treaty should be entered into with the British Government which would include no article providing for the case, (of impressment.) * * * The President thinks it more eligible, under all circumstances, that, if no satisfactory or formal stipulation on the subject of impressment be attainable, the negotiation shall be made to terminate without any formal compact whatever."]

It was not known, at the time, to use a lawyer's phrase, that our Government was in the quo animo of rejecting that treaty; and yet, strange to tell, the negotiators of that treaty of 1806 were put under the ban, not of the Emperor of France, but of faction at home, for having dared to negotiate a treaty with the obnoxious "Note" of December 1, from the British Commissioners, attached to it. Strange as may appear the fact, it is nevertheless true, and is a lamentable proof of the weakness of poor human nature, never enough to be deprecated, that the admission of one of these Commissioners of the United States—these very missionaries of peace and conciliation—into the Executive Councils of this country has been the signal of war with Great Britain. I speak of facts: I have nothing to do with opinion on the subject of them. I will not trust myself on the subject of opinion. I speak of the fact.

And, sir, is it nothing to the bill which we are now debating, for raising an additional army of twenty thousand men—or is it a departure from order to hint on this floor at a circumstance which all men are employed and occupied in discussing at their fire-sides?—that this army, to constitute an aggregate of fifty-five thousand regular troops, is about to be put under the control of the man who was the author of the Anonymous Letters at Newburg at the close of the Revolutionary war, inciting a handful of men, the remnant of the old American army—perhaps not numbering six thousand altogether—to give a master to the nation? Is that a consideration to have no weight upon such a question as this? With me, sir, it is conclusive. I will tell gentlemen on both sides of the House that a Government or a man may despise a calumny—that the arrows of slander will fall blunt and harmless upon them—provided that the Government and the man be true to itself and himself. Yes, sir, ask yourself this question in regard to any man to whom you are about to confide important trusts: Does he pay his just debts? Is he a man of truth? Does he discharge as he ought the duties of a friend, a brother, in society? After having done that, be his politics what they may, and his peculiarity of opinion in politics what it may, he is a good man; he acquires the esteem of all who know him; he is impenetrable to mere vulgar calumny. This Government ought to employ men of real worth and capacity: it is not always that those showing qualities attracting attention in private life, or as companions, are of real capacity. Do those who administer the Government make it a rule to employ in the public service none but men of real capacity, or worth, of integrity, and of high character? Do they give their contracts and offices, without fear, favor, or affection, to men of responsibility and character—to such men as you would in private life give your own contracts to? Or do they bestow them, as is done in some Governments differently constituted from ours, where church preferment and military preferment are sometimes made a dirty job of Parliamentary interest? Do they employ men of clean hands, with fair characters; or is every caiffiff, without examination, welcome to their arms, provided he can bring with him the proof of his treachery to his former employers? It depends on these facts whether confidence is due to any Administration of the Government.

Sir, I have much yet to say which appeared to me, when I rose, not to be unworthy your attention; but I confess to you, with feelings something like contrition, that my opinion on this subject has undergone a change.

There is one point, however, on which I do not know how to speak in this place with the reverence which is due to it. I cannot pass it over, and yet I know not how to touch it. Yes, sir, there is one reflection pressing itself as a crown of thorns upon my own head, which I am bound to present to the consideration of this Assembly and this people. Is it fitting that the only two nations among whom the worship of the true God has been maintained with anything like truth and freedom from corruption; that the only two nations among whom this worship has been preserved unstained shall be the two now arrayed against each other in hostile arms in a conflict in which, let who will conquer in the fight, his success in one point, if that be an object, will have been attained: so much of human life, liberty, and happiness, will have perished in the affray—in the service of this scourge with which it has pleased God, in his wisdom and justice, not in his mercy, to afflict mankind? Is it fitting that those hands which unite in giving to idolators and to the heathen the Word of God, the Book of Life—that those hands, and those alone, should be thus drenched in each other's blood? Will you unite as a Christian with your Protestant brother across the Atlantic for these noble purposes, and then plunge the dagger into his breast with whom you are associated in a cause so holy—one so infinitely transcending the low, the little, the dirty business we are called upon here to transact? I hope that the sacrifice may be stopped. We have nothing to expect from the mission of our Minister to the Ruler of France, whether at Moscow, or wherever else he may be. The Deity or Devil whom we worship is not to be mollified by our suppliant appeals. Let us turn from him—come out of his house—and join in the worship of the true and living God, instead of spilling the blood of his people on the abominable altar of the French Moloch.

Sir, I have done. I could have wished to continue my remarks further, but I cannot.

When Mr. RANDOLPH concluded, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 14.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the more perfect organization of the Army of the United States," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A Message, received yesterday from the President of the United States, was read, communicating copies of an act of the General Assembly of Maryland, passed on the 2d instant,—Referred to Mr. ARCHER, Mr. RIDGELY, Mr. TALIAFERRO, Mr. CONDUCT, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. BAKER.

Mr. TROUP stated that he had a communication to make to the House which, in his opinion, required secrecy: When the House was cleared of all persons except the members and officers of the House, and the doors were closed; and, after remaining so for some time, they were again opened.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the more perfect organization of the Army of the United States,'" were read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "providing Navy pensions in certain cases," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act in force for those purposes;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill to raise twenty additional regiments of infantry for one year.—The question being on the passage of the bill.

Mr. Stow said: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the delicacy and novelty of my situation, as well from the indulgence of the House, as from the neutral course which I mean to pursue. He must have been indeed an inattentive observer of mankind who proposes to himself such a course without being exposed to difficulties and dangers from every side. Our country has experienced them too long from the great belligerents of Europe, and an individual will quickly find them here. For even this House is not exempt from its great party belligerents who issue their conflicting decrees and Orders in Council; and, in imitation of the hostile Europeans, it is sometimes a sufficient cause of condemnation to have been spoken with by the adverse side. Yet, notwithstanding all these dangers, I mean to launch my neutral bark on this tempestuous ocean, conscious of the rectitude of my intentions, and humbly hoping for the approbation of my country and my God.

The proper extent of the discussion growing out of this bill seemed to be confined to these inquiries: Can the force contemplated be obtained? If obtained, will it accomplish the end proposed? And lastly, will the force be an economical one? If the discussion had been confined to these limits I would have listened, and not have spoken; but, sir, it has taken a wider range, and assumed a more important aspect. It has embraced the present, the past, and the future. The causes of the war, and the mode of conducting it, have been investigated, and even confident predictions have been made as to its end. The history and the state of our negotiations have been carefully examined—and the Presidential order of succession has been scrutinized by the light of experience as well as that of prophecy. We have sometimes been forced into the scenes of private life; and, at other times, we have been chained to the car of Napoleon. In short, sir, the discussion has ranged as wide as existence, and, not content with that, the speakers "have exhausted worlds, and then imagined new." I do not pretend to censure this—it may be well for the people to have their political concerns thus splendidly dressed and passed in review before them. But still I will attempt to call the attention of the House from the regions of fiction, of fancy, and of poetry, to the humble, but I trust no less profitable, sphere of reality and prose. Passing by many of those things which have amused by their ingenuity, or surprised by their novelty, but which do not deserve a serious answer, I will endeavor to state distinctly the grounds taken by the opponents of this bill, or rather the opponents of furnishing the means of prosecuting the war: Firstly. It is alleged "that the war was originally unjust." Secondly. "That if the war was originally just, it has become unjust to continue it in consequence of the revocation of the British Orders in Council." Thirdly. "That it is inexpedient to prosecute the war, because we have no means of coercing our enemy or enforcing our claims." Fourthly. "That we are unable to support the war." And fifthly. "That, in consideration of all these circumstances, the House ought to withhold the means of further prosecuting the war."

First, then, it was alleged that the war was originally unjust. Here let me call on the House to distinguish between unjust and inexpedient. Nothing can be more important than to have clear and distinct ideas about those words which lie at the bottom of a science, or inquiry. This is happily illustrated in mathematics—there every word, by the help of diagrams, is carefully defined; and the consequence is, that there are no disputes among mathematicians, while their labors have done honor to mankind. A thing may be just and yet inexpedient: the justice of an act relates to the conduct of another, the expediency to our own situation. It may be just for me to sue the man who withholds from me the smallest sum; and yet so inexpedient as to be even ridiculous. Thus a war may be perfectly just, and at the same time highly inexpedient. This, if I mistake not, was the ground generally taken the last year by the opponents of the war, particularly by the gentleman from Virginia before me, (Mr. SHEFFER,) who pointed out the distinction which I have endeavored to do, though with more ability and success. I hope the House will bear this distinction in mind; because it is of the greatest importance in the investigation which I intend to make. Before I enter further on the argument, I ask the House to indulge me for a moment while I explain my views relative to the commencement of the war. I never saw any want of provocation on the part of Great Britain. I never for an instant doubted the justice of the war, while I urged its expediency with all my might. I considered man placed here by a beneficent Providence, on a fertile soil, and in a happy climate, enlightened by science, and protected by the wisest of laws. By our Revolution cut adrift, as I may say, from the old world, before the storm which was about to desolate Europe arose, I fondly hoped that this new world would furnish one fair experiment of what science, liberty, and peace, might achieve, free from those corruptions which have eternally attended on war. I hoped to see the country improved, and bound together by roads and canals, to see it adorned by literary institutions, and by every establishment which reflects honor upon man. Nor do I yet believe that this was an Utopian vision, or an idle dream. I still believe it might all have been realized by a different course—but the nation has determined on war, and, though it was not my choice, I still maintain that it is not unjust.

I will not go into a minute account of all those injuries, and outrages, the bare mention of which was last year declared sickening to the soul. I will only recall the most prominent to the recollection of gentlemen, who seem almost to have forgotten them. First, then the revival of the rule of '56, relative to the colonial trade, which produced one universal burst of indignation, and called forth those unanimous resolutions in the Senate, not to endure it. Was that no just cause of war! The numerous blockades, against which all our Ministers in England, and every Administration, have remonstrated; the repeated insults of our cities by their ships of war; the murder of one of our citizens in our own waters, (I mean Pierce;) the shameful trial, and subsequent promotion of the officer, by which insult was added to injury—in all this do gentlemen see nothing to render war just? I pass by numerous other injuries, and come to the Orders in Council—those orders which have swept millions of American property from the ocean. But, sir, we have been told, that France was the aggressor—that if we had compelled France to do us justice, Great Britain would have followed in due time the example, and thus war would have been prevented. What has this to do with the case, suppose it either true, or false? What has the justice of the war to do with the order in which we have received the injuries from France or England? Have we not the right to resist the one, who injured us last, as well as the first? Who ever dreamed, that to determine whether it was lawful to repel an injury, he must examine the history of his life, and see if he had not been injured before? Have we lost the moral sense? or have we been so long accustomed to receiving injuries, that we have ceased to know them; that after a patient endurance of fifteen years, and after deliberately resorting to war, we are gravely about to examine the chronology of our wrongs to see if we have the right to resist? I omit the subject of impressment; not but what it was one of the just causes of war, but because I intend to speak of it in another place. After a candid review of the past, can any person then maintain that America has no just cause of war? Sir, to my mind it appears impossible.

I shall now examine the second proposition, "that if the war was originally just, its further prosecution is unjust." On what ground does this rest? It is this, that the Orders in Council were the cause of the war; those orders having ceased, the prosecution of the war becomes unjust. Here again justice and expediency are confounded. It was never maintained, that the Orders in Council rendered war more just than many other outrages, though they went farther to prove its expediency, and even necessity. It therefore follows, that their repeal does not affect the justice of the war; unless accompanied with compensation for the spoiliations committed under them, and atonement made for other wrongs. Neither of these, is it pretended, has been done; except so far as relates to the affair of the Chesapeake, and which I purposely left out of the catalogue of grievances. An injury which was a just cause of war, remains a just cause for its continuance, till atonement is offered, or till it is settled by negotiation. But, sir, an ample justification of war remains in the impressment of our seamen. The claim on our part is not, as has been alleged, a claim to protect British seamen—it is a claim to protect American citizens. Nay, more, as respects the justice of the continuance of the war, it is a claim only, that they will cease from the practice during the truce, that it may be seen whether it is possible to arrange it by negotiation. Is it unjust to continue the war, till this demand is complied with? or does any American wish to see his country prostrated still lower?

Having thus far explained my ideas relative to the justice of the commencement and continuance of the war, I will now proceed to answer the third objection, namely: That it is inexpedient to carry it on, because we have no means of coercing our enemy—of compelling him—to what? barely to a just and honorable peace; for that is all we demand. And have we no means of doing this? Better then to surrender the charter of our independence, confess we are incapable of self protection, and beg his most gracious Majesty to again take us under his paternal care. Such a doctrine, sir, is as unfounded, as it is degrading to the American character. We have ample means of compelling Great Britain to do us justice; they are to be found in the value of our commerce; in the enterprise of our privateers; in the gallantry of our ships of war, and the conquest of her provinces. Our custom (considering her in the light of a mechanic or merchant who supplies) is of vital importance to Great Britain. It is not to be measured by its amount, in pounds, shillings, and pence, but by the strength and support she derives from the intercourse. For, while I admit that Great Britain does not send half her exports to the United States, I do maintain, that the custom of this country is of more importance to her, than that of the whole world beside. It is with a nation as with an individual, if he exchange luxuries for luxuries, or superfluities, such as ribands for ribands, which he consumes, he adds nothing to his wealth; but if he exchange his luxuries, or his ribands, for bread or for such materials as give scope to his industry, he is then benefited, and enriched by the interchange. Such is the situation of Great Britain with regard to America. She, and her dependencies, receive more of provision, and raw materials, from America, than from all other parts of the world together. Our trade exactly gives effect to her industry, her machinery, and her capital. And it is this, which has, in a great degree, enabled her to make such gigantic efforts in the awful contest in which she is engaged. Our privateers; will they have no effect on Great Britain? Will she learn nothing from the loss of three or four hundred ships? And will she be insensible to the efforts of our little Navy? Can they touch no nerve in which Britons feel? Far different are my conclusions, from what I have seen in British papers—they show, that she is tremblingly alive to that subject.

Sir, I will now consider her provinces, about which so much has been said. I too will speak of that wonderful country, called Canada, which unites in itself all contrarieties! Which is so cold and sterile, as to be not worth possessing; and so fertile, that if, by any calamity it should become ours, it would seduce away our population;—which is so unhappy under the British Government as not to lure our inhabitants; yet so happy, that it is criminal to disturb their felicity;—whose inhabitants, if united with ours, would destroy us, because they have none of the habits of freemen; and who, well knowing the privileges of their free Government, will defend them to the last. A country which is of no importance to Great Britain, and whose loss would not make her feel; a country which is so valuable to Great Britain that she will never give it up. A country so weak, that it is inglorious to attack it; and a country so strong that we can never take it. But, sir, leaving these, and a thousand other contradictions, the work of fancy or of spleen, I will present to the House what I believe to be a true view of the subject, drawn from a near residence and much careful examination. Canada is of great importance both to Great Britain and the United States. It is important to Great Britain in the amount and kind of its exports. In the last year preceding war, its exports amounted to between seven and nine millions of dollars, an amount almost as great as the exports of the United States preceding the Revolutionary war. And had the most discerning statesman made out an order, he could not have selected articles better adapted to the essential wants of Great Britain. It has been said that Canada is of less value than one of the sugar islands of the West Indies. Sir, in the present state of the world, Canada is of more importance to Great Britain, in my opinion, than the whole West India islands taken together. In danger, as she is, of being shut out from the Baltic, and fighting for her existence, she wants not the luxuries, the sugars, and the sweetmeats of the West Indies—she wants the provisions, the timber, the masts, and the spars of the North.

Canada is also of the greatest importance to the United States, in a commercial and political point of view. I have in a great measure explained its commercial importance already, by stating its exports; a large portion of which were the products of the United States. Let an attentive observer cast his eye for one moment on the map of North America; let him bear in mind, that from the forty-fifth degree of latitude the waters of Canada bound for a vast extent one of the most fertile, and which will become one of the most populous parts of the United States; and he will readily perceive that the river St. Lawrence must soon be the outlet for one third of all the products of American labour. The same circumstances will enable it to lay an impost on one third of our imported articles. Nor will the evil to our revenue end here. Great Britain will be enabled to smuggle her goods through this channel into all parts of the Union. It will be in vain that you attempt to counteract her by laws; from the great length and contiguity of her possessions, she will forever evade them, unless by your laws you can change the nature of man. But its greatest importance is in a political point of view: for, although not as happy in its Government as the United States, it is sufficiently so to draw off multitudes of our new settlers, when the intermediate lands of the State of New York, which separate it from New England, shall be fully occupied. From this circumstance it will divide the American family, and, by the commercial relations which I have pointed out, it will exert a dangerous influence over a part of our country; for the transition from commercial dependence, to political allegiance, is too obvious to be insisted on. Having endeavored to show the importance of Canada to both of the contending nations, I will only add that it is within our power.

The fourth objection is, that we cannot support the war—that we have not the ability to carry it on. Before I proceed to answer this objection, permit me, sir, to notice a single inconsistency of the gentlemen by whom it has been urged. It is this: in one part of their argument, they represent the people as too happy to enlist, and in another part as too poor to pay! Both of these propositions, I presume, cannot be true. Not to dwell longer, however, upon this contradiction, I do maintain, sir, that the nation is fully able to prosecute the war. On what does the ability of a nation depend? A person who will give himself the trouble of examining things rather than words, will find that it is proportioned to the number of laborers and the productiveness of their labor. Wherever, from soil, climate, or improvement, the labor of a country will produce more than a supply of the necessities of life, it is evident that the surplus time may be devoted to idleness, to the production and consumption of luxuries, or to the carrying on of war. To illustrate this farther—suppose the labor of a person for five days will support him six, then it is clear, that the labor of five men will support the sixth man in idleness or in war. Now, sir, there is nowhere that the labor of seven millions of people will produce so much as in this country; consequently, nowhere have seven millions of people so great an ability to carry on a war. The quantity of circulating medium, whether made of paper or of silver dollars, has very little to do with the subject. If it is made of paper, and to a great extent, it only shows, that the people are in their habits commercial; and that the faith of contracts is well supported. The real ability of a nation lies in what I have stated; and he must be a weak politician who cannot call it forth.

Mr. Speaker, I will now consider the last, and by far the most important objection of all; and one, without which, I certainly would not have spoken. It is, that in consideration of all the circumstances in which we are placed, it is the duty of this House to withhold the means of further prosecuting the war. It will not be denied, I trust, that this is a fair statement of the scope and object of most of the reasonings which have been employed; and that without this construction, they would be irreconcilable with common sense. This doctrine, in my opinion, goes not only to the overthrow of our Constitution, but to the destruction of liberty itself. The principle of our Government is, not only that the majority shall rule, but that they shall rule in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. So that if it could be proved that a majority of the people were in favor of certain measures, it would not be sufficient till they had pronounced that decision through the Constitutional organs. In short, it must have been a principal object with the framers of our Constitution to suspend, at least for a limited time, the effects of popular opinion. The Constitution has committed the Legislative power to three co-equal branches; and to the same hands has it intrusted the power of declaring war; while it has expressly confided the treaty-making power (and which alone can make peace) to two only of those branches. The claim now set up, goes to invest that branch which has no authority in the matter, not only with the treaty-making power, but also with a complete control over the other two branches. Thus one branch of the Government forcing the nation to desist from doing what three, including itself, had thought best to perform. Let us test the correctness of this principle by applying it to another co-equal branch of the Government. Let us suppose the President has made a treaty of peace, which is disapproved of by the Senate—and suppose upon this he should say, the war ought not to be further prosecuted, and refuse to employ the public force, would you not impeach him? Most unquestionably you would. I expressly admit that cases may be imagined, where such a course would be proper—where it would be not only the duty of this House to withhold supplies, but where it would be the duty of an individual to resist the laws; but such are extreme cases, not provided for by any organization of Government. What, sir, has been the practice of the British House of Commons? Have they ever refused supplies because a war was unpopular, since their revolution? Did not the same Parliament, which resolved that they would consider any man as an enemy to his country who would advise his Majesty to the further prosecution of offensive war in America, still vote the means for carrying on the war? A similar case occurred when Mr. Fox came last into power—he disapproved of the commencement and conduct of the war, and yet he called for and received the necessary supplies. Let us examine our own history: In the case of the British Treaty, the House, by a call for papers, attempted to superintend the treaty-making power, before it would make the necessary appropriations. The encroachment was instantly resisted by the great man who then presided over the Government, and his decision was approved by the nation. Is not the duty of furnishing the necessary supplies stronger, now we are engaged in war? And that, too, declared by all the branches of the Government! Sir, these temporary sacrifices of our own wishes to the Constitutional decisions of our Government, are the price we pay for liberty, and all that is dear to us. Once withheld, anarchy and tyranny ensue! I am one who ardently longs for peace. I see in it not only the present prosperity of the country, but a long train of republican virtues; and I would spring to embrace it on the first fair occasion. But much as I desire it, I would not purchase it by submission to the enemy of my country, or by the smallest violation of the Constitution. I think the people of the North were against the war, and I think they have shown it by the change of many of their rulers; but I much mistake their character if they would seek peace by disarming and prostrating themselves before the enemy. They know how to practise the double duty of freemen, to select their rulers, and fight the enemy of their country.

Much, sir, has been said about French and British influence. There is no such thing in this House, or in this nation—unless by British influence is meant, what has been derived from an inheritance of her excellent laws, from her language and her writers, who have done honor to mankind. Who is there that feels in his own breast this French or British influence? And where is the man who dares to ascribe to his respectable fellow-citizen, feelings which in himself he would abhor? No, sir, the evil is of another kind; it is party! it is the magic of names, by which men of equal intelligence, who have the same ties to society, and the same interest in the welfare of their country, are torn asunder. We take our sides like boys for a game; and in the ardor of competition too often forget our country. In the great contest which is now going on in the world we are all of one side—our country is the stake, and the last Republic on which the sun shines! Here man enlightened and free is placed as it were in a second garden; the fruit of life is union, and near it grows the fruit of disunion and death. The attempt to divide us must have been originated in Pandemonium by the great enemy of mankind; and his first efforts must have been to instigate us to call each other by opprobrious names. Should he at last succeed in producing our downfall, and the expulsion of republicanism from America, “earth” would once more “tremble from her entrails as again in pangs, and nature give a second groan.” But, sir, I will not indulge the melancholy idea: I will not anticipate a time when this splendid hall shall crumble into fragments, and this fair Republic, reared by the immortal Washingtons, Franklins, and Clintons of our country, shall itself become a more deplorable, a more melancholy ruin! I will hope that there is a redeeming spirit in the land, and that a guardian Providence will still watch over the destinies of our infant country.

H. OF R.

Mr. CALHOUN observed, that he could offer nothing more acceptable, he presumed, to the House, than a promise not to discuss the Orders in Council, French decrees, blockades, or embargoes. He was induced to avoid these topics for several reasons. In the first place, they were too stale to furnish any interest to this House or country. Gentlemen who had attempted it, with whatever abilities, had failed to command attention; and it would argue very little sagacity on his part not to be admonished by their want of success. Indeed, whatever interest had been at one time attached to these subjects, they had now lost. They have passed away; and will not soon, he hoped, return into the circle of politics. Yes, sir, as reviled as has been our country's efforts to curb belligerent injustice, as weak and contemptible as she has been represented to be in the grade of nations, she has triumphed in breaking down the most dangerous monopoly ever attempted by one nation against the commerce of another. He would not stop to inquire whether it was the non-importation act, or the menace of war, or, what was the most probable, the last operating on the pressure produced by the former. The fact is certain, that the Orders in Council of 1807 and 1809, which our opponents have often said, that England would not yield, as they made a part of her commercial system, are now no more. The same firmness, if persevered in, which has carried us thus far with success, will, as our cause is just and moderate, end in final victory. A further reason which he had, not to follow our opponents into the region of documents and records, was, that he was afraid of a decoy; as he was induced to believe from appearances that their object was to draw our attention from the merits of the question. Gentlemen had literally buried their arguments under a huge pile of quotations; and had wandered so far into this realm of paper, that neither the vision of this House has been, or that of the country will be, able to follow them. There the best and worst reasons share an equal fate. The truth of the one and error of the other, are covered with like obscurity.

Before he proceeded further, he would make a few observations in reply to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) who spoke yesterday. He complained of the desertion of his former associates from the minority principles of '98. These principles, he said, consisted in an opposition to the General Government in relation to the States, and to political rights in relation to individuals.

Mr. C. said he was at one moment almost induced to suspect the gentleman of a desertion of his own principles; for scarcely had he finished this part of his subject, before he passed a high-wrought eulogy on the Father of his Country—on that man whose whole life indicated the strongest leaning on the side of the Government of his country. He would beg the gentleman to reflect whether his definition of minority principles suited the character of WASHINGTON'S Administration—and, if not, with what propriety both could be praised almost in the same breath. Whether indeed the principles of '98 were such as the gentleman has represented them, he would not inquire; because not necessary to his argument. But if they are in truth those of the gentleman and his present associates, he would be happy to know with what countenance they can request the people of this country to put the Government into their hands? Trust the Government to those who are hostile to it! Who prefer their own interest and rights, to its interest and rights! If our opponents are in reality in favor of such principles, patriotism ought to persuade them to add one other, and that is, ever to remain in a minority. There they may perhaps be of some use, at least they will not be dangerous; but put them in power, and let them act up to what they profess, and destruction would be certain. If the gentleman from Virginia is anxious to know the real cause of the separation of his former associates from him, he must look for it in his present political creed, and that of those with whom he is now united. He will there find an article which had no place in his in '98, and which then as well as now was reprobated by those who constitute the present majority. This article is only an enlargement of the minority principles, as defined by the gentleman; it is opposition to our country in relation to England. The proof of this article is of the same kind, and no less clear than the others. For what encroachment of England on our neutral rights, from the interruption of our carrying trade down to the moment that war was declared, which one of the innumerable insults and injuries which burst in on us, has the opposition either not palliated or justified—and what effort of our country to resist, which has not been reprobated and opposed?

Mr. C. said he would not multiply proof on a course of conduct the bad effect of which was too sensibly felt to be easily forgot, and the continuation of which was but too apparent in the present discussion. For what was the object of the opposition in this debate? To defeat the passage of this bill? It has been scarcely mentioned; and contains nothing to raise that storm which has been excited against it. The bill proposes to raise twenty thousand men only, and that for one year; and surely there is nothing in that calculated to lay such strong hold of the jealousy or fear of the community. What then is the object of the opposition? Gentlemen certainly do not act without an intention; and wide as has been the range of debate, it cannot be so lawless as to be without an object. It was not, he repeated, to defeat the passage of this bill; no, but what was much more to be dreaded, to thwart that, which the bill proposes to contribute to, the final success of the war; and for this purpose he must do the opposition the credit to say, they have resorted to means the best calculated to produce the effect. In a free Government, in the government of laws, two things are necessary for the effectual prosecution of any great measure; the law by which the Executive officer is charged with the execution and vested with suitable powers; and the co-operating zeal and union of the people, who are always indispensable agents. Opposition to be successful must direct its efforts against the passage of the law; or, what was more common and generally more effectual, to destroy the union and the zeal of the people. Either, if successful, is effectual. The former would in most cases be seen and reprobated; the latter, much the most dangerous, has, to the great misfortunes of Republics, presented at all times a ready means of defeating the most salutary measures. To this point the whole arguments of opposition have converged. This gives a meaning to every reason and assertion, which have been advanced, however wild and inconsistent. No topic has been left untouched, no passion unexpressed. The war has been represented as unjust in its origin, disastrous in its progress, and desperate in its farther prosecution. As if to prevent the possibility of doubt, a determination has been boldly asserted not to support it. Such is the opposition to the war, which was admitted on all sides to be just; and which in a manner received the votes even of those who now appear to be willing to ruin the country in order to defeat its success. For let it ever be remembered, that the bill to raise the twenty-five thousand men passed this House almost unanimously, though it was distinctly announced for what object it was intended. How will gentlemen relieve themselves from this dilemma? Was it their object to embarrass the Administration? Will they dare to make a confession, which will so strongly confirm the motive which has been assigned to them? A gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) felt the awkwardness of the situation, and, in his endeavor to explain, has made an admission which ought ever to exclude him and his friends from power. He justified his vote on the ground that he was in favor of the force as a Peace Establishment. A Peace Establishment of thirty-five thousand men! [Mr. EMOTT explained that he did not mean as a Peace Establishment, but that the posture of affairs at that time demanded it.] At any rate, said Mr. C., he hoped to hear nothing farther about the enormous expense of the war, since the principal expense ought to have been incurred in the gentleman's opinion, even had it not been resorted to. Well might the opposition admit the justice of the war. For years the moderation of the Government, he might almost say the excessive love of peace, strove to avoid the contest. We bore all that an independent nation could bear; not indeed with patience, but in the hopes of returning justice on the part of our enemy.

Mr. C. could not omit noticing the attempt made by the gentleman from New York, to palliate the conduct of England, in relation to one of the causes of the war; he alluded to the blockade of 1806. The gentleman contended that it was a relaxation of the law of nations in our favor; and of consequence must be considered by us in the light of a benefit. It surely cannot be necessary to trace the gentleman through his laborious discussion on this point, to expose the error of so extraordinary a conclusion. What, that an advantage to this country, which we have struggled so much to avoid! That, a relaxation on the part of England, which she has so obstinately refused to yield! Flushed with his supposed victory on this subject, the gentleman undertook what might be considered even a more difficult task, to remove the Orders in Council as a cause of war. Mr. C. said he despaired of replying to such arguments. But it is objected that the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations has stated the orders of 1807 as a cause of war, though repealed by those of 1809. It is a sufficient justification of the report that it has stated the facts on this, as well as all other points, precisely as they existed; and well might the report enumerate the orders of 1807 as a cause of war, when those of 1809 openly avow the principles of the former, and only modify their operation to the then existing circumstances. But, says another gentleman from New York, (Mr. BLEECKER,) we were inveigled into the war by the perfidy of France. She did not fairly repeal her decrees. Be it so; and what, then? Were we bound to submit to England, because France refused to do us justice? Had we no power of election between the ruffians? Where will the absurdity of such arguments end? The right to select was perfect in us; and, without reference to the conduct of France, the selection might and ought to fall on England. If, sir, the origin of the war furnish no sufficient justification for opposition to it, in vain will our opponents fly for refuge to its continuation. The Orders in Council, say they, are now no more, and why should the war be persisted in after its cause is removed? Mr. C. said his reply to this question was, that it was continued from no project of ambition, or desire of conquest; but from a cause far more sacred, the liberty of our sailors and their redemption from slavery. Yet the war is opposed, even attempted to be defeated, by the friends, connexions, and neighbors of these brave defenders of our national rights and honor. It is even asked, why should we feel so lively an interest in their fate? In vain are such arguments urged. The country will not forget its duty, the first of political duties, that of protection. Our opponents may find no motive in connexion or neighborhood, but the country will, in its obligation. The friends of commerce may evince their attachment to its profits and luxuries only; but the Government will not, on that account, cease to respect the liberty of the citizen, and the enlarged interest of commerce, by protecting from English slavery the sailors, by whose toil and peril it is extended to every sea. Provided they have commerce and profit, it seems the injury and insult go for nothing with the opposition. Such a commerce may, indeed, bloat the country, but it will not contribute to its real strength. It subtracts more from the spirit, than it adds to the wealth of the community.

But, say our opponents, as they were opposed to the war they are not bound to support it; and so far has this opposition been carried, that we have been accused almost of violating the right of conscience, in denying the right set up by gentlemen. The right to oppose the efforts of our country, while in war, ought to be established beyond the possibility of doubt, before it can be justly adopted as the basis of conduct. How conscience can be claimed in this case cannot be very easily imagined. We oppose not by laws or penalties; we only assert that the opposition experienced cannot be dictated by love of country, and is inconsistent with the duty which every citizen is under to promote the prosperity of the Republic. Its necessary tendency is to prostrate the country at the feet of the enemy, and to elevate a party on the ruins of the public. Till our opponents can prove that they have a right which is paramount to the public interest, we must persist in denying the right to thwart the success of the war. War has been declared by a law of the land; and what would be thought of similar attempts to defeat any other law, however inconsiderable its object? Who would dare to avow an intention to defeat its operation? Can that, then, be true in relation to war which would be reprobated in every other case? Can that be true which, when the whole physical force of the country is needed, withdraws half of that force? Can that be true which gives the greatest violence to party animosity? What would have been thought of such conduct in the war of the Revolution? Many good citizens friendly to the liberty of our country were opposed to the declaration at the time; could they have been justified in such opposition as we now experience? To terminate the war through discord and weakness is a hazardous experiment. But, in the most unjust and inexpedient war, it can scarcely be possible, that disunion and defeats can have a salutary operation. In the numerous examples which history furnishes, let an instance be pointed out, in any war, where the public interest has been promoted by divisions, or injured by concord. Hundreds of instances may be cited of the reverse. Why, then, will gentlemen persist in that course where danger is almost unavoidable, and shun that where safety is almost certain?

But, sir, we are told that peace is in our power without a farther promotion of the war. Appeal not, say our opponents, to the fear, but to the generosity of our enemy. England yields nothing to her fears; stop, therefore, your preparation, and throw yourself on her mercy, and peace will be the result. We might, indeed, have pardon, but not peace on such terms. Those who think the war a sacrilege or a crime, might consistently adopt such a course; but we, who know it to be for the maintenance of the just rights of the community, never can. We are farther told that impressment of seamen was not considered a sufficient cause of war; and are asked why should it be continued on that account? Mr. C. observed that he individually did not feel the force of the argument; for it had been his opinion, that the nation was bound to resist so deep an injury even at the hazard of war; but, admitting its full force, the difference is striking between the commencement and the continuance of hostilities. War ought to be continued until its rational object, a permanent and secure peace, could be obtained. Even the friends of England ought not to desire the termination of the war, without a satisfactory adjustment of the subject of impressment. It would leave the root that must necessarily shoot up in future animosity and hostilities. America can never quietly submit to the deepest of injury. Necessity might compel her to yield for a moment; but it would be to watch the growth of national strength, and to seize the first favorable opportunity to seek redress. The worst enemy to the peace of the two countries could not desire a more effectual means to propagate eternal enmity.

But it is said that we ought to offer to England suitable regulations on this subject to secure to her the use of her own seamen; and because we have not, we are aggressors. He denied that we were bound to tender any regulations, or that we had not. England was the party injuring. She ought to confine her seamen to her own service; or, if that was impracticable, propose such arrangements that she might exercise her right without injury to us. This is the rule that governs all analogous cases in private life. But we have made our offer; it is, that the ship should protect the sailor. It is the most simple and only safe rule; but, to secure so desirable a point, the most liberal and effectual provisions ought and have been proposed to be made on our part to guard the British Government against the evil they apprehended, the loss of her seamen. The whole doctrine of protection heretofore relied on, and still recommended by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. P.,) is false and derogatory to our honor; and under no possible modification can effect the desirable objects of affording safety to our sailors, and securing the future harmony of the two countries. Nor can it be doubted, if governed by justice, she will yield to the offer of our Government, particularly if what the gentleman from New York (Mr. BLECKER) says be true, that there are ten thousand of her seamen in our service. She would be greatly the gainer by the arrangement. Experience, it is to be feared, however, will teach that gentleman that the evil lies much deeper. The use of her seamen is a mere pretence. The blow is aimed at our commercial greatness. It is this which has animated and directed all of her injurious councils towards this country. England is at the same time a trading and fighting nation; two occupations naturally at variance, and most difficult to be united. War limits the number and extent of the markets of a belligerent, makes a variety of regulations necessary; and produces heavy taxes, which are inimical to the prosperity of manufactories and consequently commerce. These causes combined give to trade new channels, which direct it naturally to neutral nations. To counteract this tendency, England, under various but flimsy pretences, has endeavored to support her commercial superiority by monopoly. It has been our fortune to resist with no inconsiderable success this spirit of monopoly. Her principal object in contending for the right of impressment is to have, in a great measure, the monopoly of the sailors of the world. A fixed resistance will compel her to yield this point as she has already done her Orders in Council. Success will amply reward our exertions. Our future commerce will feel its invigorating effects. But, say gentlemen, England will never yield this point, and every effort on our part to secure it is hopeless. To confirm this prediction and secure our reverence, the prophecies of the last session are relied on. Mr. C. felt no disposition to disparage our opponents' talents in that line; but he very much doubted whether the whole chapter of woes had been fulfilled. He would, for instance, ask whether so much as related to sacked towns, bombarded cities, ruined commerce, and revolting blacks, had been realized?

He was sorry to find a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFEY) not yet cured of his fears in relation to this last prediction. He would be glad to know what was his intention—his assertions give equal notice to the House, the enemy, and the country. If danger indeed existed, he has acted with such imprudence as ought to subject him to the censure of any reflecting man; but he would acquit the gentleman, as he did not apprehend any danger. He would not admit an increased danger from a state of war, a state in which the public force and vigilance are of necessity the greatest. But, to return to the point; our cause is not so hopeless as represented by our opponents; but, on the contrary, if we only persevere, we have every reason, under present circumstances, to anticipate ultimate success. The enemy is engaged in a contest in Europe which requires his whole power. We have already compelled him to yield a point which but the last year it was prophesied that he never would. The Orders in Council are now no more; that system by which it was vainly attempted to monopolize our trade and to recolonize the American nation. But if England will not yield, we can perish as well as she. Our Republican virtue is as obstinate as her Imperial pride, and our duty to our citizens as unyielding as her prerogative over her subjects. An attempt has been made to shake our fortitude by a cry of French alliance. It has been boldly said that we are already united with that country. We united with France! We have the same cause! No; her object is dominion, and her impulse ambition. Ours is the protection of the liberty of our sailors. But, say our opponents, we are contending against the same country. What then? Must we submit to be outlawed by England in order that she may not be by France? Is the independence of England dearer to us than our own? Must we enter the European struggle not as an equal, consulting our peculiar interest, but be dragged into it as the low dependant, the slave of England?

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has told us that we are contending against religion in the person of England—that she is, in a word, the patroness of Christianity. Unhappy country! Doomed to submission to preserve the purity of religion! Doomed to slavery that England may be independent! Because Bonaparte is not a Protestant you must surrender your rights! Because he is a despot you dare not resist! What does the gentleman intend? Is it his wish, by thus dragging into the heat of political debate the sacred cause of religion, to promote its interest or that of a faction? If the former, let him point out an instance in ancient or modern times when the junction of religion and politics has not been fatal to the interest of both. It is this unnatural union that has engendered the foulest progeny of human woes. History is full of its disaster, and the gentleman is too familiar with its pages to require a particular recital. If the gentleman's intention is not to advance the cause of religion, but to promote the views of a party, words cannot truly describe its real character. It is a trick that has been, and still continues to be practised on the too easy credulity of our nature. Its frequency, however, does not change its nature; it may indeed furnish some apology that those who practise it are led into it without a due reflection on its character; but, when understood, what can be more shocking than that the most sacred of all things, the medium of divine communion, our consolation as mortals, should be prostrated to the gratification of some of the worst feelings of the human heart!

Such, then, is the cause of the war and its continuation; and such the nature of the opposition experienced, and its justification. It remains to be seen whether the intended effect will be produced. Whether animosity and discord will be fomented, and the zeal and union of the people to maintain the rights and indispensable duties of the community will abate; or, describing it under another aspect, whether it is the destiny of our country to sink under that of our enemy or not. Mr. C. said he was not without his fears and his hopes.

On the one hand our opponents had manifestly the advantage. The love of present ease and enjoyment, the love of gain, and party zeal, were on their side. These constitute part of the weakness of our nature. We naturally lead that way without the arts of persuasion. Far more difficult is the task of the majority. It is theirs to support the distant but lasting interest of our country; it is theirs to elevate the minds of the people, and to call up all of those qualities by which present sacrifices are made to secure a future good. On the other hand, our cause is not without its hope. The interest of the people and that of the leaders of a party are, as observed by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. STOW,) often at variance. The people are always ready, unless led astray by ignorance or delusion, to participate in the success of the country, or to sympathize in its adversity. Very different are the feelings of the leaders; on every great measure they stand pledged against its success, and almost invariably consider that their political consequence depends on its defeat. The heat of debate, the spirit of settled opposition, and the confident prediction of disaster, are among the causes of this opposition between the interest of a party and their country; and in no instance under our own Government have they existed in a greater degree than in relation to the present war. The evil is deeply rooted in the constitution of all free Governments, and is the principal cause of their weakness and destruction. It has but one remedy, the virtue and intelligence of the people—it behoves them, as they value the blessings of their freedom, not to permit themselves to be drawn into the vortex of party rage. For if by such opposition the firmest Government should prove incompetent to maintain the rights of the nation against foreign aggression, they will find realized the truth of the assertion that government is protection, and that it cannot exist where it fails of this great and primary object. The authors of the weakness are commonly the first to take the advantage of it, and to turn it to the destruction of liberty.

Mr. KEY spoke in opposition to the bill.

Mr. ALSTON said, although the debate upon the subject under consideration had been protracted to so great a length, he would make a few observations in reply to the member from Maryland, (Mr. KEY.) He believed no gentlemen would disbelieve him when he told them he would not detain the House long. Mr. A. said, he always listened to the gentleman with attention, and as often admired his great ingenuity in covering his real designs and making that appear plausible and right which in fact was not so; however, upon the present occasion, it was impossible to mistake the gentleman. He began by saying that he would not vote to repeal the law declaring war against Great Britain—that would be prostrating the dignity of this nation at her feet; and what was his argument? That no step ought to be taken to carry it on. Mr. A. asked the gentleman and the House, which would be the most dignified course, to repeal the law declaring war or to refuse the only means of carrying it on with anything like success. The gentleman says he will not vote for the bill on your table, offers no system for the immediate prosecution or carrying on of the war, yet the gentleman declares he will not submit. He would go on enlisting for five years, when he well knows under existing circumstances the men cannot be obtained for the next campaign. Mr. A. asked if any man in his senses did believe that Great Britain would come to terms such as an independent nation ought to accede to if no other course was taken than that which the gentleman talked about?

The gentleman would repeal your non-importation act, reject the bill upon your table, pass such a law on the subject of seamen as would please Great Britain, and then declared you would have a peace in nine months. This then is the gentleman's project; now, it is asked, what man in this nation who possesses one spark of American feeling would be willing to take such a course?

Mr. A. said he would submit it to the House and the gentleman how well such an argument accorded with the declaration the gentleman set out with, which was, that he would not repeal the law declaring war with Great Britain, because it would be humbling this nation at her feet.

The gentleman talked of the expense of the system, said it would cost fifty millions a year; and what would the gentleman's system cost? At least one hundred millions before he could get ready to meet the enemy. Mr. A. said, the object of the bill was to get a force for the next campaign; the gentleman's system was never to make a campaign against Great Britain, but to go on trying to enlist men for five years, when it was well known that every engine the ingenuity of opposition could put in motion was resorted to, to prevent enlistment. Yet this is the only course the gentleman is willing to take for the next campaign, for the maintenance of the honor and the dignity of the nation.

But the gentleman would fight Great Britain upon the sea. Is it possible that there is a gentleman in this nation who believes that we are at this time able to meet the thousand ships of Great Britain on that element? Impossible! Yet the gentleman would meet her on the ocean. Although the gentleman is perfectly willing to vote for a navy to fight Great Britain upon the sea, he talks about expense; he weighs the national honor in one scale and the expense of the bill on your table in the other; yet the gentleman would incur all the expense of a navy to meet her at sea.

The gentleman is equally at variance with himself on the subject of the conquest of Canada; in one breath he declares the country not worth possessing, and in the next he declares it will be the means if acquired of breaking these States asunder, of destroying this Union; is it possible that it can be believed, even by the gentleman himself, that a country such as he describes Canada to be, ever can be of sufficient importance that its weight added to the Northern States will cause a disunion—a cold, sterile, rocky, uninhabitable, and inhospitable climate?

The gentleman is as much at variance with his friends, many of whom have been afraid that the old United States would be depopulated by removals into Canada, if we should acquire it. When such arguments are resorted to, what must be the feelings and indignation of every honest man in the nation?

Mr. A. verily believed that the conquest of Canada would be the surest means of cementing the Union. He would refer the gentleman and the House to the very able speech this day delivered by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. SROW,) which must have shown, to the satisfaction of every gentleman present, except that of the gentleman from Maryland, that no one act could have a tendency more to unite us together; it would be the surest means of effecting an internal communication, by uniting the Eastern and Western waters, through the great lakes, by canals, and of affording an internal navigation throughout the whole Western world; without which there would always be subjects of discon-tents and jealousies. The gentleman has brought us to the recollection of a speech delivered by a gentleman (not now a member) from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) on the subject of embargo, delivered at a midnight hour. He, Mr. A., really thought that speech would never again have been brought to view by the gentleman from Maryland, for if ever that gentleman sat uneasy under the lash of a speech, it was that very speech. Mr. A. would, however, not detain the House by travelling over the proceedings of that night; they must be fully in the mind of the gentleman who has brought them into discussion. He expressed a hope that the bill might pass, as it was evidently calculated to bring a sufficient force much sooner into action, than could be brought under the present system.

Mr. DESHA.—Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain you long; my principal object in rising is to conjure gentlemen to bring this debate to a close. Sir, what can gentlemen flatter themselves by suffering this discussion to be protracted to so unwarrantable a length? It cannot be supposed that the substantial part of this House (I mean those who think much and speak but little) will, by theoretical or sophisticated remarks, be driven from their course. Then, sir, those long-winded speeches must be either intended for the gallery, or for gentlemen's constituents. It would certainly be unjustifiable to sport away the public money; to exhaust the public patience in making long speeches, merely for the purpose of amusing the ear of the gallery. And, sir, your constituents would much rather you would act with decision, with promptitude, in adopting measures calculated for a vigorous prosecution of the war, that it might be brought to a speedy and honorable termination, than to take up weeks in detailing the causes of the war. The people are fully apprized of the causes of the war, from the documents that have been promulgated; they are satisfied that it is a just and necessary war: that it has been forced upon us by the injustice and oppression of our enemy, occasioned in a great measure by the violent opposition of a party to the Administration. Sir, act so as to give a vigorous prosecution to the war, and act promptly, and the people will support you with manly firmness, independent of the consideration of expense.

Mr. Speaker, this bill contemplates raising twenty thousand men for one year. Although I shall vote for the bill under consideration, I do not altogether approve of it. Sir, the time of service is too short to answer a valuable purpose. I am not so sanguine as to suppose that we will overrun the British provinces in one season. I should like it much better if the time of service, as has been proposed, was extended to eighteen months, and the bounty raised in proportion. You would then have the advantage of two campaigns; in the last of which, you might calculate on a certainty of being able to do something of a decisive character, as you would have the advantage of disciplined troops; and really, sir, if this bill is to answer any valuable purpose, it ought to have been passed some time since. Gentlemen certainly must see that the object of the opposition is procrastination; they have predicted that the bill under consideration, if adopted, will not only run the country to extraordinary expenses, swell the national debt to an enormous size, but that it will ultimately bring disgrace on the Government. And, sir, they are determined that their predictions shall be realized, by putting off the passage of the bill until late in the season, thereby preventing you from obtaining the men in time to do anything of a decisive character next summer. This, in my mind, is unquestionably their object; and I believe the ambition of some of them is such, that, rather than be found false prophets, they would endanger the only republic in the world. Sir, I do not wish to be understood to include the whole Federal party; far from it. I believe there are some, and I hope a considerable portion, who are American in principle, and would, perhaps, go as far as any American in defending their country's rights. Sir, it is not my intention to arraign motives; but, speaking of party, what has been the conduct of the Federalists for twelve years past, ever since the termination of the Reign of Terror? A uniform opposition to everything of a prominent character proposed by the different republican Administrations. Now, sir, if Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison had been the weakest of men, as well as the wickedest, (which no man in his senses, who had any respect for his character, or standing in society, would assert,) they must have accidentally happened on something right in the course of twelve years.

Mr. Speaker, it is mortifying to see gentlemen who call themselves Americans, rise up in the face of the nation to palliate and vindicate the conduct of an enemy, and at the same time reprobate, in the strongest language of ridicule, every step proposed by the Administration calculated to counteract the iniquitous and destructive policy of our enemy. Can such conduct be called American? Sir, when it ought to be the duty and pride of every man having any pretensions to American principles, to rally under the governmental standard, in order to assist in expelling our tyrannical oppressors from the Continent, by which extricating the Government from its present difficulties, you see the Federal party making every exertion in their power to make the war a dishonorable one.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is in the nature of tyrannical or despotic Governments to take arbitrary strides; yet, sir, I do believe that the impositions and oppressions heaped upon the American Government; the evils under which we at this time labor, are measurably, if not entirely, attributable to the party hostilely arrayed against the Administration. Sir, they have, by their uniform opposition, led the British to believe that they had a powerful party in this country; that parties were nearly equally balanced; that it would be impossible for a Republican Administration to adhere to any decided stand taken against England, and that finally the English party would prevail. Thus, sir, have Government been beset by party. They have been baffled in every peaceable step calculated to vindicate our rights, or redress our grievances, until, by the injustice of our foreign enemy, bottomed on the aid they calculated on receiving from our domestic foes, the Government have been forced into war. And now you are told to put a stop to the war, and try once more if Britain will not do us justice. Degrading thought! Sir, we have already humbled ourselves in making proposals, and all efforts on the part of the Administration failed. The world has seen and understood that the failure was attributable to her own wickedness, and not to our pertinacity. Sir, the American Administration has exhibited an example of moderation unparalleled in the annals of the world; our forbearance has astonished the universe, and we have the consolation to see that neither the guilt of aggression, nor the folly of ambition, can be fairly attributed to it. Negotiation, as well as patience, has been exhausted. Instead of appealing again to the justice of a Government that makes principle bend to power, we have been necessarily compelled (though reluctantly) to appeal to arms, and I trust in God that they will never be laid down short of justice. Sir, the opposition tells you that the principle of impressment is not worth contending for. Anti-American! Sir, have we come to this? Are the people—the descendants of the heroes of '76—prepared for this? They are not, the declarations of the Federalists to the contrary notwithstanding. Sir, in order to avoid this conflict with our old oppressors and inveterate foe, will we, who call ourselves freemen, friends of liberty, citizens of the only Republic in the world, suffer real Americans, the descendants of those who immortalized their names by achieving valorous deeds in the war of the Revolution, by which America was emancipated from the thralldom of the tyrant's grasp, to be kidnapped, torn from their friends and relations, confined on board of floating dungeons, and subject to the lash of every petty naval tyrant? I trust not; humanity, justice forbid it! Sir, if we have become so weak and degenerate as to acknowledge ourselves unwilling or incapable to defend and protect our own citizens, then the controversy is at an end; there is no necessity for a further prosecution of the war; we may at once abandon the stand Government has taken against tyranny and oppression. The next step is to surrender all our rights to the entire disposal of Britain, and become colonies. Is this what gentlemen want? I hope not; but if not, why this violent and systematic opposition to the stand Government has taken? Why so clamorous in favor of receding or retracing our steps? Gentlemen tell you that the people are against you; that you cannot go on; that they will not support you; that you dare not touch the pockets of the people by taxation, lest they should flounce. Pray, sir, who are the people the gentlemen speak of? A few Federalists with whom they correspond, who are in all probability attached to Britain and her policy, consequently, are disposed to clamor, with an expectation that it will deter Congress from pursuing the course marked out. Sir, eight-tenths of the people are not so ignorant as not to know that their most invaluable rights and dearest interest, the liberty of posterity, are involved in the contest; for, sir, if our old masters could, by either force or machinations, bring us under them again, they would do it, as they have never pardoned us our independence; and, sir, the people are not so mercenary as not to be willing to contribute their proportionable part of the expense, which will necessarily be incurred in this just and necessary conflict; necessary, sir, because it has been forced on us by our tyrannical oppressors. Sir, it is in the power of a few disaffected characters, by engaging opposition prints, to propagate their illiberality, and fulminate their calumnies, and having such men as Timothy Pickering, and the representative of the Essex Junto (Mr. Q.) at their head, to make a great noise; they may for a while deceive the people, and lead them astray; but I am satisfied, sir, that there is too much good sense, good information, among the people, to suffer them to turn against themselves. I am satisfied, sir, that they will ultimately discover the deception, when those designing leaders will have to shrink into their lurking holes, to prevent sanguinary vengeance from overtaking them.

Mr. Speaker, the Federalists cry out French influence! French influence! What does this mean? They know it is not the fact; they cannot produce a single instance in support of the declaration. No, sir, it is done by way of throwing dust in your eyes, to prevent you from discovering another kind of influence which I am afraid is too prevalent in this country, and which has brought the Government almost to the brink of a precipice, and now every exertion is making, by thwarting the Administration, to shove you off that precipice. Sir, the clamors which have been raised and sung so loud against the late and present Administrations, as well as against the war, sprang up in commercial towns. But it should be recollected, that it is there that foreign influence resides, and consequently the greater portion of systematic opposition to the measures of a Government in collision with that nation from which this foreign influence emanates.

Sir, why this extraordinary solicitude for the poor Canadians? I think it would be equally as honorable for gentlemen to reserve their sympathies for the innocent inhabitants of our frontiers who fall victims to the merciless and savage allies of Britain. What can be the cause of this extraordinary predilection (as it appears to me) for Britain and her principles? If gentlemen would take an impartial view of their conduct towards all nations, and more particularly America, I think they would find but little to bottom confidence on. It is almost proverbial, sir, that their touch is pollution. It would be folly to detain you by detailing crimes. Sir, there is no crime which can be perpetrated, but for which ready precedents may be found in the conduct of that perfidious nation towards America. All nations with which they have been connected, have not only felt the perfidy of their alliance, the impotence of their protection, but the sting of their pride.

But, sir, I told you I would not detain you long, and I will not; as I have not subscribed to the new-fashioned doctrine, that a man's talents are to be measured by the length of his speech. I am old-fashioned enough, sir, to suppose a case, where, by having reference to all the documents printed for years back, and expatiating on them, long speeches might be made, and no great pretensions to talents either. Sir, I shall say no more, only to give gentlemen notice, that if this debate is not suffered to be closed in a very short time, I shall attempt to close it by calling the previous question.

Mr. CHEVES rose.—It was for some time during this debate, said he, my intention to have mingled my unimportant opinions and sentiments with those of other gentlemen in this discussion; but I gave way from time to time before the eagerness of others who were desirous of presenting themselves to your attention, and I had entirely abandoned the idea of taking any part in the argument; but the sudden and unexpected indisposition at this moment of my worthy friend and honorable colleague, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) the chairman of the committee with whom this bill originated, who was expected to close the debate, has left a vacuum in the argument which I propose to fill. Could he have addressed you, as he was prepared and anxious, in the faithful discharge of his duty, to do, it would have rendered the feeble attempt which I shall make as unnecessary as it would have been impertinent and obtrusive. I propose, then, to speak, as my honorable friend would probably have done, generally, but briefly, on the several heads of discussion which have been introduced into the debate, which has not been on the bill before you, but on the general merits of the war; the origin, progress, and continuance of it. I mean not to censure the wide range which this discussion has taken. It is fair and right in gentlemen of the opposition to select some occasion during each session on which to discuss the great questions of State which the public events of the passing times present; and the one furnished by the bill before you was perhaps as proper as any other.

Almost all the gentlemen who have addressed you, have very gravely told you, by way of exordium, of their unquestionable right to do so, and of the firmness with which they mean to assert and exercise it, as if there had been, at any time, really an opposition to this freedom of discussion. These introductions must be a little amusing to the members of this House and to the attendants in your galleries, who have been in the habit of listening to the gentlemen. But if there ever could have been a doubt on this subject, and surely there never was any, the debate, which I hope is about to be closed, affords an ample refutation of it. There are parts of this debate which will descend to distant posterity as a monument of the freedom of discussion in this Hall. I trust, sir, we shall furnish few such testimonies—I hope never to see another exhibited on this floor. They must be looked upon with apprehension by all those who consider the restraints of personal politeness and the urbanity of social esteem as affording a better security to those who love peace and good manners, for the preservation of these valuable objects, than can be lent by the strongest arm or the severest sanctions which positive institutions have established; restraints under which even "vice itself loses half its evil, by losing all its grossness." I shall imitate the example of gentlemen who followed in the debate—I shall pour oil upon the waves, and endeavor to still the raging of the storm.

Gentlemen, fruitful in epithets, yet rather fruitful in their abundance than in their variety, have called this an unjust, wanton, wicked, and unnecessary war. I, on the contrary, assert it to be a just and necessary war. One characteristic difficulty here presents itself, which has occurred in all the discussion in and out of this House on this subject. What is a just and necessary war? By the advocates of war it is asserted that the injuries and insults of the enemy demanded war, and rendered this war just and necessary. The opponents of war admit the magnitude of the insults and injuries, but deny the inference. They assert that the war is unnecessary and not justifiable, because the pecuniary expenditure and loss will exceed in value the commercial objects for which we are contending. The advocates of war deny both the premises and the conclusion. The objects of the war are not merely commercial, but, if they were, the inference is denied. They admit that the pecuniary expenditure and loss will exceed the pecuniary value of the commercial objects for which they contend, but they deny that a war for commercial objects is therefore unnecessary or indefensible. To an intelligible argument it seems, therefore, under these circumstances, necessary that we should begin by some definition of a just and necessary war; and yet it seems to be a melancholy labor in a great and free State, where public sentiment should be unequivocal on such subjects, to proceed by rules of logic to establish great first principles of public sentiment; but I fear that, as all good things are purchased by concomitant sacrifices, we have not obtained the innumerable blessings and advantages of the freedom of speech and of the press for nothing. I fear they have sometimes substituted an erring reason for a better guide—the great uncontaminated current of public feeling—the moral sense of the nation, of which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) so often tells so much.

But we must inquire, what is a just and necessary war? A war is just and necessary when waged to protect and defend the violated pecuniary interests of a country; or to defend and secure the sovereign rights and independence of a country; or, lastly and principally, to support and maintain the national honor. The last, indeed, embraces all the others; and, if I have distinguished, it is rather in conformity with custom, or for the purpose of elucidation than from any practical separation which I admit between the last and the former. But I am likely to incur the derision of the honorable gentlemen in the opposition by speaking of national honor. They seem not to have admitted the term into their vocabulary; they treat it as a new language; they remind me of the character of Goldfinch, in one of Holcroft's plays, who, when he hears the Romans mentioned, exclaims, "Romans! Romans! who are they?" So the gentlemen, "national honor! what's that? what's that?" Yet, sir, strange as it may seem to the honorable gentlemen over the way, the maintenance of the principle of national honor, by which I mean that principle which animates and sustains an elevated fitness of character and conduct, is the only justifiable cause of war; and, if necessary, the principle ought to be maintained by all the sacrifices of war in its worst shape. No war is justifiable or necessary which is waged merely for pecuniary objects, if we can suppose such a war, for all wars involve expense and loss greater than the amount of any pecuniary objects for which they can be waged. On the ground of interest merely they would not, therefore, be justifiable; and there is to be superadded, what cannot be valued in money, the value of human life. But the value of everything is founded on the security with which it is enjoyed. One unpunished violation of right provokes another and another, until all security is destroyed; and, therefore, it is necessary to resist given infractions of pecuniary right by sacrifices beyond the value of the right itself, because resistance is necessary to the security of all other pecuniary rights—nay, to the security of all other rights. Security of rights is a political thing; it is the protection of Government; it derives its value, and a great portion of its power, too, from a faithful and unrelaxed application of it to all the rights and interests of a nation; and is diminished in its value, and in its power also, by any failure to afford the protection which is due by Government to the subjects and the interests under its control. To abandon any interest is to abandon all, and to protect one is to protect all; war, therefore, waged to protect one political right is waged to protect all political rights; no war is, in consequence, made for any given right merely as such, but for all the rights and interests which are bound together in a nation under the social and civil compacts. To compare the expenditure and losses of war with the value of commercial objects, which may be the immediate causes of war, is to talk idly, and to forget the true end of all war and the first great purpose of Government—security. A great man (Sir James Mackintosh) has said, "the paramount interest of every State, that which comprehends all others, is security." Will you then, it may be inquired, go to war to avenge the infraction of the smallest right under the protection of Government, and for this object jeopardize every other, and spill the blood of your fellow-citizens? Certainly not. There is a fitness which cannot be defined in anticipation, but which is easily discoverable when the occasion occurs, which determines when a war is necessary. It may depend upon the nature of the injury; on the character which the nation has acquired; on its ability to avenge the injury; on the character of the nation which has inflicted the injury, and a thousand other circumstances. The question ought always to be, What becomes the nation? What is due to the national honor? What is necessary to sustain an elevated fitness of character and conduct in the nation? If the injury sustained be one which cannot or will not probably be repeated, it is less necessary to avenge it. If the nation be poor and feeble, it may be obliged to submit to the violation of a great right. If it be great and powerful, it must sometimes resent a smaller injury; it may sometimes disdain to notice a considerable aggression upon its rights; in short, in no instance is the expense of the war a rule which will prove it just and necessary, or otherwise; in every instance is national honor, that is, a fitness of character and conduct, the rule by which its necessity and justifiable character are determinable. Generally when a nation is able to resist with effect the infraction of important pecuniary rights, it seems indubitable that an elevated fitness of character and conduct requires resistance. But this obligation is increased, and is less doubtful when any of the sovereign rights of a nation are infringed, as in gross and reiterated insults to the national flag, habitual violations of the personal liberty of its subjects, invasion of its territories, and the like; these are assaults upon its independence, and there is no room left for an inquiry into the fitness of resistance; it may indeed be supposed to change from a question of expediency to an act of necessity; it is a struggle for self-preservation; the nation acts upon a principle which is inherent in the meanest insect, and of which inanimate matter is not divested; the worm when trodden on writhes in resistance as well as anguish, and the reaction of inanimate matter seems to be the repulsive act of self-preservation.

What, then, did an elevated fitness of character and conduct require of the American Government, in relation to Great Britain, at the moment war was declared? What does it still require? I repeat, the war is a just and necessary war. This will be proved by adverting to the causes of the war. What, then, were the causes of the war? They were principally new and before unheard of blockades—the Orders in Council, which have been generally so called, by way of pre-eminence; the spoiliations of our commerce under various unfounded and insulting pretexts, and the impressment of our seamen. I am not permitted by the circumstances under which I address you to go at length into any of these subjects. But I may ask, what on the ocean did we enjoy but by the sufferance of Great Britain? What insults, what injuries had we not suffered? When did they begin; when, though they may have been varied in character, were they relaxed in degree, and when were they probably to cease? I will stop to notice one or two of the arguments which have been offered by the gentlemen of the opposition on this part of the subject.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. EMOTT) says, the blockade of May 1806 ought not really to have been a subject of complaint on the part of the United States, because he says it was a relaxation of the rule of '56. The rule of '56, without admitting or inquiring into the justice of the rule, may be declared to be a rule forbidding the direct transportation in neutral vessels of the produce of the colonies of a belligerent to the European ports of that belligerent. Now the blockade of May 1806, founds no interdict on the origin of the produce or commodity conveyed; but interdicts an entrance into the ports of a great line of coast which it was physically impossible actually to blockade. Indeed, this order of blockade did extend the principle of the rule of '56, by forbidding intercourse in neutral vessels from one of the ports of a belligerent, or ports dependent on him, to another of these ports. In short, this innocent and even beneficent order, as gentlemen will have it, embraces the substance of all the subsequent Orders in Council. Gentlemen have revived the old argument which originated with them and will end with them, that the French decrees were not repealed, because of the informality of the instrument—the letter of the Duke of Cadore of the 5th of August, 1810. One gentleman (Mr. BLEECKER) has said that this Government was tricked by France into a war with Great Britain, and the evidence of this trick is the subsequent formal act of repeal. Now, the first act was either a repeal or it was not, and if a repeal, the subsequent act of France, though it were repugnant, could not change the character of the first act. But it is not repugnant. It is confirmatory, and recognises the first as a repeal. And so it has been considered by Great Britain, who never objected to the informality of the first act. It was left to the ingenuity of gentlemen on the other side of the House to furnish this sapient objection, and that they might not be injured in the right of authorship, they have been left to the exclusive enjoyment of it—Great Britain has never republished it; it is to be found in none of the voluminous correspondence of her Ministers. Her objections were not want of form in the act, but, 1. That the revocation was conditional and depended on the resistance of the United States to certain principles of blockade. 2. That it was partial, and applied not to all neutrals but to America alone. Now mark her consistency. She has revoked the Orders in Council, and that act of the French Government, which she has made the pretext for this revocation, is alike conditional and alike partial. It states the resistance of the United States as the ground of revocation, and it confines the revocation to America. Great Britain has then deserted the gentlemen on the other side of the House, and has herself admitted, in effect and in practice, the sufficiency of that revocation which the honorable gentlemen say was no revocation. The act of the Government was then strictly proper. The decrees of France were repealed. But gentlemen, for want of better argument, dwell on the perfidy of France to this country and the general atrocity of the conduct of her ruler. Who is the apologist of France? Is any man on this side of the House? No, sir. For my own part, I hope that the unjust acts of France may be resented and that we may be enabled to punish her for her perfidy and injustice. Without using the violent, I was about to say gross epithets which have become fashionable, I declare I abhor and detest as much as gentlemen on the other side of the House, the conduct of France. I wish Spain to be emancipated from her yoke. I shall rejoice in the conflagration of Moscow if it were to save the independence of Russia. This I hope is the language of all parties. All unite, I believe, in their abhorrence of the conduct and character of the man who sways the destiny of France. Why then is it said, when we have the will and want but the power and opportunity to resist him, that we have indulged a partiality for France? Great Britain has been properly selected as the first object of our hostility. When a proposition was made to include France as well as Great Britain in the declaration of war, gentlemen on neither side of the House did support it. The opposition prints throughout the Union laughed it to scorn. Few men thought of resisting both at once. The voice of both parties appeared to be against it. The Government, obliged to resist, was obliged to select its enemy. Should France have been selected? With the blood of our citizens insultingly slaughtered without the slightest provocation, on the shores of our own territory, unatoned for till the moment of the declaration of war, with the habitual impression of our seamen in every sea, with the continual and reiterated violation of your right to seek where you choose a market for your native produce, all before your eyes, and with no hope of a discontinuance of these injuries, we are told that we ought to have diverted our enmity from Great Britain, and directed it against France. Where, sir, could we attack France? Where are her colonies into which we could carry our arms? Where could we subjugate her provinces? Where are her ships?—where her commerce? Where could we have carried on against her any of the operations of war? Would the chivalry of gentlemen on the other side of the House have suggested an invasion of France? An honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. GOLD) said it would not have required another man nor another ship, to have resisted France. But, why, I pray you? Because such a resistance would have been confined to the idle and nugatory act of declaring it. Effectual resistance would have been impracticable. Gentlemen would resist France, would declare war against France, merely to show their indignation at her perfidy and injustice; and here I confess my feelings go with the gentleman—I would do so too, had we no other enemy to contend with.

H. OF R.

But if we had abandoned or deferred our resistance to the injuries of England, and as a pretext for it assailed France, would not the act have been idle and weak? Would it not have been wicked, to borrow one of the epithets which gentlemen have applied to the war with England, so to have sported with the public feelings and the national resentment as to have declared war against France, the minor aggressor, whom we could not touch, and to have suppressed our resentment against Great Britain, whose injuries were unlimited and unceasing, and whom alone we could reach? But why, sir, are the injuries these nations have done us contrasted, and those of the one made an apology for those of the other? Why are we partisans of either? Have we no country of our own? Is there a land upon the globe, so fair, so happy, and so free? And, beholding and enjoying these blessings,

"Breathes there the man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!"

Sir, I feel neither as a Frenchman nor Briton, but as an American. As a citizen of the United States, I bear no affection to any other country. If I have any feeling of partiality for either of the great belligerents, it is for the country, and the people of Great Britain. From them I draw my blood in a very short descent. But that nation is the injurer of my country, and I can see her in no other light than that of an enemy, nor can I find any apology for her in the injuries France has done us. Sir, the Government did right in discriminating between Britain and France, and selecting the former. It was the only mode of real practical resistance. The world would have laughed at us had we declared war against France, who was no longer able to injure us, whom we could not assail with effect, and have left the unceasing injuries of Great Britain to go on unresisted and unresented. The world would have considered it as a mere cover for our pusillanimity. I say then, that the Government was not tricked into a war with Great Britain. It was commenced in the prosecution of the best and most deliberate policy. It was the only honorable and practicable course. If there has been an error, and I think there has, it was in not having long since resisted England. War against England should have followed the first embargo; that was a wise measure, but it could not endure forever; it carried the policy of commercial restriction upon the enemy as far as such a policy should ever be carried, which from its nature can only be temporary. It at the same time prepared the nation for war; it brought home your wealth and seamen; it brought home your vessels, and placed you in the attitude in which the nation ought to have been previous to war, and its termination ought to have been followed by immediate and vigorous war. The pulse of the nation was high, and the confidence of the people in their rulers and resources great. Distrust has grown out of the hesitation and timidity then manifested. If the embargo had been followed up by war, some of the greatest injuries we have since suffered would not have occurred. France would not have ventured to have seized and sequestered our vessels and property as she subsequently did. She was tempted to do it because she saw we would suffer and submit to any injury.

But gentlemen say, that their great aversion to this war arises from the danger of French alliance. Is it possible? Do we want the armies of France, or, if we did, could they reach our shores? Do we want her navy? Has she any that dare venture to sea? Where can she aid us? Where can we unite? There is an astonishing similarity in the history of free governments. The Athenians were afraid to resist Philip because it would involve them in an alliance with the Great King. It was alleged that he was a barbarian and the common enemy of all free States. But said their great orator: "For, my part, when I find a man apprehending danger from a person who resides in Susa or Ecbatana, and yet speaking in another strain of one who is at your gates, who is extending his conquests in the very heart of Greece, the plunderer of the Greeks, I am astonished, and regard that man, whoever he is, as dangerous, who does not see danger in Philip." So I must regard the counsels of that man, whoever he is, who, fearing French alliance, would submit to British aggression. I mean, however, to impute no improper motive to gentlemen in the opposition—an opposition always runs into extremes, and, with a knowledge of this fact, I can easily account for their conduct, however extraordinary I may consider it, without supposing their motives to be worse than my own. If they be real, I am indeed astonished at their fears of French alliance. It seems to me impossible. But let us not by an unnecessary fear of one Power, however great, fail to repel the injuries of another Power which is continually pressing upon us. Submission to Britain now would prepare us for submission to France hereafter. The way to prepare to resist the alarming power of France, should we be assailed by it, is now to resist Great Britain, and raise up in the minds of our citizens a spirit that will fearlessly contend against injury and injustice, come from whatsoever quarter it may. But, sir, it is idle—it is worse than idle to talk of the danger of French alliance.

Gentlemen say, that popular opinion was against the war. I deny it, sir. It was called for by popular opinion; and this will not be disproved, however soon popular opinion shall incline to peace, and gentlemen on the other side of the House regain the reins of power, as they are not unlikely to do, however just and necessary the war. Any man who thought with half the ability with which the gentlemen do, must have believed that in voting for war, he was probably surrendering himself politically a victim on the altar of his country, yet it is frequently declared, that the majority have declared this war to preserve their seats. They declared it against popular opinion, too, to preserve their seats, which they hold by the tenure of popular opinion! Are gentlemen serious? Look at the history of nations, and see if the war-makers have been generally the peace-makers. I cannot elevate the hopes of men who possess half the talents that the honorable gentlemen lay claim to (because their own sagacity must have made it known to them) by declaring that those who have made this war must be more fortunate than the authors of war usually are, if power does not change hands. Let gentlemen then be patient—the prospect before them is cheering. If the war shall be glorious, and the result happy, the best rights and interests of the country will have been secured by the exertions of the Government; and though it shall confirm the power of the majority, the gentlemen, endowed, as they undoubtedly are, with the best feelings of good men and Americans, will unite with us in a triumph which will elevate their country's honor and happiness. If otherwise, they, in the fulness of that wisdom of which they neither seem unconscious nor diffident, will administer the Government themselves, and have neither wars nor rumors of wars. But I repeat, that the popular opinion called for war. The people were not satisfied with the temporizing and pacific measures which the Government had pursued for several years; they began to declare and to believe that the Government was incompetent to the purposes for which it was instituted. Had the Government continued to show by its practice that it was incapable of defending the national rights and honor by arms, this glorious and happy Union, which we all profess to hold dear and sacred, would not long have been thought worth preserving, and would have died of mere inanition. Who would not have pointed the finger of scorn at the Government which would not go to war for such rights as those for which we entered into this contest? Let gentlemen look at the matter with impartiality, and see whether the Government would not have ceased to merit and to receive the respect of its citizens, if it failed to protect such rights and interests. It would have manifested a want of that spirit without which any Government will be despicable. But it is said, the war was declared prematurely, without the necessary previous preparations, and that in this respect the weakness and wickedness of the measure were particularly exemplified. I know, sir, that men who took upon them the office of prophets and foretellers, in both Houses of Congress, did pronounce the declaration of war premature, and predicted numerous and fatal disasters which were to follow: our commerce was to be destroyed, and our vessels indiscriminately swept from the ocean; our towns were to be sacked; our slaves were to be in a state of insurrection, &c. Their counsel was, Wait till the Winter—then the season will protect your harbors and maritime towns, and your Army will be increased and disciplined. But the season of danger has passed—I mean that season in which it was predicted we should suffer these disasters—and what portion of the evil prophecy has been realized? Has our commerce been swept from the ocean? Has it not nearly all reached our harbors in safety? Are our cities sacked? Are our slaves in a state of insurrection? It was also predicted that our gallant little Navy would be annihilated. This has been falsified by the great exploits of our naval heroes. Look on these and say whether the war was prematurely commenced or not! Would you for all the money that has been expended, and to retrieve all the sacrifices of the war, consent to expunge from the pages of history the achievements of Hull, and Jones, and Decatur? I heard the other day a patriot of the Revolution declare, in a spirit which should animate us all—speaking of the reward which it was proposed to bestow on the officers and crew of the Constitution—“I would rather add five millions to the national debt, than strike that single event from the national records.” Would not you all? The answer from both sides of the House must be affirmative. With these events before me, I cannot regret that the declaration of war was not delayed.

But war was prematurely declared, it is said, because we had not a regular disciplined army at the time. Preparation for operations on land must have been relative to the defence of our own territory, or the invasion of the enemy's territory. The militia are the proper and the adequate defenders of the soil on which they live; for this purpose we did not want any other army. They might have been made more extensively useful. I join not with their revilers—I wish that their usefulness had not been circumscribed by a doctrine subversive of the true principles of the Constitution which was maintained on this floor. I rejoice that I combatted that doctrine; yet I do not mean to consider them as a fit army of invasion. I acknowledge that we were not prepared with a regular disciplined army, qualified for the invasion and conquest of the enemy's country. But should we have been prepared by Winter, the time to which gentlemen wished to have deferred the declaration of war? It is a truth, that a Government like ours never will, and never can, be prepared for war in peace. The great and effective preparations for war must grow out of the progress and events of the war. Notwithstanding our disasters on land, I believe our preparation is greater, and our situation better, than it would have been had the war been deferred. We were to expect, in the commencement of the war, to suffer such misfortunes. Except in the affair of Detroit, nothing has happened which should cause us to blush: that disgrace, like the disgrace of the Chesapeake, will be the harbinger of glory—I take it as an omen of victory. I pledge myself, if the war continue, it will be so in the event. As the war stands at this moment, we have suffered little, and we have humbled the pride of the enemy where it was most insulting. We have insured the confidence of the nation, from the seashore to the mountains beyond them, as far as our population reaches, in our naval ability. I ask the gentlemen on the other side of the House, whether we have not gained something in this respect by the war? In one word, who would now commence the war and take the chance of better success in preference to the actual fortune of the war since it has been declared. It was not prematurely declared. I now contend the war ought to be continued. Some gentlemen have thought fit to say in debate, that the only alleged cause of war was formed by the Orders in Council. But from their own act, their celebrated protest, I will prove the contrary. Impressment is there enumerated as among the causes of war, as it was in all the public acts of the time relative to the causes of war. Without more words, I am authorized in asserting that impressment was one of the principal causes of the war; and although had the Orders in Council been revoked, and their revocation known to us before war was declared, we would no doubt have temporized longer; yet this cause itself must in the end have produced war. The honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) with whom I reciprocate the appellation of friend with pride and pleasure, because party feelings break no link of my friendships, says we have renounced our objections to the British practice of impressment, because the Treaty of 1794 is silent on the subject. It is true there is no provision respecting it, but an article of the treaty discloses the fact, that many points of difference were left unsettled, and the public documents of that period show that this was among them.

[Mr. RANDOLPH explained. He did not say that the silence of that treaty was a renunciation of the objection, but it proved that the practice of impressment was not considered at that time, in itself, as sufficient cause of war.]

It appears that very soon after the General Government went into operation this practice was the subject of remonstrance; this was under the Administration of General WASHINGTON. It has been the subject of negotiation and remonstrance under every succeeding Administration. But it is alleged, because it was not settled in the Treaty of 1794, that it was not considered by General WASHINGTON as justifiable cause of war, and it is inferred that it ought not now to be considered as sufficient cause for the continuance of the war. What, sir, shall constitute cause of war? The spoliation of your property? Not so, say gentlemen, because the expenditure for redress will be greater than the injury sustained. The violation of the personal liberty of your citizens and the degradation of the ensign of your sovereignty? No, say gentlemen, General WASHINGTON did not consider these as sufficient cause of war. Will, then, any injury, or any combination of injuries, authorize or require national resentment? The reasoning of the gentlemen would lead us to a negative conclusion. But in their estimate of the actual causes of the present war, they appear to consider the business of impressment as trivial, and the Orders in Council as everything. What, sir, will you go to war for property, the value of which is only relative, and which, compared with personal liberty, is worthless, and refuse to go to war for the personal liberty of the citizen? for that which is alike

"Given to the fool, the vain, the evil—

"To Ward, to Waters, Chartres, and the Devil!"

You will wage war, and not to rescue your fellow-citizens from imprisonment and stripes? But, however this subject was to be viewed before we were actually involved in war, it must now be put on a footing of certainty; if our claim be not secured it will be surrendered; to make peace without obtaining any security against the abuse of which we complain, would be to acquiesce in it, and to acquiesce in it would be to surrender the rights of the country. This was the reasoning of Mr. King, who in one of his communications to Government on this subject says, he has abandoned negotiation, because to acquiesce in the views of the British Government would be to surrender our rights. And shall I be obliged, sir, to come here with volumes of documents to prove the rights of the citizen; to demonstrate that the naval officers of Britain have not a right to incarcerate him; to drag him to the gangway and flog him? Shall I be obliged by a laborious process of reasoning to prove the obligation of Government to rescue him from such suffering? No, gentlemen generally have abandoned this ground, and say, that the impressment of our citizens is under proper circumstances justifiable cause of war; and the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. PEARSON,) who opened the debate on this subject says, that if a fit proposition, accompanied by means calculated to give it a fair chance of success, were tendered and did not procure a cessation of the practice of impressment, he would support the war. What is the proposition which he submits? That we shall prohibit from serving in our ships the seamen of Great Britain and other foreign seamen, and confine our crews to our own citizens. This being done he will support the war. I challenge gentlemen on the other side of the House to say distinctly to the people, for whom an honorable gentleman (Mr. QUINCY) has said this debate was intended, that this war should not be continued for the protection of our seamen; they will not, they dare not. But if they are against the continuance of the war it is on that ground and no other. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) says, Great Britain has a right to insist on the services of her own subjects, and that England would not be England if she could not command them. I say, that America will cease to be America if she suffers her to command them at the price of the liberty of her citizens and the honor of her flag. The same gentleman says, England will nail the flag to the mast and go to the bottom with it, rather than surrender the right of taking her seamen from on board our merchant vessels. I hope, sir, we shall imitate the noble example she sets us, and make every sacrifice rather than give up our citizens to bondage and stripes.

I perceive, sir, that I am occupying too much of your time, and I will pass over many of the observations I meant to have made. I will not travel over the history of our negotiations on this subject, as I intended to have done, but come immediately to the proposition of Mr. Russell. It was, that we should pass laws prohibiting under the severest penalties the employment of any other seamen than American citizens on board our vessels, including under this denomination only natives and those who are already naturalized. This brings me to the discrimination made by the gentleman from North Carolina, to whom I have before alluded. He would support the Government, he said, in a war for the protection of native seamen, if such laws were passed as would prohibit the employment of others. Will he not also support a war for the protection of those already adopted into our political family? He will; I answer for it, he will. As a man feeling for the character of his country he will; as a man of honor, he will. Look at the Constitution—it gives the power to naturalize. Excuse me, sir, for descending for a moment to verbal criticism. What is the import of the verb, to naturalize? It is to make men as native citizens. The Constitution has given the power to Congress to do this, with but one limitation. And what has Congress done? It has naturalized foreigners without any other than the Constitutional limitation, but it has done it on condition, that they forever abjure their native allegiance! On oath they declare, that they will serve no other Sovereign, and, in consequence, solemnly renounce the protection of every other! It is impossible for any native to be, politically, more an American—it imposes on him every obligation and gives him every right, except that of a capacity to be the Chief Magistrate of the nation. What, then, is the obligation of the Government to the adopted citizen? Pledged by the Constitution and the laws to protect and treat him as a native citizen, can the functionaries of that Constitution and those laws discriminate between him and a native citizen? Was the provision of the Constitution, were the laws of naturalization wise? are questions which may be fairly made, but having already pledged the faith of both, if you do not protect him your character is gone. It will stink in the nostrils of posterity! Will you say that you cannot protect him? Will you adopt the idea, which has been suggested, of giving pensions to them in lieu of political protection? A pension of six hundred dollars in lieu of the privileges of an American citizen! I am shocked at the idea. How worthless, how degraded in the eyes of mankind would we be could we make such a faithless compromise. Who will sell his birth-right, who will sell his right of affiliation for a pension of six hundred dollars? Will you, can you then discriminate between the protection due to native and naturalized citizens? Let not any mariner be naturalized, if you choose to forbid it, but do not pledge the sacred faith of the Constitution and the laws and then violate that pledge under any such untenable pretext.

But, say gentlemen, the public law of all nations on earth, ancient and modern, has denied the right of expatriation. Admit that they are correct, and for the purpose of the argument, I do admit that such is the general law. But what is this law as modified by the practice of nations? Every nation which has thus forbidden expatriation has at the same time granted naturalization, and the general practice of nations is undoubtedly the law of nations. Does not England naturalize foreigners? Does she not naturalize your citizens? If she does not do it as generally as you do, it is because it is not her policy to do so; it is enough that she naturalizes your seamen; it is enough that all nations have, at the same moment, forbidden expatriation and granted naturalization. The law must be the result of neither exclusively, but of both these practices. Mr. Burke, (the great Edmund,) who was certainly no innovator, denominates Charles XII the murderer of Patkul. Patkul was born a Swedish subject and had repeatedly taken up arms against his Sovereign, he was adopted by Russia and had been her Minister at the Court of Poland. Charles XII, the Sovereign to whom his natural allegiance was due, obtained possession of his person and put him to death—this act Mr. Burke denominates murder!

Governments which have naturalized foreigners have protected their naturalized subjects, and the Government to whom the native allegiance of such subjects was due, though they have denied the right of expatriation, have not impugned the protecting interposition of the adopted sovereign. If they have, it has been considered as an act of unprincipled violence, and in the instance of Patkul has merited and received the denomination of murder. On this subject I will quote a single sentence from one of Mr. King's letters; he says, "it behooves the British Government to adhere to the principle of natural allegiance wholly or renounce it wholly." Contending themselves for the right of naturalization, can the British Government deny it to others? On the part of this Government sufficient evidence of its pacific and accommodating disposition appears in its offer to surrender everything it can consistently with national faith. On the part of Britain a protraction of the war, by refusing to meet us on the terms proposed, can proceed from no other motive than a determination to continue that abuse of power which she has inflicted and we have suffered so long. The ground taken by this country is what we must insist upon keeping, and I doubt not we will succeed if we contend for it as we ought. The informality of the negotiation between our Chargé d'Affairs and the British Government has been mentioned as a cause of its failure. If there had been an amicable disposition on the part of the British Government the authority would have been considered ample. If there be not an amicable disposition we will negotiate in vain. We must fight or we shall never succeed in obtaining a recognition of our rights. I will advert to one argument of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) who has examined this subject with ability. It is that one which appeared to me to make the greatest impression on the House. He said he had examined the voluminous document on the subject of impressment, which was printed during the last session by order of the House, and that it did not appear from that document that more than ninety-three American seamen had been impressed in the year 1809; from which I believe every one who heard him inferred that it was proved affirmatively by that document, that no more than ninety-three American seamen, who were named therein, were impressed in that year. Now, what is the fact? The document does not state in one case, perhaps of eight or ten, when the impressment took place, and there are one thousand five hundred and fifty-eight persons named in that document. Of course the gentleman could not be authorized to say that but ninety-three, or any other precise number, were impressed in 1809. All those, the date of whose detention is not stated, may have been impressed in 1809. It is probable much the greatest portion was. A more particular examination of this point of inquiry will prove the magnitude of the evil. From the 1st of April, 1809, to the 30th September, 1810, a period of eighteen months only, a single agent of this Government, in London, received one thousand five hundred and fifty-eight applications from impressed seamen. How many were unable to apply? Men imprisoned on board ships of war, scattered over the ocean and on distant stations, how could they apply to Mr. Lyman in London and give in their names? The number impressed must have been great indeed when a single agent in the short space of eighteen months registered the names of one thousand five hundred and fifty-eight applicants. Of this number a part was discharged, acknowledged to be Americans beyond the possibility of denial; a small number is detained as being born in England, and the remainder are detained under various pretexts—such as, supposed to be born in England, being on distant stations, having consular certificates proving them Danes, Swedes, &c.; as if they had any better right to take from on board an American vessel a Swede or a Dane than an American citizen. Even their own doctrine goes to assert a right to seize none but their own subjects. I ask now, whether the impression made by the gentleman from New York was a just one? Whether it does not appear probable that at least one thousand of those contained in this list were impressed without even a plausible pretext? But if in a single statement I make out a result so variant from the statement of the gentleman, I beg you and the public to test the other statements of the gentleman in the same way. Not, sir, that the gentleman made the statement with any unfair intention, for no man is more honorable or correct—he has my highest esteem—but, it will show how liable we are to err—nay, how prone we are to err when our feelings and habit of thinking run with our argument. So much for impressment. It is an abuse such as cannot be tolerated by an independent nation. It is one which ought to be resisted by war.

JANUARY, 1813.

In relation to the bill immediately before us. Sir, I have no knowledge of military matters. I confess I have considerable doubt as to the particular character of the force contemplated by the bill; but it is necessary that confidence in this respect should be reposed somewhere by those who have no confidence in their own judgment, and I am willing to repose it in those who recommend this bill. Gentlemen are alarmed at the idea of a standing army. What is the difference between this force and the volunteer force heretofore authorized to be raised? Fifty thousand men were authorized by the law on that subject now proposed to be repealed, and twenty thousand only by this bill which is proposed to substitute it. How stands the question as to power conferred on the Executive? He has had heretofore a greater force at his command, and with no difference in character, except that this is to be of a more regular character. Those might be raised for three years; these but for one. Those he officered without control; these under the partial control of the Senate. There is nothing therefore to dread in this bill.

One word in relation to the ways and means. The gentlemen have told you of the great expense of the war, and the great expense that will flow from the passage of this bill. What is the magnitude of the expense, compared with the importance of the object! Compare the last year's expenditure with that of the British nation, and see how infinitely limited our expenses appear. We incurred a debt for the last year of ten millions of dollars. Look at the sum wanted to supply the necessary funds for the expenses of the British nation, consisting of about double our population, for one year. Fifty-eight millions of pounds sterling! and this in addition to the immense burdens imposed for sinking the principal and discharging the interest on the pre-existing debt. It is said ten millions of dollars of debt have been entailed in the last year on the lands, property, and interest of this nation. Yes, sir, every citizen of the United States has to encounter the immense burden—of what? A debt of one dollar and twenty-five cents for each soul. The wealth and industry of this country are burdened to this amount. The honest mechanic, farmer, or planter, is liable, he and his posterity, to this vast amount, for the defence of his country for the last year! No, sir, not even so much; it will fall where it will not be felt, on the wealth of the country. On him not five and twenty cents perhaps of the debt will fall. The honest laboring man will have to encounter the immense burden of twenty-five cents; it will require a payment from him of as much as five cents per annum for four or five years to extinguish this debt. This is the horrible spectre which gentlemen imagine is to deter us from the prosecution of a just and righteous war. But twenty millions, it is said, will be required for the service of the ensuing year, and there are no means of getting it. Sir, there is more money liberated from commercial pursuits by the operations of war twice over than will be wanted in the year. The banks themselves could lend it from their emancipated capital. If the merchants do not employ their funds desperately, there will be more money liberated from commerce during the ensuing year, than would supply the Treasury for two years to come. There are in the United States fifty, as some say, I say sixty millions of bank capital, on which an hundred millions can be discounted. Where can this sum be employed? Where is the commerce which can employ it? Where is the agriculture which require it? Where are the manufactures which require it? How can we employ it? It must go into the funds and be loaned to the Government, unless there be a want of confidence in it. There can be no want of confidence. The error of omitting to lay taxes I believe was a great error; I would have made assured doubly sure; but it is not yet too late for the Legislature to do its duty—and there is no doubt then but the loans will be obtained on reasonable terms. But say that I am wrong in my calculations. I will put it upon the general ability of the country. Is this nation poor and miserable! Have we no resources? Is the war just and necessary? If so, will it be said that you have not the ability to carry it on? If the war be just, and you have the ability, it must be drawn forth. If the war be not just, put it down. If it be just, I feel confident it will be supported. There may have been errors in its management, but they may be corrected—and success cannot but crown the arms of the people striving in so just a cause.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative.—For the bill 77, against it 42, as follows:

Ordered, That the title be, "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to raise an additional military force, and for other purposes.'"

FRIDAY, January 15.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to encourage vaccination; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The amendments of the Senate to the "bill providing Navy pensions in certain cases" were read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate "supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes,'" was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Register of the Land Office at New Orleans, and the Register of the Land Office at Opelousas, respectively, for the Eastern and Western districts in the State of Louisiana, to receive additional evidence on claims to land authorizing the Registers and Receivers of Public Moneys of the said Land Offices to reconsider and decide on the claims, in favor of which new testimony shall be adduced; their decisions, however, to be subject to the revision of Congress when reported on; and that the committee report by bill, or otherwise.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making certain partial appropriations for the year 1813. The bill was reported with amendments; which were concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to day; which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Jared Shattuck. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill "in addition to the act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods;" which were again read at the Clerk's table: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do disagree to the said amendments, and desire a conference with the Senate upon the subject-matter thereof; and that managers be appointed at the said conference on their part.

MESSRS. BASSETT, REED, and McKIM, were appointed managers on the part of the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, made the second of December last, respecting an extension of the time limited by law for the payment of lands purchased of the United States; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

A motion was made by Mr. SHEFFEY, that, when the House adjourns, it will adjourn to meet again on Monday next. Negatived—yeas 51, nays 56.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the House agreed to reconsider the vote last taken on the motion for an adjournment until Monday.

The question was then again taken on the said motion, and passed in the affirmative.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the amendments to the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the more perfect organization of the Army of the United States," reported the agreement of that committee to the said amendments.

The amendments were then again read at the Clerk's table, and, except the last, concurred in by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. MILNOR to postpone the further consideration of the last amendment until Monday, which was rejected.

The question was then taken to concur in the amendment, and passed in the affirmative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have insisted on their amendments disagreed to by this House to the bill "in addition to the act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize-goods," and have agreed to the conference asked by this House upon the subject matter thereof.

HIGHLAND TURNPIKE.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the select committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the President, Directors, and Company, of the New York Highland Turnpike, made the following report, which was concurred in:

For the reasons and considerations therein stated, the memorialists ask the aid of twenty thousand dollars, or some other adequate contribution, for the purpose of building a bridge, and completing a road through the chain of mountains on the east side of Hudson river, between the cities of New York and Albany.

They urge in favor of their request, that the mail will be transported with greater speed, and troops and ordnance enabled to travel with additional ease, after the meditated improvements shall be completed. Indeed, they wish it to be patronized as a military way.

During the last session of Congress it was decided, after a fair and careful inquiry, that it was not expedient to make grants of land or money, for canals or similar conveyances, in the existing state of the Treasury and our public affairs.

The committee have not been able to discover anything in the memorial before them, entitling it to a preference over many others which have been laid aside.

It is hoped the time is not far distant, when the road of the memorialists, and numerous travelling routes besides, may be improved by a liberal extension of the national means. But the present does not appear to be the convenient season. At a more opportune moment, and in a more favorable condition of the finances, the committee anticipate a facilitated intercourse through various tracts of this extensive country, binding its citizens together by strong and increasing ties of convenience and interest. In this excellent work they have no doubt the memorialists will be considered and assisted.

In the mean time, it is recommended, that the memorialists have leave to withdraw their papers.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HEMPSTEAD observed, that he had certain resolutions to submit, on which, as they were somewhat in detail, he would ask the liberty to make a few remarks. Under the second section of the first act for adjusting land claims in the Territory of Louisiana, (now Missouri,) each actual settler was entitled to six hundred and forty acres of land, together with such other and further quantity as heretofore had been allowed for the wife and family of such actual settler, agreeably to the laws, usages, and customs of the Spanish Government. A majority of the board of Land Commissioners in that Territory were, under that section, so liberal in their grants, that it excited the alarm of Government. This alarm, sir, was soon transferred to the people, and has continued ever since; because a majority of the board passed from one extreme to the other, and granted, in many instances, only one hundred, one hundred and fifty, or two hundred arpens, where they had before granted seven or eight hundred arpens. The grants for the smaller quantities are contained in the lists of grants, and, being final against the United States, would never come before Congress, unless upon petitions from individual claimants. Other boards of Commissioners, acting under the same law, have granted to the actual settler in every instance, when the law had been complied with, six hundred and forty acres; and it would seem to me, sir, that the people of the Missouri Territory are entitled to the same justice.

The second resolution is to provide as well for rejected claims, in which no testimony has been adduced, as when testimony has been received; and to prevent individual claimants from loading our table with petitions. The mode pointed out will present all the claims to Congress at one time. With these observations I shall submit the resolutions for the sanction of the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing, in favor of the claimants, the re-examination of the grants of land made by the board of Commissioners for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the district of Louisiana, under the second section of the act, entitled "An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans and the district of Louisiana," passed the 2d of March, 1805; and also the grants made by the Recorder of Land Titles for the Territory of Missouri, under that part of the third section of the act, entitled "An act further providing for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Missouri," passed the 13th of June, 1812, which provides for settlement of donation rights in all cases where the quantity of land granted is less than six hundred and forty acres; and that said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Recorder of Land Titles for the Territory of Missouri to receive testimony in all the claims to land in which none has been adduced, and which are rejected in the report made by the late board of Commissioners for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the then district of Louisiana, now Territory of Missouri; and, afterwards, to arrange into classes, according to their respective merits, as well the claims embraced by this resolution, as the other rejected claims mentioned in said report, and make abstracts containing the substance of the evidence in support of such claims, and such other information and remarks as may be necessary to a proper decision thereon, and report on said claims to the General Commissioner of the Land Office; and that said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Resolved, That said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting the right of pre-emption to actual settlers on the public lands in the said Territory of Missouri; and that said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, PELEG TALLMAN; and from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM PIPER, appeared, and took their seats.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes for the service of the year 1813; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. C., from the same committee, reported a bill authorizing the loan for a sum not exceeding — millions of dollars; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. C., from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the Bible Society of Philadelphia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

On motion of Mr. GHOLSON, the Committee of the whole House were discharged from the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Rebecca Hodgson, and the said report and petition were recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

The House resumed the consideration of a resolution offered by Mr. TALIAFERRO, directing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to inquire into the propriety of authorizing the transportation of the mails of the United States by steamboats, wherever the Postmaster General shall deem that mode of conveyance expedient. After considerable conversation, the resolution was agreed to, with a slight amendment.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making certain partial appropriations for the year 1813." The Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the Bible Society of Philadelphia;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A bill relating to certain claims to land in the district of Vincennes, went through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. PICKENS, after observing that the Legislature of North Carolina, at its last session, had passed a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, the object of which is to establish throughout the United States a uniform mode of election of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States; and that, as he conceived this to be an auspicious moment for making what he deemed an important and necessary amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the proper mode of doing it to be, in the first instance, to propose it for the adoption of Congress, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislature, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, viz:

That, for the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled.

Those districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants entitled by the Constitution to be represented: In each district the qualified voters shall elect one Representative, and no more.

That, for the purpose of appointing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of electors to which such State may be entitled. Those districts shall be composed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants entitled by the Constitution to representation. In each district the persons qualified to vote for Representatives shall appoint one elector, and no more. The electors, when convened, shall have power, in case any one or more of those appointed as above prescribed shall fail to attend, for the purposes of their said appointment, on the day prescribed for giving their votes for President and Vice President of the United States, to appoint another or others to act in the place of him or them so failing to attend.

Neither the districts for choosing Representatives nor those for appointing electors shall be altered in any State, until a census and apportionment of Representatives under it, made subsequent to the division of the State into districts, shall change the number of Representatives and of electors to which such State shall be entitled. The division of the States into districts hereby provided for, shall take place immediately after this amendment shall be adopted and ratified as a part of the Constitution of the United States, and successively afterwards, whenever, by a census and apportionment of Representatives under it, the number of Representatives and of electors to which any State may be entitled shall be changed: The division of such State into districts for the purposes both of choosing Representatives and of appointing electors shall be altered agreeably to the provisions of this amendment, and on no other occasion.

The resolution was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

BOUNTY ON ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. CONDUCT said it would be recollected that, by concurrence in the Senate's amendments to the bill respecting the present Army, the House had agreed to dispense with their proposed increase of bounty on enlistments. It was the opinion of Mr. C. that this increase of bounty to future enlistments ought not to have been withheld, as it would form a great inducement to enlistments, which, he believed, ought at this moment to be encouraged by every means in the power of the Government. He therefore moved a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report a bill authorizing an increase of bounty to the soldiers hereafter enlisted in the service of the United States.

Mr. FISK spoke in favor of the motion, on the principles on which he and others before supported it.

Mr. GOLD spoke against it as proposing a wasteful and extravagant expenditure of the public resources.

Mr. BACON approved the principle of the resolution; but, the Senate having shown their hostility to it, he conceived, if revived, the proposition should come from the Senate. Its present agitation in this House, he thought, would serve only to paralyze enlistments. He should therefore vote against against it.

Mr. CONDUCT said, whatever might be the disposition of the Senate, it was for this House to do its duty without regard to the opinions of others. If the proposition was correct, the argument urged by the gentleman last up was of no weight.

The question on the resolution was decided in the negative. For the motion 43, against it 44.

JARED SHATTUCK.

The bill for the relief of Jared Shattuck was read a third time.

Mr. McKIM moved that it lie on the table.—Motion lost.

After some observations against the bill, from Mr. McKIM, and in favor of it, from Mr. WIDGERY, the question on the passage of the bill was decided in the affirmative, as follows: For the bill 77, against the bill 28, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, Jr., Stevenson Archer, Daniel Avery, Ezekiel Bacon, John Baker, Abijah Bigelow, Wm. Blackledge, James Breckenridge, Elijah Brigham, Robert Brown, William Butler, Francis Carr, #### COMPENSATION FOR CAPTURES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "relating to captures."

[The bill provides that compensation shall be allowed to the officers and crews of our public vessels, for vessels of the enemy necessarily destroyed at sea after their capture.]

Mr. BASSETT stated to the House the considerations by which the Naval Committee had been induced to report this bill. It grew more immediately out of the case of the Guerriere destroyed by the Constitution—a case precisely in point. Such a principle as that which the bill proposed, he believed, had been engrafted in the British service. It was at least required by equity and sound policy, where the public service required the destruction of a vessel for fear of re-capture by the enemy in its disabled state, that some compensation should be made to the captors in lieu of that which would have accrued from the sale of the vessel had it been brought into port.

Mr. H. CLAY (Speaker) spoke in opposition both to the principles and details of the bill. He was disposed to believe the principle unprecedented in any other country; but even if it were not, he thought it ought not to exist in this country. It would have the effect to make it the interest of the captor, unless the vessel should be immediately on the coast, or in the very mouth of our rivers, to destroy the captured vessel. On consulting the underwriters gentlemen would find the premium required on bringing in a vessel of any description from any considerable distance, would be equal to one half her value; and, as proof of it, Mr. C. instanced the high insurance even from Charleston and New Orleans, along our own coast, to a northern port. The strongest possible temptation would, therefore, be offered by giving half the value of the destroyed vessel to the captors in case of her destruction. Mr. C. moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. BASSETT replied to Mr. CLAY, and defended the bill, on the ground of expediency and of precedent. In the British nation, he said, rewards were always liberally bestowed on skill and valor, and they must always be by every country that wishes to encourage these qualities in its citizens. The principle did exist in the British service, not by statutory, but by admiralty regulations; and in all such cases rewards had been liberally dispensed.

Mr. BACON opposed the bill as inexpedient and unprecedented. To show that it went beyond the British legal provisions in that respect, he quoted a statute of that nation which allows to the captors of vessels, so destroyed as the bill contemplates, a bounty of five pounds for every man found alive on board said captured vessel, the aggregate to be equally distributed among the crew of the captors. Further, he believed, that Government had not gone.

Mr. CHEVES on this remarked, that every encouragement was afforded to British naval officers, by their Government, as well by promotions to higher office and to nobility, &c., which were not known in this country, as by pecuniary rewards and pensions, not in all cases by statutory, but by Executive sanctions. He was disposed to be liberal to our officers, to foster our rising navy. But, though friendly to the principle, he objected to the particular details of the bill, which he thought susceptible of modifications which would be better made in select committee than in the House. He, therefore, moved that the Committee rise.

Mr. QUINCY objected to the principle of the bill, which he thought fundamentally questionable. He was for providing specially by statute for each case after its occurrence, where the circumstances of the case required an exercise of liberality by Congress, and to legislate generally for future occurrences.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and were refused leave to sit again; and,

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the bill was recommended to the Naval Committee.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of public lands to certain settlers in the Illinois territory. After considerable discussion, negating a motion of Mr. BRBB to strike out the first section, and rejecting an amendment proposed by Mr. JOHNSON, the Committee rose and reported the bill, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 19.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to carry into effect the report made to Congress in February, 1803, by James Madison, then Secretary of State, Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, and Levi Lincoln, Attorney General of the United States, Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory, in obedience to the provisions of the act supplemental to the last mentioned act;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. MORROW presented a declaration and sundry resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, expressive of their opinion of the state of our foreign relations, and of their determination to support the General Government in their measures for the prosecution of the war against Great Britain.—Ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD, the petition of Daniel Boone, presented on the eighth of January, 1810, and the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky in his behalf, presented on the fourth of March, 1812, was referred to a select committee; and Mr. HEMPSTEAD, Mr. GRUNDY, and Mr. JOHNSON, were appointed the committee.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Rebecca Hodgson; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending the laws of the United States over those parts of States and Territories of the United States to which the Indian title is not extinguished, in such manner that all white persons residing within any of the said parts of States or Territories of the United States, may and shall be liable to the operation of the said laws; with leave to report by bill or otherwise; and Mr. RHEA, Mr. MILNOR, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. NEW, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, a committee was appointed to inquire into the propriety of assigning to the officers, soldiers, and marines, of the Virginia State line, in the Revolutionary war, out of the public lands of the United States, such bounties in land as they or their representatives may be entitled to receive under any engagement made by that State, which have not yet been fulfilled through a deficiency in the land fund appropriated to that object; with leave to report by bill, or otherwise; and Mr. NELSON, Mr. McKEE, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, and Mr. GOLD, were appointed the committee.

An engrossed bill concerning certain claims in the district of Vincennes was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of the Bible Society of Philadelphia" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill of this House with the same title.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a report of the Commissioners appointed in virtue of the act of the twenty-sixth of June, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, entitled "An act to ascertain the Western boundary of the tract reserved for satisfying the military bounties allowed to the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on Continental establishment;" which were read and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

JANUARY, 1813.

H. OF R.

PRIVATEER PENSIONS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill regulating pensions to persons on board private armed ships.

[This bill directs that the two per cent. reserved in the hands of consuls and collectors, in pursuance of the act of June last, respecting private armed vessels, &c., be paid into the Treasury, to constitute a fund for pensions to persons disabled on board private armed vessels, of the mode and degree of which disability the log book of each vessel is to be evidence.]

Mr. BURWELL moved to strike out the vital section of the bill, with a view to try the principle. In support of the motion, he remarked that he conceived it improper to adopt a principle so extremely liable to abuse as this, especially when pensions had been refused to at least equally meritorious sufferers during the Revolution. The evidence which the log book of a vessel would afford, would be so very liable to error, and so indefinite, as not to be entitled to that conclusive weight given to it by the bill. The proper course, he conceived, would be, to leave the subject open to the annual disposition of Congress; which was now the case with certain other pensions.

Mr. BASSETT stated, in reply, that, at the last session, two per cent. having been reserved from the wages of the seamen on board private armed vessels, for the avowed and declared purpose of constituting a fund for pensions to the wounded, this bill now merely indicated the mode of carrying this provision into effect. The money had been reserved by the collectors and consuls, and as it was never the intention of Congress to make them a present of it, it remained for Congress to direct the mode of its distribution. If the principle was incorrect, it ought to have been objected to when the pledge was given by the House last session on this subject.

The question on striking out the section was negatived, by a very small majority; and the Committee rose and reported the bill.

Mr. SROW made a motion going to confine the pensions allowed by the bill to such as should be disabled in actual service, and spoke in support of his motion.

Mr. McKIM opposed the motion. The services rendered by the privateers were valuable to the country and ought to be encouraged. The duties on prize goods, he said, brought into the port of Baltimore alone, had amounted to three hundred and fifty-four thousand dollars. This showed the importance of this system in a pecuniary point of view.

Mr. SROW questioned the benefit rendered to the public interest by privateering, and said he was in favor of letting this fund accumulate, and first see whether there was sufficient to pension those having received known wounds in action, before they agreed to extend it to all casualties on board private armed vessels.

Mr. LITTLE asserted the utility of privateers and their efficiency as a means of annoying the enemy. He bore testimony to the bravery they had displayed in all conflicts with the enemy, and to the injuries they had inflicted on his commerce. The enterprising individuals concerned in it ought to be encouraged; for, by the impediments to the prosecution of their enterprise, many had been already discouraged and had dismantled their vessels. If properly encouraged, they would scour every sea, however distant, and ransack every port and harbor in search of the enemy. He was in favor of exhibiting the most liberal disposition towards them.

Considerable further debate took place on the amendment, which was at last agreed to, by a very small majority.

Mr. RHEA subsequently moved to recommit the bill to the same committee which reported it, for the purpose of amendment; and the bill was recommitted.

IMPORTATIONS FROM INDIA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate authorizing the admission, under certain circumstances, of vessels owned by citizens of the United States of America, with their cargoes, from British ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope; and on the amendments reported by the Committee of Ways and Means to the said bill; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the amendments, which were concurred in by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. ROBERTS further to amend the said bill by adding to the end thereof the following proviso:

"And provided further, That in case any part of the aforesaid goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be exported out of the United States, no drawback shall be allowed on such exportation."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 48, nays 55, as follows:

Ordered, That the amendments agreed to be engrossed, and the bill read the third time tomorrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 20.

The engrossed bill, giving the right of preemption in the purchase of public lands to certain settlers in the Illinois Territory, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Ellis; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to incorporate a company for making a certain turnpike road in the county of Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

The bill from the Senate "authorizing the admission in the ports of the United States, of vessels owned by citizens of the United States of America, with their cargoes, from British ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope," was read the third time as amended, and passed.

ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of William Lambert, and the report thereon made by the Secretary of State at the last session, presented a bill authorizing the establishment of an Astronomical Observatory; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

The report is as follows:

On the 27th December, 1809, Mr. Lambert addressed the House of Representatives upon the expediency of establishing a first meridian for the United States at their permanent seat of Government. This was ordered for consideration to a select number of gentlemen, who, on the 28th March, eighteen hundred and ten, laid upon the table an able and learned opinion, accompanied with scientific calculations illustrative of the object. They concluded their investigation by recommending that provision should be made, by law, for determining, with the greatest accuracy, the distance between the City of Washington and Greenwich in England, and that the proper instruments should be procured.

Afterwards, on the 23d January, 1811, the memorial was referred to a select committee; and, on the 23d of the ensuing February, that committee was discharged, and the memorial referred to the Secretary of State for his consideration.

Conformably to the desire of the House, that officer wrote to the Speaker a letter which, after having been read, on the third day of July, 1812, was ordered to lie on the table. That letter was, on the 8th December last, ordered to the present committee, who have diligently weighed the matters which it contains.

It is their opinion that astronomical observations are highly useful to a navigating and commercial people, already eminent for their progress in science and the arts, and who are laboring for the completion of their national dignity and splendor.

The most ready method of obtaining the information to be derived from noting the phenomena of the heavens, is by the establishment of an observatory. This may be erected at the City of Washington. By such an institution, means may be adopted not only to fix the first meridian, but to ascertain a great number of other astronomical facts and occurrences through the vigilance of a complete astronomer.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The bill from the Senate to carry into effect the report of James Madison, then Secretary of State, Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, and Levi Lincoln, Attorney General of the United States, Commissioners, &c., in the year 1803, recommending an equitable compromise with the Yazoo claimants, was read a first time.

Mr. POINDESTER moved a second reading and commitment of the bill.

Mr. TROUP having asked if a motion to reject the bill would not supersede a motion to commit, and being answered by the SPEAKER in the affirmative, said: It is on no ordinary occasion, sir, I would permit myself to move the rejection of a bill on the first reading, coming from another branch of the Legislature, but the measure growing out of an hideous corruption, I owe it to you to move, because I think you owe it to your own dignity to reject the bill, not upon any dubious evidence of the fraud and corruption of the Georgia Legislature, but upon evidence satisfactory to you and to all mankind, spread upon your own records by commissioners of your own appointment, and which the Clerk can be called upon to read. The nature, the extent, the detail of the corruption by which the Legislature of Georgia were induced to sell the public property, are there portrayed by your own commissioners. It is stated that more than two-thirds of the Legislature were bribed and corrupted, were interested in and parties to the purchase. They show you that A received 112,000 acres of land for his vote; that B received 75,000 acres for his vote; that C received 56,000 acres for his vote, and that none received less than 56,000 acres. It is upon this record evidence then that I move you to reject the bill. You rejected the bill from the Senate on the first reading for the suspension of the habeas corpus act. Why? Because the bill contained a principle violative of civil liberty. I move you to reject this bill! Why? Because it contains a principle destructive of republican government. The purity and incorruptibility of the representative character is the basis of our republican institutions—if there be one principle of our Government more fundamental than another, it is that no benefit, or profit, or advantage shall result either immediately or remotely to any human being from the corruption of the Representatives of the people. The bill proposes to give five millions of dollars to those claiming under the corruptors of Representatives of the people. The corruptors only gave five hundred thousand dollars—the United States only gave twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars to Georgia for her territory. The bill proposes to give five millions of dollars to the claimants—five millions of dollars to extinguish their claim. You are required to reward the claimants who bought of those who corrupted the Legislature of Georgia. We say, no! Let ruin overtake the corruptors of the Representatives of the people and all claiming under them. The corruptors have made their fortunes, now you are called upon to make the fortunes of the claimants; this is to be precedent, this is to be example.

Yazoo Claims.

The claimants have hitherto urged their claim with indefatigable perseverance, they have teased and wearied you; you have constantly repelled them; they have seen their discomfiture in the justness and simplicity of your reasoning. You say to them in substance, the Yazoo act having been fraudulently and corruptly obtained, was null and void, ab initio. All contracts founded in fraud are void. It could pass no right; if it could pass no right to the original purchasers, it is impossible that the original purchasers could pass any right to the claimants: and if no right passed to the claimants, it is impossible they can have a claim or shadow of claim against you. They constantly found themselves foiled by this honesty and simplicity of reasoning. Seeing you firm and inflexible, they turned about and addressed themselves to the Judiciary. They found in the law books of England a maxim which suited them; two of the speculators combined and made up a fictitious case, a feigned issue for the decision of the Supreme Court. They presented precisely those points for the decision of the Court which they wished the Court to decide, and the Court did actually decide them as the speculators themselves would have decided them if they had been in the place of the Supreme Court. The first point was, whether the Legislature of Georgia had the power to sell the territory? Yes, said the Judges, they had. 2nd. Whether by the Yazoo act an estate did vest in the original grantees? Yes, said the Judges, it did. 3d. Whether it was competent to any subsequent Legislature to set aside the act on the ground of fraud and corruption? No, said the Judges, it was not; an estate did vest in the grantees by the Yazoo act, which could not be divested by the act of any subsequent Legislature. No matter, say the Judges, what the nature or extent of the corruption, be it ever so wicked, be it ever so nefarious, it could not be set aside. The speculators had hunted up a maxim of the common law or equity courts of England, and the Judges wielded it for their benefit and to the ruin of the country—the maxim that third purchasers without notice shall not be affected by the fraud of the original parties. Thus, sir, by a maxim of English law are the rights and liberties of the people of this country to be corruptly bartered by their Representatives. It is this decision of the Judges which has been made the basis of the bill on your table—a decision shocking to every free Government, sapping the foundations of all your constitutions, and annihilating at a breath the best hope of man. Yes, sir, it is proclaimed by the Judges, and is now to be sanctioned by the Legislature, that the Representatives of the people may corruptly betray the people, may corruptly barter their rights and those of their posterity, and the people are wholly without any kind of remedy whatsoever. It is this monstrous and abhorrent doctrine which must startle every man in the nation, that you ought promptly to discountenance and condemn. It is this doctrine, the basis and essential principle of the bill, that we call upon you to reject. Suppose, sir, the Legislature of Georgia, instead of selling the public territory, had corruptly sold the good people of Georgia and all their posterity into slavery, the consequences would have been the same, the judges would have decreed that an estate did vest in the original grantee, notwithstanding the corruption, which could not be divested by any subsequent Legislature. But, sir, let me state to you a case, exposing at once the flagrant enormity of the principle; it is a case as perfectly parallel as the human mind can conceive. Suppose, sir, that the twelfth Congress should corruptly sell the good people of the United States to England, and England should instantly sell to France—France would come upon the thirteenth Congress and demand possession: the virtuous thirteenth Congress would say, No! we will not give you possession; the twelfth Congress was bribed and corrupted to sell the good people of the United States; fraud vitiates every grant, and therefore you can have no right to demand possession. Ah! but, says France, I am an innocent purchaser, I purchased without knowledge of the fraud; and it is a maxim of the common law of England, that third purchasers are not to be affected by the fraud of the original parties. Thus, sir, according to the judges, would the good people of the United States be sold like a flock of sheep by the corruption of their Representatives, leaving them, the people, without any kind of remedy whatsoever.

If, Mr. Speaker, the arch-fiend had in the bitterness of his hatred to mankind resolved the destruction of republican government on earth, he would have issued a decree like that of the judges; he would have said, in the spirit and language of this bill, let the claimants under the corruptors of the Representatives of the people be rewarded. In a nation of enlightened men, whose governments have their origin in and exist only by the will of the people, that will is contemned and held for nothing. Why, it may be asked, do the judges who passed this decision live and live unpunished? The answer is found in the mildness and moderation of our Government. I thank God it is so. If under a despotism the throne of the monarch had been thus assailed; the judges would have perished. Here the foundations of the Republic are shaken and the judges sleep in tranquillity at home. Take my word for it, Mr. Speaker—I beseech you to remember what I say—no party in this country, however deeply seated in power, can long survive the adoption of this measure. I remember a gentleman once a member of this House; he had his seat on the opposite side of it; he was a man of the most vigorous intellect I ever knew; he had deeply studied human nature; to be sure his conduct was not always regulated by his knowledge of it; he was often imprudent and not unfrequently extravagant. Whenever this question was turned up, however, he used to address his political friends, "Gentlemen, I beseech you to withhold your countenance from this measure. It is founded in corruption, the people know it; they are not yet ripe for the supply of men who will support such measures. If you want to mount into power, if you wish to conciliate the affection of this people, you must assume a virtue if you have it not."

Mr. T. said he wished it understood, that in moving the rejection of the bill, it was not his design to enter all into the merits of the Yazoo claim.

The few observations he had submitted were directed to the principle contained in the bill. If, however, the House should in its discretion determine to sustain that principle, and to enter into the merits of the question at large, he should, notwithstanding it had been so often discussed and was so well understood by every man in the nation, have no objection to meet it. He would then undertake to show to the House, 1st. That the Legislature of Georgia had no Constitutional power to sell the public domain. 2nd, That if it had, it could not sell fraudulently and corruptly. 3d. That these claimants had notice of the fraud, and, having notice, are, according to the maxim of the judges themselves, without claim or shadow of claim.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke against the rejection, and in favor of a settlement of these claims, and explained the reasons why he, who had before opposed a compromise, was now opposed to a rejection of the bill.

Mr. SEYBERT said he could not vote for the motion of the gentleman from Georgia to reject the bill. The remarks of the gentlemen from Georgia and of Maryland led him to view the main question as one of great moment. They stated many difficulties connected with it. He wanted time to investigate the subject. The opinions of men differed on it. The supreme judiciary of the United States decided in favor of the principle. The Senate had sent us the bill, which was passed by a considerable majority. A respect was due from him to the decisions of the Judiciary and the Senate. He must allow the bill to take the ordinary course, without regard to his ultimate decision.

Mr. KING stated the difficult nature of this question, and his wish to obtain time to investigate it. He, therefore, moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject to Monday.

MESSRS. ARCHER, WIDGERY, GOLDSBOROUGH, and MITCHILL, supported the postponement on the same grounds as those on which it was proposed by Mr. KING.

Mr. NELSON opposed the motion, because he was anxious, without hesitation, to reject the bill.

MESSRS. BOYD and POINDEXTER opposed the rejection, on the merits of the bill.

Mr. TROUP said a few words in reply to Mr. POINDEXTER, and the question on the rejection of the bill was then taken and decided—For rejection 55, against it 59, as follows:

So the bill was not rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER then moved a reference of the bill to a select committee, with a view to the examination of its details, and to propose amendments, which it appeared to him the bill required.

A motion was made to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole.

After some discussion on these motions, it was decided to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

the United States, which the SPEAKER declared to be of a confidential nature. And the House was accordingly cleared of all strangers, and so remained till four o'clock, when it adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 21.

The House met with closed doors; and, after being opened, another member, to wit: from New York, PETER B. PORTER, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to incorporate an insurance company in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to incorporate the Columbian Insurance Company, in Alexandria, in the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the consideration of the resolution referred to them on the 13th instant, and the said resolution was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BASSETT, from the managers appointed to attend on the part of this House, at the conference with the managers on the part of the Senate, upon the subject-matter of the disagreeing votes upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill "in addition to the act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," reported that they had attended at the said conference, and could come to no agreement with the managers on the part of the Senate upon the said amendments.

The House proceeded to consider the said report; when a motion was made by Mr. BASSETT that the House do insist on their disagreement to the said amendments; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 44, nays 45.

On motion of Mr. McKIM the House receded from its said disagreement:

On motion of Mr. RHEA, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire what amendments, if any, are necessary to be made to the law providing for the safety and transportation of the mail of the United States, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. REED, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of admitting to entry, and remitting the penalties of the non-importation act in favor of all bona fide American vessels and cargoes that shall have cleared from enemies' ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope, previous to a knowledge of the declaration of war at those ports or places.

The bill for the relief of John Dickson and John Murray, went through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CAPTURED PROPERTY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the petition of Joshua Barney and Stephen Kingston, on behalf of certain owners of private armed vessels, praying that certain property on board American ships bound here from England, sent in by privateers, shall be delivered to the captors for their benefit. The report is as follows:

"The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred the petitions of Joshua Barney and Stephen Kingston, report: That Congress has not manifested an intention to interfere, and it seems, beyond doubt, will not interfere in such manner as to affect the rights of the petitioners which they can judicially establish—that Congress has already remitted the penalties and forfeitures, incurred by American citizens, and that, in the opinion of the committee, if enemy's property be forfeited to the Government, under the non-importation act, it would, for reasons of policy, be unwise for Congress to interpose; that if the petitioners can claim as 'informers,' the claim is already secured to them by existing laws, or the claim is vested in the collectors and others, from whom Congress could not, with justice, transfer it. The committee therefore submit the following resolve:

"Resolved, That it would be unwise and impolitic to act upon the subject of the said petitions."

Mr. CHEVES stated at large the reasons on which the Committee of Ways and Means had grounded their report.

Mr. ROBERTS spoke in opposition to the report, believing it would be neither unwise or improper to grant their prayer. He read a resolution, which he should wish to offer, should the report be rejected, the object of which was, that the right of the United States or of other persons to all British property on board American vessels sent into port by American privateers, so far as said claim arises from forfeiture under the non-importation act, shall be relinquished for the benefit of the captors.

Mr. BIBB declared himself in favor of the report of the committee, because he had no doubt the courts would decide in favor of the petitioners; and it would not be necessary for the House to legislate on it, the right having accrued on the instant of the capture of such property.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) thought with Mr. BIBB that the right had vested in the captors; but it appeared that the Secretary of the Treasury, for the Government, had interposed a claim to it. Mr. C. then said he was opposed to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, because he was willing to place the question out of doubt as to the property, to which the captors had in his view a just title.

Some further conversation took place on the subject, when the Committee rose without having come to any decision, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, January 22.

Mr. BURWELL presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, praying for a charter of incorporation for a new bank, to be established in the City of Washington; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a select committee; and Mr. BURWELL, Mr. CALHOUN,

MR. BLACKLEDGE, MR. FINDLEY, MR. STOW, MR. MCKEE, MR. BARNETT, MR. MOSELEY, and MR. CHITTENDEN, were appointed the committee.

On motion of MR. BLACKLEDGE,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement of the sums paid annually on account of the public debt of the United States, from the commencement of the present Government, until the 30th of September last; and, also, the sums paid annually within the same period, on account of the Revolutionary Government; distinguishing, in relation to the public debt, the sums paid for interest, principal, and charges, respectively.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a book upon military discipline, transmitted to him by William Duane; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An engrossed bill for the relief of John Dixon and John Murray was read the third time, and passed.

CAPTURED PROPERTY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the petitions of Joshua Barney and of Stephen Kingston.

The resolution, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, "that it is inexpedient to legislate upon the subject of the petitions," was disagreed to; and the following was reported to the House as a substitute thereto:

"Resolved, That any right or claim of the United States to British property which may have been captured by American privateers, arising from forfeiture under any provision of the non-importation acts, ought to be relinquished for the benefit of the captors.

The question on the original resolution was also disagreed to by a vote of the House. For disagreeing 61, against it 47, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., William Anderson, Stevenson Archer, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, Burwell Bassett, William Blackledge, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, James Cochran, John Clopton, Lewis Condict, William Crawford, Richard Cutts, Roger Davis, Samuel Dinsmoor, Elias Earle, William Findley, Meshack Franklin, Peterson Goodwyn, Isaiah L. Potter, Josiah Quincy, William Reed, William M. Richardson, William Rodman, Thomas Sammons, Philip Stuart, Lewis B. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Peleg Tallman, Uri Tracy, Laban Wheaton, and Leonard White.

And the resolution proposed in Committee of the Whole as a substitute, was, as stated above, agreed to; and was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill in pursuance thereof.

IMPRESSED SEAMEN.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit, for the information of Congress, copies of a correspondence between John Mitchell, Agent for American Prisoners of War at Halifax, and the British Admiral commanding at that station.

I transmit for the like purposes copies of a letter from Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy.

JAMES MADISON.

Extract of a letter from John Mitchell, Esq., Agent for American Prisoners of War at Halifax, to the Secretary of State, dated

"DECEMBER 5, 1812.

"I cover you a copy of a correspondence, which took place in consequence of different applications I received, either by letter or personally, from persons detained on board His Britannic Majesty's ships of war in this place.

"I formerly mentioned to you that the Admiral had assured me that he would discharge all the citizens of the United States who were in the fleet, and actually did discharge several. This induced me to think I should be correct, and in the perfect line of my duty, in sending him a list of the applicants to me, and requesting an inquiry to be made, and discharges granted to all who were citizens of the United States; I, therefore, covered him a list of the names now enclosed to you, which produced his letter to me of the same date (December 1, 1812.)

"I read it with surprise, because some of the men had informed me their captains had refused to report them to the Admiral. Now, if no one here was, or is, allowed to do it, their situation is hopeless.

"It is not my place, sir, to reason with you on this business. Proof of nativity, in his first letter, is a strong expression; and how few are in possession of it, and how many who cannot obtain it.

"The second paragraph, in the second letter, prevents my interfering; and I have since been obliged to send a man away, requesting him to apply to his commanding officer."

others who are now on board of the Centurion and Statura have requested of me to procure their discharge, and to be sent home.

Will you, sir, have the goodness to direct an inquiry, and order the release of such as are citizens of the United States?

Besides the enclosed list, I am told there are others whose names I have not.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

Copy of a letter from Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren, to John Mitchell, Esq., Agent for American Prisoners of War at Halifax, dated

DECEMBER 1, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, respecting some men, therein mentioned, on board His Majesty's ships under my command, said to be citizens of the United States, and in reply, beg to acquaint you, that whenever I have received representations from the captains of His Majesty's ships of any part of their crews being citizens of America, with sufficient proof of their nativity, I have directed their discharge from the service.

I must observe to you that I cannot permit the interference of any applications from men belonging to His Majesty's ships, but through their commanding officers: and in your department, of prisoners of war only, I shall at all times be most happy to receive your communications.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN B. WARREN.

Copy of a letter from John Mitchell, Esq., Agent for American Prisoners of War at Halifax, to Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren, dated

SIR: I had yesterday the honor to receive your letter, dated the 1st instant, in which you observe that you cannot permit the interference of any application from men on board of His Britannic Majesty's ships of war, but through their commanding officers.

Desirous of conforming as far as possible to established regulations, permit me the honor to inquire of your Excellency, if by your letter I am to understand that I am not to receive the applications of seamen declaring themselves citizens of the United States, who are on board of His Majesty's ships of war, and communicate the same to you? If this is the meaning, I shall most certainly conform, though I must lament the regulation.

SIR: In reply to your letter, dated yesterday, I have to acquaint you that whenever any address is made relative to men on board His Majesty's ships, it must be by the commanders of such vessels direct.

I cannot permit any application by other persons in time of war, but in the above mode.

It will always afford me pleasure to attend to your wishes in any respect relative to the situation or exchange of prisoners, or to afford any aid or relief in my power. I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN B. WARREN.

12th CON. 2d Sess.—28

From Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. FRIGATE PRESIDENT,

BOSTON, Jan. 14, 1813.

SIR: Herewith you will receive two muster books, of His Britannic Majesty's vessels Moselle and Sappho, found on board the British packet Swallow.

As the British have always denied that they detained on board their ships of war American citizens, knowing them to be such, I send you the enclosed, as a public document of their own, to prove how illy such an assertion accords with their practice.

It will appear by these two muster books that so late as August last, about an eighth part of the Moselle and Sappho's crews were Americans; consequently, if there is only a quarter part of that proportion on board their other vessels, that they have an infinitely greater number of Americans in their service than any American has yet had an idea of.

Any further comment of mine on this subject, I consider unnecessary; as the enclosed documents speak but too plainly for themselves. I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN RODGERS.

Hon. PAUL HAMILTON, Secretary of the Navy.

The Message and documents were read, and referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations.

SATURDAY, January 23.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying for a grant of a certain quantity of muskets, pistols, and swords, for the defence of said Territory.—Referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, reported amendments to the bill regulating pensions to persons on board private armed ships; which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill relating to captures.

Mr. BASSETT, from the same committee, presented a bill providing compensation to the officers and crew of the Constitution, for capturing and destroying the British frigate Guerriere; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported amendments to the bill from the Senate "supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act heretofore passed for that purpose,'" which was read, and concurred in by the House; and the amendments ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read the third time to-day.

Mr. NELSON from the select committee on the subject, made a report in favor of the allowance of certain lands to the officers and soldiers of the line in the Revolutionary war on State establishment; which was read and committed.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. MILNOR rose in his place, and said:—Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a resolution for the consideration of the House. It will be recollected, that, in the observations which I had the honor to submit to the House, when the bill for increasing the Navy was under consideration, I suggested, by way of answer to the gentleman opposed to that measure, on the score of the want of adequate means, that I felt confident there was no want of the most abundant means; that the moneyed and mercantile classes of the community, I had no doubt, would be found ready to advance the proper supplies to the Government, by way of loan, provided the opportunity of doing so were presented to them in an unexceptionable shape. The expedient to which I had reference, was a navy loan—a loan for the whole amount necessary for building and equipping the ships-of-the-line and frigates authorized by the bill alluded to, and, I am willing to add, any further increase of that most desirable species of force which the wisdom of Congress may direct.

The proposition which I will have the honor of submitting, is calculated to facilitate the views of the Government in relation to this branch of their official duty, by presenting this interesting subject divested of any of those objectionable features that will be seen by many in the proposition of a general loan for all the varied purposes of the war in which we are engaged. To many of our fellow-citizens—to many of us in this House—this war appeared to be unnecessary and improvident in its commencement, as it has been, except upon the ocean, disastrous and discreditable to us in its conduct. Our operations against Canada have falsified, in their circumstances and result, every fond prediction of the friends of invasion; and, whatever of popularity the events of the war have acquired, the meed of gratitude for them is due, under Providence, to the glorious efforts of our gallant little Navy. The service rendered to the country by the destruction or capture of a few vessels of the enemy, is, to be sure, of little consequence, in a pecuniary view, but its effects in laying the foundation of our naval reputation; of turning the tide of national opinion in favor of this long-abused and neglected Establishment; in inspiring hopes of a permanent and efficient system of maritime defence; are important, beyond the power of calculation. For myself, and because I desire that the Government may meet with no difficulty in procuring the requisite pecuniary means, of completing with the least possible delay the additional ships recently directed to be built—to which end I wish to invite the friends of a permanent Navy Establishment to contribute by loans to the furthering of the object, and by way of inducement, to present to them our proposition free from any well grounded objection. The commercial men, the capitalists of our principal cities, have been, generally speaking, the uniform friends of maritime defence. They have importunately called for an enlargement of our Navy. I trust that, whatever may be their opinions of the expediency of this war, their liberality in affording money enough to defray the expense to be incurred in consequence of our recent endeavors to meet their wishes, will be found equal to our most sanguine expectations. But I wish this appeal to rest upon its own merits, and not to be weakened or destroyed by blending it with objects as to which, however the majority of this House may regret it, they never can prevent a diversity of sentiment amongst the people. I mean not to meddle, either by assertion or argument, at this time, with the essential merits of this war, nor with the distinction given to its operations against the territories of our neighbors; not because I am desirous of concealing my personal sentiments on these points, which are well known, but because I wish not to revive a discussion to which such ample justice was done during my recent absence from my seat in this House. I wish, sir, especially, to redeem my pledge to the House in relation to a navy loan, and to afford an opportunity to the Administration to obtain easily and speedily its amount. The war is thought by some gentlemen to be popular; so they deem their projects of invasion. Let the numerous friends of such expedients for the maintenance of maritime rights, evince their patriotism by prompt subscriptions to your Army loans. Let the friends of naval defence, against foreign aggression, evince theirs by equal promptitude in filling up a Navy loan. With such views, I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill authorizing a loan of — dollars, for the building and equipment of all such ships and vessels of war, as have been, or may be directed to be built by any law of the present session.

Mr. CHEVES opposed the resolution. He could not see any good to arise out of it, but much embarrassment, and consequently public evil. It was remarkable it should be brought forward at the very moment that the bill authorizing a general loan, which would embrace the object proposed by the gentleman, was to be called up. It would be evident, that should the resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, they must either neglect it, or that plan which, after the most mature reflection, was now prepared and ready to be submitted to the consideration of the House. If the gentleman wished merely to aid the Government in their exertions to render the war successful and honorable, his resolution would more properly come in as an amendment to the loan bill—should he on reflection deem such an amendment necessary. Mr. C., however friendly to the Navy, could not consent to separate its interests from any other scheme of defence or policy, which the general good required. It would be a tacit confession that there existed in the country one class of citizens who were willing to loan money to the Government for carrying on war by sea, but were opposed to aiding the operations of the Army. He never would consent to divide those interests. If the war was to be prosecuted, the success or disgrace must be equally felt by all. Whatever difference of feelings or opinions might exist, the several interests of the country were inseparable, and formed, in reality, but one solid and substantial interest. They should be all freighted in the same bark—in that he would nail the flag to the mast, and they should all float or go down together. Mr. C. moved that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. MILNOR said, his sole reason for separating the two subjects was, that he (and those who were friendly to a permanent navy went along with him) could not conscientiously vote for a loan to be applied to an invasion of Canada, though he wished to do it for a proper maritime defence.

The resolution was opposed by Messrs. JOHNSON and WRIGHT, and supported by Messrs. GOLDSBOROUGH and GOLD.

The question to lay it on the table was negatived—45 to 49.

The question was then taken on the passage of the resolution—yeas 26, nays 81, as follows:

LOAN BILL.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "authorizing a loan of — millions of dollars;" and, also, a bill "authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes for the year 1813."

Mr. CHEVES moved that the first blank be filled with the word "sixteen." He then went into a detailed account of the demands for which provision was to be made, and the resources to meet these demands, as follows:

EXPENDITURES.

1. Civil expenses of the Government, including foreign and domestic expenses - - - $1,532,681

2. Provision for the public debt - - - 8,000,000
3. Military Establishment, regular Army, &c. - - - $15,205,375

Mr. CHEVES, having thus offered the above statements, said, it might be objected, that they were not satisfactory, as we were engaged in a war, the duration of which was uncertain, and might be long, and that our views of the ways and means ought to extend not only to the present, but to future years. This no doubt would be done, and could be done without difficulty, if the Legislature and the proper constituted authorities did their duty. He would promise that the system which was proposed with a view to the war, and on which the war was commenced, has this principle for its basis—to provide a fixed annual revenue, sufficient to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, and the interest on the public debt, including new loans. This was the principle suggested in the Message of the President, confirmed by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and reiterated by the report of the Committee of Ways and Means—a principle which was probably in a great degree satisfactory to all parties in the House and in the nation. The effect of this principle had been fully accomplished, as it regarded the present year. The ordinary expenses of the Government for this year, might be estimated at $9,500,000, while the revenue receivable within the year, was ascertained to be $12,000,000, leaving a surplus of $2,500,000, beyond the sum required to carry the principle alluded to into effect. The means of providing for future years were obvious and abundant. We had a wealthy and unexhausted country, on which not a cent of burden had yet been laid. Taxes might be laid—a repeal of the restrictive laws alone would furnish the means for the ensuing year, and probably longer, while it would have the additional advantage of bringing home the property of our citizens and floating the country with surplus capital, which would probably be loaned to the Government. Taxes might yet be laid during the present session of Congress, if a proper degree of industry were bestowed on the subject. If not, the President was invested with power to call Congress together, before the Constitutional period of their meeting, and in time to accomplish this object for the purpose of the ensuing year. He declared it to be his decided opinion, that the repeal of the restriction on commerce or the imposition of taxes must be adopted; and it was his opinion (though it might differ from that of those for whom he felt a respectful deference) that both ought to be done, to render the ways and means of the Government abundant, and the prosecution of the war vigorous and successful. Gentlemen, he said, could not entertain any reasonable apprehensions on account of the loan for the present year. Suggestions of its failure seemed to be unfounded. It had been predicted that the loan for the last year would not succeed, but these predictions had been entirely falsified by the event. He had the pleasure to inform the Committee that the loan of the last year had been filled, except a little more than half a million, while the whole of the Treasury notes, authorized to be issued, had been put in circulation. A demand had even existed for more. He compared the relative situation of the country in 1812 and 1813. In 1812, there were twenty millions of property in the enemy's country, which was now brought home. The state of war had of necessity released large sums from the demands of commerce, &c.; it would be the interest of the holders of this money to loan it to Government. If it should be said that the release of capital from the demands of commerce had a disastrous aspect, it was susceptible of a satisfactory answer, which would be given when the objection should be urged. Mr. C. thought the banks alone would be able, from the diminution of the demands of commerce upon them, to afford to Government the aids it wanted, if they would give a circulation to their business with Government, something like that which subsisted between them and individuals. They had drawn in much of their capital since the war, and were better able to loan now than they were the last year.

The money borrowed from the Government the last year, was not taken out of the circulation of the money market; it had only passed into other hands, and if not demanded for the objects of industry and of commerce, which would not probably be the case, the present holders would find their interest to loan it again to the Government. It might be also objected, said Mr. C., that the Government, by this bill, was not restricted in the rate of interest. To this he would reply, that if precedents were necessary to justify this omission, enough were furnished by the Administrations which preceded the year 1801—enough were furnished by the records of the Washington Administration. He had thought it his duty to advert to the several acts of Congress which authorized loans during these Administrations. He would not say that he spoke with perfect accuracy, though he believed he did. From this examination it appeared that from the foundation of the Government to the year 1801, loans were authorized to the amount of $5,800,000 at 5 per cent., to the amount of $6,774,539 6-100 at 6 per cent., and to the amount of $24,000,000 without any limitation of the interest authorized to be given. The first loan authorized by the Government was for $12,000,000, and without any restriction in the rate of interest. This, too, was in a state of peace. We are now in a state of war, when he hoped, however gentlemen in the minority might differ from the majority as to the propriety of the war or the objects of the war, as the events of it must affect objects equally dear to all, they would not be found so far to separate themselves from the Government and the country as unnecessarily to embarrass the endeavors of the majority to prosecute the war with honor and success. He hoped the petty prejudices and distinctions of party would not mingle in this great question, but would be generously sacrificed upon the altar of public good. He would just add, that the bill authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes, which was also before the Committee, had a connexion with the loan bill. It authorized, in addition to the sum relied upon as a part of the ways and means of the year, the issuing of a further sum of $5,000,000, but provided in that event for an equivalent distribution of the loan.

Mr. SHEFFEY said he did not observe in the details of the gentleman any provision made for the reimbursement of the Treasury notes payable after this year, with the interest—as also the interest on the loan of 1812. He asked if the eight millions appropriated to the public debt embraced these objects; or was the eight millions appropriated solely to the Sinking Fund?—if so, he would rather vote for a loan of twenty millions, than to vote one dollar of a fund which should be regarded as sacred to the object for which it was established.

Mr. CHEVES replied, that the eight millions included the several items stated by the gentleman, and was more than enough to meet the sum to be paid on account of the old debt, loans, and Treasury notes, and the interest on these. This he said was the true and legal application of the Sinking Fund, as would be shown if the question should be agitated.

Mr. BIGELOW, after observing that he made this motion (to strike out the first section of the bill) because he meant to oppose the system of obtaining money by loans, rather than the details of the bill, said:

Mr. Chairman, in support of the motion which I have made, and which, if it prevails, is tantamount to a rejection of the bill, I will make some observations, although I find myself under an uncommon degree of embarrassment. An embarrassment, which proceeds not only from the delicacy of my situation, but from an apprehension nay, sir, conviction, that it will be impossible for me to communicate to the Committee my reasons for the motion, in that clear and forcible manner with which they have presented themselves to my own mind.

The delicacy of my situation results from my having been opposed to the war, when it was declared; from being now opposed to its prosecution, as well, because the principal cause for its declaration has been removed, as from a persuasion, that the invasion of Canada is both morally and politically wrong, and a conviction that the manner of raising and distributing the military force is not adequate to the contemplated object. But, sir, we have voted to raise the force, and are about to rely on loans to clothe, feed, and pay it. Against this course, I beg leave at this time most solemnly to protest, and ask the indulgence of the House, while I attempt to point out some of the fatal consequences which must inevitably result from it.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard much said within these walls in praise of national honor and national glory. They have become so much the burden of the song, that national faith and national credit appear to have shared the fate of the poor wise man, who, by his wisdom, delivered the city, and yet no man remembered him.

National honor and national glory, Mr. Chairman, have a charm in the sound, which strikes sweet music to the ear, while national faith and national credit strike it with the harsh notes of discord. No man, however, admires more than I do, national honor and national glory; but it must be that honor and that glory which is encircled by virtue and justice, and supported by national faith and credit.

Sir, I admire not the glory of conquest. I admire not the glory of an Alexander; I mean the Macedonian, not the Russian Alexander. I admire not the glory of a Julius Cæsar, or a Napoleon. I have no desire for that American glory which is to be acquired on the plains of Abraham, at the walls of Quebec, or on the barren sands of Florida. Besides, Mr. Chairman, the present state of our finances affords but a gloomy prospect for the attainment of this species of glory.

An empty Treasury to be replenished by naked loans is but an ill omen of success.

What, sir, is the present state of our finances? Let the report of the Secretary of the Treasury speak. That, sir, informs us that $10,000,000 were added to the public debt during the past year. That the expenses of the present year, without including the addition to the Army and Navy, will amount to $31,925,000. Those additions, according to the statement of the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, will increase the expenses to thirty-six millions. The revenues are but twelve millions, which will leave twenty-four millions to be provided for by loans or Treasury notes. The Secretary has not informed us what will be the expenses of the year 1814. He could not. But he has told us that the revenue of that year, if the war continues, will not exceed three millions.

This, sir, is the state of your finance, and these are the means by which you are to support and maintain a navy, and an army of fifty-five thousand men.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that this mode of raising money, by naked loans, excites in my mind more apprehensions for the liberties of this country, than even the raising of the large army which has been authorized. This, if not a novelty, is a dangerous experiment in legislation—an experiment calculated to shake the stability of any Government, but more especially one like ours, founded on the will and the affections of the people.

To raise large armies is at all times, and on all occasions, dangerous to the liberties of a Republic, but it is infinitely more so to raise them for the avowed object of invasion and conquest, and depend on loans for their pay and subsistence.

I am aware that a nation, irritated at the injuries inflicted on it by another, is apt to rush into war regardless of means or consequences. But, sir, the great political maxim, that the preservation of public credit involves in it the preservation of national honor and national existence, ought never to be forgotten. It ought to be the first article in the creed of every politician of whatever party; one which he ought never, for party or temporary purposes, for a moment to lose sight of.

Better, sir, lose the election of a favorite candidate for President; better, sir, lose our own places, than suffer the public credit to be impaired.

Having, Mr. Chairman, made these general remarks, I will attempt to illustrate these two positions: 1st. That it is essential to justice, and the preservation of public credit, that whenever a debt is contracted, proper funds should be established, not only for paying the annual interest of the same, but for discharging the principal within a reasonable period; 2d. That without the establishment of such a fund, loans cannot be obtained, the Army, if raised, cannot be punctually paid, a revolution will follow, and our present Government converted into a military despotism.

The first of these positions is taken almost verbatim from a report made to the old Congress, in December, 1782, by a committee consisting of Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Fitzsimons.

The position is true at all times; at that time, it was felt, understood, and acknowledged by every man in the United States.

At that time, and for some time previous, the public credit of this country was at a low ebb. The Congress of that day were unremittingly engaged in their endeavors to restore it. In their addresses to the several States, urging a compliance with their requisitions, the language uniformly was, that a compliance was necessary, not merely for the preservation, but for the restoration of public credit.

May such never again be the language of an American Congress; but if these measures are persisted in it will be inevitable.

As early, Mr. Chairman, as September, 1779, Congress had issued bills of credit to the amount of $159,948,880. At this period, however, they calculated on preserving the public credit; and it is not a little remarkable that their calculations were founded on the same principles with those of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in his eloquent speech on the Army bill, by apportioning the amount upon each individual in the United States. I will read you their calculations at that time, 1779, in their own words:

"Let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that at the conclusion of the war the emissions should amount to $200,000,000; that exclusive of the supplies from taxes, which will not be inconsiderable, the loans should amount to $100,000,000; then the whole debt of the United States would be $300,000,000. There are at present three millions of inhabitants in the thirteen States. Three hundred millions of dollars, divided among three millions of people, would give to each person one hundred dollars. And is there a man in America unable, in the course of eighteen or twenty years, to pay it again?"

Mr. Chairman, arguments like these are fallacious, and their fallacy consists in this: that not more than one in ten of the whole number of souls in the United States pay any part of the tax; and of those who pay any part of it, nineteen-twentieths have as much as they can do to support themselves and families, and make any provision for their children. Besides, sir, the accumulation of interest, and the annual ex-

That this reasoning of the old Congress was fallacious, we have incontrovertible evidence from their own mouths. For, on the 17th March following, they passed a resolution: "that gold and silver should be receivable in payment of the quotas required of the several States, at the rate of one Spanish milled dollar in lieu of every forty of the bills (then) in circulation."

No wonder, then, that Congress should say in 1782, "that it is essential to justice, and the preservation of public credit, that whenever a debt is contracted, proper funds should be established, not only for paying the annual interest, but for discharging the principal within a reasonable period." And, sir, if we are not now willing to subscribe to this doctrine, a few years continuance of the war will afford us an awful example of its truth.

Mr. Chairman, I will now proceed to the second point, viz: that without such a fund loans cannot be obtained; your army, if raised, will not be punctually paid; public credit will be impaired; a revolution will follow, and your Government will be converted into a military despotism.

Without such a fund, even the friends of war will not loan you money. Money is not loaned from motives of patriotism, but gain; and I have no hesitation in saying the loan will not be obtained.

Let us again recur to the history of the Revolution. I do this, Mr. Chairman, because it is more familiar; because the people are now as loyal as they were then, except that the Revolutionary war had a popularity which this has not, and because positions, supported by facts, are entitled to more credit, than those supported by mere argument. Upon this subject, I beg leave to read a few passages from two letters from Dr. Franklin, then our Minister in France. The first is dated December 23, 1782, in which he says:

"Friday last an order was given to furnish me with 600,000 livres immediately, and I was assured by M. Vergennes, that the rest of the 6,000,000 should be paid us quarterly in the course of the year 1783. I pressed hard for the whole sum demanded, but was told it was impossible.

"Our people certainly ought to do more for themselves. It is absurd the pretending to be lovers of liberty, and grudge paying for the defence of it. The foundation for credit abroad should be laid at home; and certain funds should be prepared and established beforehand for the regular payment, at least of the interest."

In another letter, dated March 15, 1783, after speaking on the subject of the French loan, he says:

"I abstain from repeating here the other parts of the Count de Vergennes' despatches, which I had the honor to communicate, because the truths they contain are well known to you, and because they may all be reduced to this single position, that without a speedy establishment of solid general revenue, and an exact performance of the engagements which Congress have made, you must renounce the expectation of loans in Europe."

Again, sir, in an address of Congress, December 16, 1782, to the State of Rhode Island, prepared by a committee, consisting of Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Fitzsimmons, we have these remarkable expressions: "Our applications to the foreign Powers, on whose friendship we depend, have had a success far short of our necessities. The next resource is to borrow from individuals. These will neither be actuated by generosity nor reasons of State. 'Tis to their interest alone we must appeal. To conciliate this, we must not only stipulate a proper compensation for what they lend, but we must give security for the performance. We must pledge an ascertained fund; simple and productive in its nature, general in its principle, and at the disposal of a single will."

If at that day neither patriotism or reasons of State would induce individuals to loan you money, can you expect them to do it now? Sir, you will not obtain it. It is impossible. Your army, of course, will not be punctually paid, and public credit will be impaired.

It now remains to show that a revolution will follow, and the Government be converted into a military despotism. And here again, Mr. Speaker, I will recur to facts derived from the history of the Revolution. The sufferings and patriotism of the Revolutionary army are well known. But their patriotism was tried to the utmost point of endurance. To show this, I will read a passage from a memorial presented by the army, to Congress, in December, 1782: "Our distresses are now brought to a point; we have borne all that men can bear; our property is expended; our private resources are at an end; and our friends are wearied out with our incessant applications. We, therefore, most seriously and earnestly beg that a supply of money may be forwarded to the army as soon as possible. The uneasiness of the soldiers for want of pay, is great and dangerous; and further experiments on their patience may have fatal effects."

Well, sir, what followed? Why, on the 10th of March (then) next, the famous anonymous letter, written, if fame does not belie him, by the very man who is to have the direction of your war operations, was industriously circulated through the army. A flame was kindled, which nothing but the commanding influence of WASHINGTON, aided by his general officers, could have extinguished.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, learn wisdom, by experience. If you will have an army, for Heaven's sake make prompt and effectual provision for their pay and subsistence. Depend not upon loans. Expose not again the liberties of your country. At the head of your army, you will not have a Washington; you will not have soldiers actuated by the same motives of patriotism; you will not have the same apology for neglecting to pay them. They will commence by complaints; they will load your table with petitions, which, though just, you will not have it in your power to grant; they will take justice into their own hands, and under some popular leader, after scenes of horror, devastation, and blood, they will convert your Government into a military despotism.

I am aware it will be said, that it is intended to provide a system of revenue for this purpose. I doubt not the intention, but I do and must doubt the execution. With this intention, as we were informed, such a system was reported at the last session. Why was it not then adopted? Why has it not been acted on at this? These, sir, are questions, which it is not for me to answer. The public must and will judge for themselves. Thus much, I may say, that the reasons which have hitherto prevented the adoption of such a system, will not only continue to operate, but will increase by delay.

Mr. Chairman, I will detain you but a moment longer. I have always been opposed to this war. I am now opposed to its continuance. The responsibility, therefore, for its faithful prosecution, and successful termination, rests not on me. I am, however, equally interested in the event, with those who made it; and I call upon them, as they regard the interest, the happiness, and future welfare of the country, to take reasonable and effectual measures for the preservation of the public credit.

Do not, by rashness, or extravagance, bring our excellent Constitution into disrepute. A Constitution, the great excellence of which consists, in a wise, faithful, provident, and impartial administration; a Constitution, which, under the auspices of a Washington, is calculated to diffuse happiness throughout the community; to give to agriculture, a rich reward for its labors; to manufactures, encouragement; and to commerce, extension and protection.

But, sir, a Constitution, which, under the auspices of other men, may take bread from the mouth of labor; protect commerce, by its total annihilation; secure peace, by perpetual wars; and render the people happy and contented, because deprived of every solid and substantial enjoyment, they will have nothing more to lose.

Mr. Chairman, we have received from our fathers a rich and valuable inheritance; we are bound to transmit it to our children, as valuable, at least, as we received it. Let us not, then, encumber it with a mortgage of ours, which it will not be in their power to redeem.

The question was then taken on Mr. BIGELOW's motion by ayes and noes, and determined as follows—ayes 23, noes 61.

The question was then put to fill the first blank with the word "sixteen," and carried.

Mr. MILNOR moved to amend the first section by inserting, after the word "dollars," these words, "at a rate of interest not exceeding — per cent. per annum."

He said his motive for offering this amendment was to put some limits to the enormous powers proposed to be devolved upon the President by this bill; that although his own opinion was decidedly against carrying on this war by means of loans, obtained at a greater than the ordinary rate of interest, yet he had left the amendment blank, in order that, at this time, gentlemen might not be entrained by any particular limits; and that the principle might be tested whether the majority of this House are disposed to place any bounds, whatever, to the authority of the Executive to borrow money, or whether he is to be permitted to do it, at whatever extravagant rate of interest he may think fit. If the latter opinion prevailed, he could not concur in it, because he thought it a dangerous discretion with which to invest the Executive; a power that nothing should induce us to devolve on that great branch of the Government, but a desperate necessity, which he presumed would not be contended at this time to exist. Mr. M. said, that the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had referred for a precedent to past times; it was extraordinary that at every step of our progress gentlemen were running back with eagerness to precedents of Federal times; they seem to have forgotten, that it was by representing the proceedings of the dominant party at that day, as most dangerous and alarming to civil liberty and the interests of the people, that they removed them from power and succeeded to their places; and yet, now, whenever an objection was taken to any measure, it was thought unnecessary to support it by argument, if a precedent could be found in the history of Mr. Adams's Administration. Mr. M. said he had no agency in public affairs at the time alluded to, nor did he consider himself bound by every transaction of that day. Some of the proceedings of the party, to whose principles and measures he was generally attached, were not perfectly correct in themselves, and others were calculated to offend the sense of the community, and occasion a transfer of the powers of the Government to other hands. Now, the measures of Federal days, which the present majority then most loudly condemned, are those which, notwithstanding all that they have heretofore said, and with the benefits of experience before them, they are most anxious to copy. The Federalists are charged with maintaining that the Executive was the weakest branch of the Government, and with dispositions, contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, improperly to enlarge its powers.

Sir, said Mr. M. whatever may have been former opinions on this head, I believe the doctrine of the President's power being too small, receives daily evidence of its fallacy in the measures of the present times; for unquestionably a disposition prevails to increase it constantly by our acts, while the immense enlargement of this sphere of patronage and other circumstances arising out of a state of war, are of themselves calculated to do it most dangerously without our aid.

It is time to avert, wherever we can, the progress we are making, by imperceptible degrees in some instances, and by extravagant grants in others, to increase a prerogative which all experience shows us is great enough already, and sufficiently inclined to increase without unnecessarily transferring to him, by express acts, the powers of the other branches of the Government. Mr. M. said he would make a remark or two on what had fallen from the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, as to the merits of this bill as a means of supplying funds for carrying on the war. His own opinion was, that the majority ought to have redeemed the pledge they gave to the holders of public debt and to the nation, at the last session, with respect to the imposition of taxes; and that without bottoming a resort to loans upon some adequate security for the repayment, he did believe the very large amounts proposed to be borrowed for the service of the present and ensuing year, could not be had.

The honorable Chairman had felicitated himself much on the success of the late loan. Mr. M. thought there were no just grounds of exultation when it was considered, that, notwithstanding the amount of unemployed capital in the country, the proposed security of taxes, and its being the first requisition of the sort, the loan had been subscribed very slowly, and the whole amount was not, perhaps, even at this late period obtained. He imagined that if the Head of the Treasury Department were appealed to, he would not say that even the amount obtained was procured with very great facility. He would acknowledge that journeys on his part, much personal solicitation, and appeal after appeal to moneyed institutions were necessary, before they could be brought to extend their subscriptions to the wished for amount; and now it is expected, that after an abandonment of the pledge with respect to internal taxes, and when so much capital had already been drawn into public use, additional loans to the extent, including the Treasury notes, of $21,000,000 could be had in the course of the present year. The city which he (Mr. M.) represented, it was said, could furnish the whole sum. He did not believe it. If his information was correct, the banks of that city, that were willing to subscribe to war loans, had gone to the extent it was convenient for them to lend, and he did not suppose, that, under existing circumstances, private capital, to any such extent, could be diverted from other methods of employment to this. He knew it might be answered, If then there is a difficulty in obtaining the money, why not give the discretion as to the rate of interest, which this amendment will take away? He would reply, because a resort to loans, exclusively, the contracting of a national debt, and that too, without proposing any means, whatever, of repayment, is wholly inexpedient and impolitic, but to borrow at an extravagant interest is still worse, and if it should become indispensable, so dangerous a power should not be given to the President without a specific limit to its exercise in the body of the bill. Besides, he objected to the want of explicitness in this bill. It was calculated to conceal from the people the mode in which resources were raised, for, as the rate of interest is not prescribed, and the power of selling stock for any price is unrestrainedly given to the President, the people might pay twenty per cent for the loans, and the fact be in great measure concealed from their view, by the manner in which the business might be conducted. He was opposed to placing any such confidence in the Executive when we could so easily ourselves act definitely on the subject.

Mr. CHEVES thought that some of the remarks which the gentleman from Pennsylvania had made, were a reflection upon the moral integrity of the Executive. He said, that, however gentlemen might differ from the Chief Magistrate of the Union, in political sentiment, yet he believed it was unequivocally acknowledged by all, that his private character was as amiable as it was irreproachable; that—

Mr. MILNOR here explained, that he intended no reflection upon the moral virtues of the President. His remarks were designed to have a bearing upon the public character of that officer as a public man, and that however exalted, however pure the character of any Executive, it was, it must always be, dangerous to invest him with powers not absolutely made necessary by the necessity of circumstances, and especially when these powers, from their magnitude, were liable to abuse, and consequently extensive public injury.

Mr. CHEVES acknowledged the candor of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He said, it had been urged that the records of Federal times were resorted to for precedents—so far as he approved of these precedents, he deemed it very proper to resort to them, and no further. Some he approved, others he did not. He thought it best that the conduct of France, in 1798, should have been repressed as it was at that time—but the measure of the eight per cent. loan never had his approbation. He would observe, that if the rate of interest were fixed at eight per cent. in this bill, Government would not be able to procure the money at less; but if left unrestricted on this point, it was his opinion the loan would be effected at six, or a little over six per cent. With respect to that part of the observations of the honorable gentleman, which assumed for its ground the likelihood of the increase of Executive patronage, arising from the threefold power of borrowing, Mr. C. replied, that the objection would fall to the ground upon a due consideration of the circumstance in all its aspects; for if the lender should receive no more than the Government was obliged to give, then no favor, no patronage whatsoever, was extended to him. While on the other hand, if the Executive gave him more than he was authorized to give, it would amount to such a gross and fraudulent breach of duty, as it would not be either just or decent to suppose the Chief Magistrate of the country capable of committing. It would not be, as the honorable gentleman insinuated, patronage, for patronage was not the usurped exercise of unauthorized power, but the legal right and privilege of dispensing places, preferments, and other advantages, which the Legislature contemplated, and the laws of the country enacted and authorized.

The question was then put on the amendment proposed by Mr. MILNOR, and negatived.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to amend the bill by adding to the end of the first section, "Provided that no such stock shall be sold under par."

Mr. T. remarked, that, inasmuch as the House had refused to limit the rate of interest, he presumed they could have no objection to grant the limitation proposed by his amendment, not to sell any part of the stock under par. In support of this opinion, he stated that the law of the last session, authorizing the loan of eleven millions of dollars, although it expressly limited the rate of interest to six per cent., yet provided that no sacrifice should be made on the principal. Nor, said Mr. T., is this by any means a novel provision. If gentlemen will examine the statute book, they will find no law on the subject of loans, giving to the Executive the latitude contemplated by this bill. If my amendment should be rejected, said Mr. T., you will vest the President with power to issue stock to an unlimited amount, with an unlimited rate of interest, and a power to sell at an unlimited price. These powers were too great to vest in the hands of any Executive officer, however exalted, and however pure may be his character. The precedent is a dangerous one, and the character and exigencies of the Government do not call for this sacrifice. If you add to this another feature in this bill, allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay forty thousand dollars, by way of commission, for filling this stock in the market, the bill becomes doubly objectionable. He would not consent to tax his constituents for the payment of such a loan, even when the objects for which it might be wanted were of a less objectionable nature.

Mr. CHEVES encountered the motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, not with the denial of the possibility of abuse, against which it might perhaps be difficult in any given case to find a positive and efficient remedy, but by insisting, that, supposing abuse contemplated, the honorable gentleman's proposed amendment afforded no sort of remedy against it—the most that it could do, being only to take away one mode of three, which the law provided, of exercising an unrestricted power to borrow on the best terms attainable. The three modes to which he alluded were—1. To sell the stock; 2. To increase the interest; and, 3. To give a premium, or, as it is commonly called, a bonus. In any one of these modes, the President had the power to bind the United States to as great an extent as he could by the use of them all together. What, then, Mr. C. asked, could be done by taking away the first? Nothing at all, conducive to the object in the honorable gentleman's purview. Prevent abuse it could not, while it would deprive the borrower of a considerable portion of the means of varying his efforts to procure the loan, and entirely take away one mode of obtaining it on the most advantageous terms.

The question was then put on Mr. TALLMADGE's motion, and negatived.

H. OF R.

JANUARY, 1813.

Mr. CHEVES then moved to fill the blank in the second section, with the words "forty thousand dollars."

Mr. TALLMADGE opposed this, as a sum by far too great to be given as a commission for negotiating the loan;—forty thousand dollars was one-fourth per cent. on sixteen millions. He thought one-eighth an ample compensation. He therefore moved to strike out the word "one-fourth," and insert, instead, "one-eighth."—Negatived.

The SPEAKER said, that, if no other amendment were proposed, the question would be on engrossing the bill.

Mr. PITKIN said, he wished till to-morrow to prepare an amendment he would then propose; to which Mr. CHEVES acceded.

The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again on the bill for issuing Treasury notes for 1813; and on motion, the House adjourned until Monday.

The bill from the Senate supplementary to the law for calling out the militia, &c., as amended by this House, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BOND presented five resolutions of the Legislature of the Illinois Territory, requesting their Delegate in Congress to procure the passage of a resolution declaratory of the intention of Congress with respect to the ultimate disposition of the saline lands in said Territory; that he will cause Congress to allow the introduction of slaves into said Territory, to be employed in the salt works; or that money may be appropriated for the purpose of opening roads to the said salt works; and that he will cause measures to be taken with respect to the lands set aside for the use of schools.

Ordered, That the three first resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and that the two last resolutions be referred to a select committee.

Mr. BOND, Mr. HAWES, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. DESHA, and Mr. METCALF, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee of the Whole House were discharged from the farther consideration of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, made on the 2d of December last, relative to an extension of the time limited by law for the payment of lands purchased of the United States; and the report was recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

The House took up the amendment of the Senate to the bill for raising an additional military force for one year.

[The amendment requires the concurrence of the Senate in all appointments which shall be made under it, during the time that body shall be in session.]

Mr. WILLIAMS having stated the entire concurrence of the Military Committee in this amendment, it was adopted without a division.

LOAN BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the Loan bill.

Mr. MILNOR moved to amend the bill by inserting, after the provision authorizing the loan, the words "at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum."

On the suggestion of Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MILNOR modified his motion, so as to leave the rate of interest blank.

The question on the motion was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—John Baker, Abijah Bigelow, Harmanus Bleecker, Adam Boyd, James Breckenridge, Elijah Brigham, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Thomas B. Cooke, John Davenport, jr., William Ely, James Emott, Asa Fitch, Thomas R. Gold, Edwin Gray, Jacob Hufty, Richard Jackson, jun., Philip B. Mr. MILNOR then renewed the motion in the form in which he first proposed it, viz: to insert six per cent. per annum.

This motion was also modified on the suggestion of Mr. PITKIN, by adding thereto the words "payable quarterly-yearly."

And the question thereon was decided by yeas and nays. For the motion 36, against it 69, as follows:

Mr. PITKIN said he rose to offer an amendment. This bill, he observed, gave the President a power to borrow money at an unlimited interest, and a power to go into the market and sell at what price he pleased.

This power was unexampled. In 1798, when a loan of five millions was authorized, and in 1800, when a loan of three and a half millions was voted, there was a restrictive clause in those acts which prevented the President from selling the stock under par. And surely, said Mr. P., if such a provision was thought necessary then, the reason is much more forcible when the power is three times greater than was ever before given to the President. He would just add that the amendment he should now propose was not a novel one—as the Commissioners of Loans, as well as the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, are obliged to submit to this House an account of their proceedings.

Mr. PITKIN then offered the following amendment as a new section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall cause to be laid before Congress, within twenty days after the commencement of their next session, an account of all the moneys obtained by the sale of the certificates of stock, by virtue of the power given him by the preceding section, together with a statement of the rate at which the same may have been sold.

On this amendment Mr. PITKIN demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHEVES objected to the shape, but not the principle of this amendment; he thought it very proper that the President should be accountable for the manner in which he used the power vested in him by this bill. Congress might possibly be called together sooner than the Constitutional period. But supposing this should not be the fact; yet they would be called together before the end of the year, and the loan would not be completed. So long as the loan is executory the accountability should not be demanded. It is possible there is no precedent on record for similar power given to the President. Whether it was, or was not so, Mr. C. did not deem it important; the great question should be, whether any more power is given to the President over the funds of the United States. He believed the same power, though differently modified, was constantly given to him—and this arose from the nature of the Government.

Mr. PITKIN could not see any reasonable objection to the country calling whenever they pleased upon the public stewards to give an account of their stewardship. He was willing to modify the amendment so as to meet the views of the honorable gentleman. He would alter it so as to read, within twenty days after the first of December next, or twenty days after the next meeting of Congress, if it should not meet before the time fixed by the Constitution.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he really could not understand what objection—when great power, and consequently great responsibility, was vested in the officers of Government—what objection gentlemen could reasonably make to those officers being called upon at any and at all times to render an account of the manner in which they had executed the trust reposed in them, and, therefore, he could not agree to the modification of the amendment which was suggested by the honorable mover of it. The causes for this provision were various and imperious; they must be obvious to every understanding when the manner of their discharging their trust was known; it might furnish good cause for withdrawing any further confidence. Mr. R. declared that he could not contemplate the very extraordinary strong-handed measures that were pursuing, or the fate of every attempt made by him to oppose the torrent, without feeling at times a doubt of its existence, and rather imagine that he himself was laboring under a temporary delusion of mind, than that such things could be real. Every restriction upon the undue exercise of power, suggested by the vigilant guardians of the public, whose duty it was to be ever jealous, was resisted as if it were treasonable, and as pertinaciously opposed, as if entertaining a doubt of the purity of the Executive were thought an insult to the House. And who, he demanded, were those that were the uniform opponents of every restriction thus offered? Why, those very persons who choose to call themselves by the name of Republicans. He would not dispute the name with them, nor would he enter at large into the subject at this stage of the business; but return again to the point from which he set out, and say that he should be glad to hear from some other gentlemen what possible cause of objection they could imagine to the proposition now before the House. What a strange sort of a guardian to an infant Republic must he be, to lay it down as a rule to disclaim the calling on the agents of its property, to account for their trust.

If in private life such a thing took place it would be viewed at least with suspicion, and considered as having a very dishonest aspect; and when the minor came of age, would serve as an abundant motive to him for thinking that he had not been faithfully dealt by.

Mr. STOW said, the great object of the proposed amendment was to guard against any corrupt use of the confidence thus reposed in the Executive. If only information was wanted, the House had power to call for it at any period they pleased. He would move an amendment to the amendment—to strike out the words, “within twenty days after the next meeting of Congress”—and insert, “within twenty days after the 1st Monday in February, 1814.”

Mr. WRIGHT spoke at some length against the amendment as proposed by Mr. PITKIN.

Mr. PITKIN declared, that he could not consent to throw back the time so far as February, 1814. He thought he was full liberal enough, in consenting to place it at December.

Mr. CHEVES said, that instead of being astonished at the opposition made to the amendment, he would have been surprised that any one should acquiesce in it—one should expect that a principle so extraordinary should be introduced. It has been the fashion to call for precedents, and he now defied gentlemen to produce a precedent for the measure that was offered. He was surprised, and could not but regret, that the gentleman from Virginia had reflected upon the Republicans. In common charity, he would believe that gentleman a Republican, because he says he is one; for himself, he did not enter into any man's bosom to divine his motives.

Mr. C. said, he was happy, generally, to agree with the gentleman from Virginia; and in the present instance, if at any time after the meeting of Congress, before February next, he would show there had been any abuse of the power thus confided to the President, he, for one, would come forward and support him.

He reminded the gentleman, that the Committee of Ways and Means should be in session at least two months before they could properly arrange and digest the great variety of business before them. Should gentlemen insist upon the information in December, he believed it would be impossible to gratify them—for in the same month, this session, nothing was done by the Committee of Ways and Means. Some time being always requisite to learn what they had to do. He entirely agreed with gentlemen in principle on the resolution offered, and demanded only so much time as would be necessary to carry the resolution into effect. He would also remark, that the loan would not, in all probability, be completed by the time fixed by the gentleman from Connecticut—hence the impracticability of furnishing the statements asked for.

Mr. C. remarked, that developing, from time to time, the terms on which loans were effected, might be injurious to the Government, by preventing their getting the money at a lower rate than they otherwise would; and, in acting thus, we copied the example of the British Parliament, who intrusted to their Minister the power of effecting the loan in the best manner he could, and his bargain was never discredited by the House of Commons.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he should not again have thought of troubling the House, had he not been called up by some remarks made by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina. The professional habits of that honorable gentleman had given him an advantage over him (Mr. RANDOLPH) which he was willing to acknowledge; for, with a dexterity still more surprising than could be to that honorable gentleman the acquiescence in the motion, which he said would have surprised him so much, he had contrived to shake out of his (Mr. RANDOLPH'S) head, more meaning than he ever thought had existed there. Mr. R. said, that the motion of Mr. PITKIN was so excessively reasonable, that if the honorable gentleman had not said so, he could not have believed it possible that its being acceded to, could be matter of astonishment—for his own part, he must say, that when the honorable gentleman who made the motion, and who it appears from that knew the disposition of the House better than he did, demanded to have the question taken by yeas and nays, he was greatly surprised, conceiving there could be no possible objection to it, and that every member in the House would have acceded to it, and none sooner than the honorable gentleman himself, who opposed it. As to the epithet so pertinaciously assumed by all, and which I am supposed to assume, said Mr. R., no less than others, I mean that of Republican, I beg leave to assure the House, that I pretend to lay no exclusive claim to it; in its technical sense, I lay no claim at all to it; for I consider it, sir, as being (to speak in the language of a certain President who was as fond of patronage and big loans as any other President, present or past) a something, which, in practice, may mean anything, or nothing. The honorable gentleman had gone beyond his usual courtesy in acceding, though but in theory, to the accountability of the Executive—but he gave it so long a prorogation, that all the mischief might be done in the mean time, and when the mischief was done, what use would there be in the accountability? It would be according to the old proverb "shutting the stable door after the steed was stolen." If no accountability attached till after the deed was done; it would be equivalent to no accountability at all, and the long prorogation proposed by the honorable gentleman, would act as a virtual dissolution of it.

I will say, sir, what I have more than once hinted at—that of late I never rise in this House, without feeling very serious cause for repentance. I have done, sir.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH said, he presumed the great object of the gentleman's motion was to obtain the earliest information, and if, on the meeting of Congress, it should appear, that the loan as far as contemplated, had been at too great a sacrifice, they would adopt some other mode to procure the balance—this would be the usual course. Mr. G. said, when gentlemen recollected that our fiscal year ended on the 30th September, he believed they would agree that no embarrassment would result in asking for the information soon after the next meeting of Congress.

The question being taken on Mr. Stow's motion, was carried—yeas 75, nays 37, as follows:

Mr. SHEFFEY moved to add, to the end of the second section, the following proviso: "provided that no part of the said stock be sold for less than ten per cent. under par." He said that hitherto it had been the policy of the United States to adopt no principle which should forbid the redemption of their stock, or lessen the facility of discharging the principal of any debt contracted, as soon as the resources of the country permitted. On the contrary, it had been a general object not to fasten on posterity the burdens of the present times. He considered the question now fairly

H. OF R.

Loan Bill.

before the House, whether a policy so just and productive of so many beneficial consequences should be abandoned, and one which was calculated to increase and perpetuate the public debt, adopted in its stead. The power granted by this bill to sell our stock in the market below par is new, and of the utmost importance to the country. If it was the intention of the House, ever to redeem the debt now about to be contracted, it was their duty to limit the amount below which stock should not be sold. For without such limitation the interest of the United States was put to hazard. To illustrate his idea, he would cite a case for the consideration of the House. Suppose, said Mr. S., the sum authorized to be borrowed is obtained by loan under that provision of the bill which requires that the amount of the stock issued should be actually loaned, and the rate of interest agreed on would be eight per cent. At the end of twelve years, when the stock becomes redeemable (for so the bill provides) the interest which shall accrue will be $15,360,000, which, added to the principal, will amount to $31,360,000—the sum the United States would pay for interest and principal. If the $16,000,000 are obtained by sales of stock under par, the result in the aggregate will be more unfavorable to the United States, more or less so, according to the terms on which such sales shall be made. Let me suppose that the sum borrowed is raised by sales of stock at twenty per cent. under par; that is, for every eighty dollars actually paid to the Government, one hundred dollars of stock shall issue, bearing an interest of six per cent. To obtain the sixteen millions, it will be necessary to contract a debt of twenty millions. In twelve years the amount of interest will be $14,400,000, which, with the principal, will make the sum of $34,400,000, upwards of three millions more than if the money had been borrowed at eight per cent., being in fact an interest of nine and a half per cent. on the money actually received. Mr. S. said he had made this statement to show the unfavorable effect in the event of an ultimate redemption. With the person who loans the money, the principal object, besides security, is the amount of the annuity which he shall obtain. He looks not to any possible redemption, because it being discretionary with the Government it can form no ingredient in the contract. In the case supposed, the actual interest which the purchaser of stock under par receives for the money advanced is seven and a half per cent. only, while the market rate of interest is supposed to be eight per cent. In every possible case, where there is stock issued to a greater amount than the money advanced, and the interest to be paid is not much below the ordinary rate of interest, the result will be more or less injurious.

It has been said by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the power over the rate of interest vested in another part of this bill, goes as far as that contemplated by the 2d section, and having refused to limit the one we ought therefore not limit the other. In my opinion, this is a very great difference in their extent and effect. If the President should borrow at an interest unusually high—at the end of twelve years we may arrest the evil by discharging the principal. But if he sells stock for instance at fifty per cent. under par, even should he obtain a proportional reduction from the ordinary rate of interest, we cannot get clear of the encumbrance but by paying the full nominal amount. Besides, in cases of actual loans, the Executive will be restrained by the market price of money and by the sense of the country, which upon this subject is completely settled. But in sales of stock there is no practice—no standard to regulate it. Nor do I conceive it as a necessary consequence, that because one power is given every other should follow; there is a point where confidence must stop, or the very object of such a Government as ours is destroyed. The question before the House is, in point of principle, of infinite importance. The power in question is new—it has no precedent. It is of the deepest interest to the country. I put it to gentlemen, whether they are prepared to enter upon a system of finance which will rivet on the nation an unextinguishable debt, and lead us to ruin.

Mr. SHEFFEY's amendment was negatived, ayes 37, noes 72, as follows:

making sales of the stock, with a view to inserting a smaller per centage.

Considerable discussion took place on this motion—Mr. RANDOLPH supporting, and Mr. CHEVES and Mr. BIBB opposing it. Mr. RANDOLPH inveighed against it as extending the patronage of the Treasury, and making a wasteful expenditure of the public money for a service which might well be done for less. Mr. CHEVES and Mr. BIBB quoted the law passed in 1801 or 1802, respecting a sinking fund, reported by Mr. RANDOLPH himself, as Chairman of the Financial Committee, which made just the same allowance: but, Mr. RANDOLPH contended that the cases were in no-wise parallel, because the former applied to transactions in Europe, respecting the old debt of the United States, &c., in which a greater risk was incurred.

The motion was at length negatived by a large majority, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, January 26.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill for the relief of Louis Chacherie; and they have also passed the joint resolution relative to the brilliant achievements of Captains Hull, Decatur, and Jones, with an amendment; in which bill and amendment they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. ARCHER, from the committee appointed on a Message of the President of the United States, transmitting an act of the State of Maryland, presented a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for shares in the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, in behalf of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Naval Establishment, on the bill regulating pensions to persons on board private armed ships; and the amendments contained in the report were severally concurred in by the House. The bill was then further amended and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

LOAN BILL.

The engrossed bill, authorizing a loan not exceeding sixteen millions of dollars, for the service of the year 1813, was read a third time as follows:

A bill authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding Sixteen Millions of Dollars.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding sixteen millions of dollars, to be applied, in addition to the moneys now in the Treasury, or which may be received from other sources, to defray any of the expenses which have been, or, during the present session of Congress, may be authorized by law, and for which appropriations have been, or, during the present session of Congress, may be made by law: Provided, That no engagement nor contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum, or sums, thus borrowed, at any time after the expiration of twelve years from the first day of January next: And it is hereby further declared, That it shall be deemed a good execution of the said power to borrow, for the President of the United States to cause to be sold, the whole, or any part of the certificates of stock issued, for the sums to be borrowed by virtue of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States do cause to be laid before Congress, on the first Monday in February, 1814, or as soon thereafter as Congress may be in session, an account of all the moneys obtained by the sale of the certificates of stock by virtue of the power given him by the preceding section, together with a statement of the rate at which the same may have been sold.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be and he is hereby authorized to employ, with approbation of the President of the United States, an agent, or agents, for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions to the loan authorized by this act, or of selling any part of the stock created by virtue thereof. A commission not exceeding one quarter of one per cent. on the amount thus sold, or for which subscriptions shall have been thus obtained, may, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be allowed to such agent, or agents, and a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated for paying the amount of such commission, or commissions, as may be thus allowed, and also for defraying the expenses of printing and issuing the subscription certificates, and certificates of stock, and other expenses incident to the receiving of subscriptions, and completing the loan authorized by this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That so much of the funds constituting the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt of the United States as may be wanted for that purpose, after satisfying the sums necessary for the payment of the interest, and such part of the principal of the said debt as the United States are now pledged annually to pay or reimburse, is hereby pledged and appropriated for the payment of the interest, and for the reimbursement of the principal of the stock which may be created by virtue of this act: it shall, accordingly, be the duty of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to cause to be applied and paid out of the said fund, yearly, such sum and sums as may be annually wanted to discharge the interest accruing on the said stock, and to reimburse the principal as the same shall become due, and may be discharged in conformity with the terms of the loan; and they are further authorized to apply, from time to time, such sum or sums out of the said fund, as they may think proper, towards redeeming by purchase, and at a price not above par, the principal of the said stock, or any part thereof. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged to establish sufficient revenues for making up any deficiency that may hereafter take place in the funds hereby appropriated for paying the said interest, and principal sums, or any of them, in manner aforesaid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any of the banks in the District of Columbia to lend any part of the sum authorized to be borrowed by virtue of this act, anything in any of their charters of incorporation to the contrary notwithstanding.

The question having been stated on the passage of the bill—

Mr. GOLD said : After the strong indications in the House of a disposition to pass the bill on your table, I would not, Mr. Speaker, trouble the House with any observations on the subject; did I not consider the course proposed as violating the vital principles of finance; as undermining public credit, and leading to a perpetuation of public debt.

At a time when the ability of the country to contribute to the public burdens is avowed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; when our resources are said to be abundant and unimpaired, a loan of twenty-one million is proposed, without any provision whatever for its certain redemption; no previous funds, no certain revenue in taxes, or otherwise, to meet even the interest on the loan, but all is rested on the future ability and disposition of the country to make good the public engagements. That this course, this resort to enormous loans, without any provision for securing even the interest, is in the face of every sound maxim of political economy, and must entail an oppressive debt on those to come after us, is most obvious; the effect is as certain as the laws of nature.

National credit and public debt are subjects of the first moment in the science of political economy. Public credit, well sustained, is a "mine of gold"—in peace useful, in war indispensable; it is with care and difficulty established; in the progress of Government, in all the emergencies of the State, constantly exposed to State necessities, to the projects of ambition, and the arts of popular leaders, who, fearing the effect upon the people, in arresting some favorite enterprise of war, throw the expenditures of the day from the shoulders of those who create them upon posterity.

The Governments of Europe furnish the most instructive lessons on the subject; in some, the above course has ended in national bankruptcy; in others, a process of accumulation of debt has gone on from generation to generation till it has borne down the nation, and become almost insupportable.

Such has been the downhill course, and so certain the issue, that Sinclair, in his Treatise on Finance, declares, that there is not a single Government, which has gone into this system of public credit and debt, that has ever been able to redeem itself.

In turning to the annals of our own Government, what has been the policy in relation to a public debt? Profiting by the errors of other Governments, it has been our fixed and unvarying policy to effect the extinguishment of the public debt in our days, and not leave it as an inheritance to those who may come after us. For this purpose, a sinking fund was resorted to, to insure an annual application of eight millions of dollars to the extinguishment of the existing debt; to place that sum beyond the reach of the current expenditure and exigencies of the Government, and make it, as it were, a sacred deposit for the object declared.

The operation of this policy on the public debt has, on the return of every annual Message of the President, and report from the Secretary of the Treasury, for the last ten years, been proclaimed in the highest strains of exultation from Georgia to Maine—it has been presented to the eye of the people, in a manner the most captivating, to make them contented with themselves, and satisfied with the Government. And now, sir, what is proposed? To abandon this high course; despair of an extinguishment of the public debt in our days, and follow in the humble, hateful, and reprobated course of those European Governments which have drawn bills on posterity, and perpetuated the public debt.

Shrinking with a kind of nervous sensibility from all contribution, by taxes or otherwise, to the expenditures which we ourselves create, we bind heavy burdens for the shoulders of the next generation.

In finance, the wisdom of man has never been able to discover any effectual security to public credit, short of certain funds or revenue pledged for the redemption, and sufficiently productive to pay at least the interest of the debt; if loans are resorted to, the interest of the loans. This is the doctrine of political economists, well supported by the history of finance. I read from Stewart on Political Economy :

"The foundation upon which public credit is built, is the existence of a sure and sufficient fund for performing the engagements contracted.

"The method, therefore, of borrowing money to the best advantage, is previously to establish a fund of credit."

"What I have said will, I hope, be sufficient to show that the only way for any State to borrow, is previously to provide a fund for making good what is agreed upon with the lenders; and that all expedients to supply the want of it will, in the end, bring great expense upon the people, in case public engagements should be held sacred," &c.

Guided by such lessons, and well knowing the situation of the finances of the United States, and the necessity of meeting the public burdens, the President of the United States, in his Message at the commencement of the last session, recommended to Congress to provide a revenue "sufficient at least to defray the ordinary expenses of Government, and to pay the interest on the public debt, including that on new loans, which may be authorized." In pursuance of this recommendation, the subject was brought before Congress at that session, and the Secretary of the Treasury, with a view to protect the credit of the country, did, in his report, or letter to the Committee of Ways and Means, express himself in the following strong language :

"Considerations of a different nature have on both these subjects produced a different result, which makes a resort to internal taxes now necessary, and will render loans more difficult to be obtained, and their terms less favorable. It is still hoped, that the ordinary peace revenue of the United States will be sufficient to reimburse, within a reasonable period, the loans obtained during the war, and that neither perpetual and increasing public debt, nor a permanent system of ever-progressing taxation, shall be entailed on the nation. These evils cannot, however, be otherwise avoided, than by the speedy organization of a certain revenue. Delays in that respect, and reliance on indefinite loans to defray the war expenditure, the ordinary expenses of Government, and the interest on the loans themselves, would be equally unsafe and ruinous; would in a short time injure public credit, impair the national resources, and ultimately render much heavier and perpetual taxes absolutely necessary."

Here, sir, we have from the high officer who presides over the Treasury, in strong language, but no stronger than just, the ruinous consequences to public credit, the fatal tendency to perpetual public debt of the course now pursued; pursued, sir, with eyes open, in opposition to the highest authority, in the face of everything respectable in finance, and against the lights of all past experience.

But, sir, it is said we have had a windfall of five or six millions in duties, on the late importation of British goods. And is this drop, which is absorbed as quick as it falls, to satisfy the recommendation of the President, and the above report of the Secretary of the Treasury? Is this the "certain revenue," the specific funds, which shall in future time, and until a redemption takes place; defray the annual interest on the public loans, and ultimately insure the extinguishment of the debt? It is impossible not to see the subject in a true light; we cannot shut our eyes on the enormous expenditures we are daily incurring on account of the war—expenditures which, for the last and present year, are not only to consume the above sum, but, in addition, about fourteen millions, already borrowed, and twenty-one millions, for which bills are now before the House, for the ensuing campaign. You may add to all this, about two millions authorized to be borrowed by an act of the last session. If this unexpected receipt from British importations, which has been forced upon us, shall have mitigated the evils of delay to comply with the Secretary's report at the last session, the most imperious considerations forbid any longer delay; every motive urged in that report, at that time, now presses upon us with redoubled force, and all the consequences of further delay, so strongly placed before Congress on that occasion, stare us fully in the face; they cannot be avoided—they are inevitable.

But the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means says, "Congress may hereafter provide funds at the present, or a future session." What, sir, go into market for a loan without your security; submit to the enhanced terms of the lender for defect of security; pay additional interest; pay the lender the risk he runs for want of previous funds for redemption, and superadd the funds, the security, after the loan is made! Lock the door after the steed is stolen! Strange infatuation! And wherefore this mad and disastrous course—a course so contrary to what the honorable Chairman declares to be his own sentiments? Let others give the answer, and find, if they can, any other cause than that which has blasted public credit in other Governments, and made the public debt perpetual. The people, as is said, are willing to go to war at any and every hazard and expense; patriotism burns from St. Lawrence to St. Mary's; but, sir, to tax, to pay, are things for other times; there is no such note in the tune to patriotism. Confining their labors and cares to their own times and themselves, these leaders in war and finance are content to run a race to the tune of "The Devil take the hindmost." Those who come after us are to take care of themselves. The course proposed is no better, in the language of David Hume, than to give a prodigal son a letter of credit on every banker in London.

The bill, sir, contains no limitation as to the rate of interest on the loan, nor any guard against selling the stock, authorized to be created, at a reduced price; against giving three dollars of stock for two in money. Now, sir, although it may be indifferent to the lender whether he receives for his money an interest in terms of eight per cent., or an interest of four per cent., with a reduction in the stock that may be equivalent to the other four per cent.; yet to public credit, and the extinguishment of the public debt, the difference is all-important. The great security in finance against a perpetuation of debt is to pay, at least, the interest of the sum you borrow, so as to exclude the ruinous process of compound interest. Now, sir, you might, perhaps, raise sixteen millions by the sale of stock bearing no interest whatever, say thirty-five millions of stock, and in that way throw off, for twelve years, (the proposed period of the loan) all payment of interest or principal; and the effect is the same, in a less degree, if you sell stock bearing, to the eye, a small or low interest, but compensating the lender in a reduction on the principal; the inevitable result is, that, in obtaining an exemption from the annual payment of the full interest on the sum borrowed, you are subjected to all the weight and evil of compound interest, as the lender must and will insist on the sale of stock upon such terms as will give him, on closing the account at the end of twelve years, the period of the payment, a sum equal to the rate of interest, say seven or eight per cent., which he sets on his money. Knowing full well that there are no funds or sources of revenue to meet the interest on the proposed loans, this ingenious, unprecedented mean, is resorted to, of leaving it to the President, at his entire discretion, to effect the loan at such rate of interest and reduction in the sale of stock as he may deem proper or find necessary. For this double mean there is no precedent; and, indeed, I must protest against the resort to the loans under the first two Presidents as examples in any respect. At that period, the Government and the finances of the country were in their infancy; the capital of the country, the resource for the loan, nothing compared with the present; the necessity of the loan, as was the case of the principal one of twelve millions, in the year 1790, indispensable; for it was not a loan to meet expenses created by the Government, nor for the debt of the Revolutionary war, not a new debt, but the mere conversion of a subsisting one. At such a period, and under such circumstances, there might be reason for committing it to the discretion of the President, to make the best terms the situation of the country would permit; the reason does not apply on the present occasion, when the ability and credit of the country for loans are unquestionable, six per cent. stock being actually at par. There may be one benefit in the double mean proposed; the country may pay even eight per cent. interest without seeing it, and thus carry into effect the rule in finance, to draw money from the people insensibly, or without their feeling it. At a former period, such disguises were rejected, and the front and full face of public measures were presented to the people.

Under the operation of the proposed loan, the sinking fund, I perceive, is to be invaded, and the eight millions there placed, under the solemn faith of a legislative act, for the speedy extinction of the old debts of the war, is to be sacrificed, in part, to the necessities of the times. I am not prepared, sir, to say that the withdrawing of that part of the fund which was superadded under Mr. Jefferson's Administration, and not necessary to the discharge of the original contract with the public creditor, will, in strictness, violate the engagements of the Government; but, sir, I do contend, that the public faith and credit of the country are concerned in the diversion of any part of the eight millions from its declared object.

What, sir, was that declared object? what the very letter of the act of the 29th of April, 1802? That seven millions and three hundred thousand dollars, placed in the sinking fund by that act, should "be and continue appropriated until the whole of the present debt of the United States, and the loans which may be made for reimbursing or redeeming any parts, or instalments, of the principal of the said debt, shall be reimbursed and redeemed." This great and solemn provision for the speedy extinction of the public debt, one of the proudest trophies of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, which made the whole country frantic with joy in those days of jubilee, is, by the bill on your table, openly and directly violated, and all its fair fruits blasted and destroyed. Can your statute engagements be violated by the Legislature itself, without prejudice to public faith and the credit of the Government? Had a succeeding and different Administration or party have done this, it would have excited less astonishment; but here is a kind of infanticide. But, sir, it may be said of this boasted measure of finance that it answered its day, and its authors received their reward in the gratitude of an applauding and rewarding country. In looking back upon that inglorious period, it may be said with truth of this great measure for paying off the public debt, that it amounted to no more than a simple provision to apply any surplus revenue, not necessary for other purposes, to the payment of the debt; it amounted to nothing, nay, much worse than nothing. Notwithstanding the most prosperous period of commerce that followed, and an overflowing revenue arising under the impost system of the preceding Administration; and notwithstanding the doubling of the duties lately adopted, this generation is not destined to see the extinguishment of the public debt. Such, and so enormous is the expenditure of the present period, that three years more of war will fix upon the country a debt exceeding the whole debt of the Revolutionary war, as liquidated and found due at the close of the contest.

But the question is presented, can you withhold supplies for a war Constitutionally declared, or is there a moral obligation on Congress to provide the means of carrying on the war? While I readily admit the reason for withholding supplies should be strong, the right cannot, must not be relinquished, and it is eminently fit that this point should be settled, on the very first occasion, under the Constitution; that it should not remain in doubt, but be openly asserted, so as that it may be questioned and resisted by the authors of the war, if questionable. In the character and station of members of this House, as a part of the supreme Legislature of the Union, will be found the right and duty of giving or withholding supplies as every member shall, in his conscience, conceive will best promote the good of his country. We do not act a humble, subordinate, and ancillary part to any other department of Government, but as the Great Commons of the country, standing on the question of supplies, on the inherent and appropriate authority derived from the Constitution.

In Great Britain, where, by the Constitution, the Commons do not participate in the declaration of war, this right is exercised as often as occasion requires. Mr. Fox, in the important debates towards the close of the American war, maintained it; the Marquis of Rockingham, under whose auspices the peace took place, avowed and justified it. Nor is the right justified on the ground which has been assigned for it at times in this country, to wit: that as the British constitution does not permit a direct legislative interference with the question of war, it was right to assume it indirectly, and thus prevent the carrying on a war which was disapproved of; but on a ground that would apply, if every member had committed himself upon the Journals, in favor of the original declaration of war, to wit: that the public good, in consequence of subsequent events, forbade the further prosecution of it, though rightly commenced.

This right is greatly strengthened by the provision of the Constitution which prohibits the appropriation of moneys for the support of armies for a period exceeding two years, thereby intending to reserve to each and every successive Congress a power over the supplies, to give or refuse as the situation and interests of the country might in their opinion justify.

There are among us those whose devotion to party is such as to deny to freemen in time of war the exercise of the liberty of speech and the press; hence, denunciations and scenes, which, in future history, will humble and disgrace the American character. It is eminently fit, in the first war under the Government, that it be known and proclaimed that the great rights of the Constitution are not suspended by war; the right of the citizens freely to canvass and animadvert upon the causes and conduct of the war and its authors; a right not denied even by monarchy to its subjects. Every enlightened friend to the Constitution will, as he loves his country, hold those slaves of power, who are thus set on to hunt down the liberty of speech, in the deepest abhorrence, as the deadliest enemies of the Constitution and free Government.

I cannot sit down without adverting to this disastrous and ill-fated war, which, after one campaign, after much suffering and waste of blood and treasure, has attained nothing in redress or honor for the country. Must the country be dragged on in this inglorious downhill course to ruin, or will the voice of peace, of wisdom, be heard? The principal cause of war (the Orders in Council) have ceased; the blockades have fallen; impressment alone remains. On impressment, sir, there is no American who can remain indifferent; no American heart but must be moved at the manner in which this claim of Great Britain has been exercised. But, sir, do you see the path of redress plain before you? Does it lie through Canada? Are you mitigating or swelling the tide of human misery by the course now pursued? Are years of bloody war, poisoning all our blessings and putting everything to hazard, to be encountered upon a most uncertain, dangerous experiment? If the territory, the independence or liberties of the country, were assailed; if the Corsican scourge of nations should attempt to bring the United States, with other subjected Governments, under his yoke, a very different question would be presented; it would place before the country a warfare worthy of freemen and heroes. A wise and just nation will not be content with a merely lawful cause of war; the object should be great, the necessity extreme, and redress morally certain. It is the language of Vattel, treating professedly of the great question of war, "It is only in extremities that a just and wise nation has a recourse to war. It is a dangerous and terrible resort." President Jefferson, in his Message to the 8th Congress, expresses himself in the following terms: "While we regret the miseries in which we see others involved, let us bow with gratitude to that kind Providence, which, inspiring with wisdom and moderation our late Legislative Councils, while placed under the urgency of the greatest wrongs, guarded us from hastily entering into the sanguinary contest, and left us only to look on and pity its ravages."

Peace, though suffering under the greatest wrongs, was, in the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, the dictate of wisdom. The same state of things, and all that is connected with the welfare of the country, remains; but new counsels have prevailed. But it is not now too late to return to the path we have lost; and let me solemnly exhort those who rule the destinies of the country to pause, look about them, and survey the nations of the earth. What do we see, sir? A state of the world that is not recorded in the history of centuries! The great deep of the moral world broken up! The long established Governments of the Old World convulsed to the centre, and the great society of man tossed from its foundation! Nations are bleeding at every pore! At such a period of the world, the United States have one single cause of war for which they have plunged into this sea of blood and abyss of misery, instead of bowing with gratitude to Heaven, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, for our singular exemption from the many other calamities that have overwhelmed nations. There is a consideration, which, above all things, ought to have arrested this resort to war. The imperfect union of these States is the vulnerable point of the great body politic. It is impossible to shut our eyes on the great dangers that threaten this Union—the unequal operation of the measures preliminary to war, and of the war itself on different sections of the Union; the single fact, that the authors of the war are those least interested in its cause, and the parts most affected by that cause are most opposed to the war, have produced heart-burnings and animosities not to be cured by a continuance of the war. No man can foresee the perilous issue; those who kindle the fire cannot always control the element and stay its ravages.

The great calamities of this war exceed a hundred fold the complaint or cause of this war; the object of the war, compared with its price, dwindles into insignificance. Holding, as I do, this Union to be the sheet-anchor of our political safety, I cannot consent to yield my support to any measure which shall jeopardize the Union.

Mr. PITKIN said, that independent of the object for which the money was to be raised by this bill, he was opposed to it:—

1st. Because the rate of interest was not limited.

2d. That the President was authorized to sell stock at such a price as he might think proper.

3d. Because no funds were provided for the payment, either of the interest or principal, of the money to be borrowed.

In answer to the first objection, the advocates of the bill say, that it is justified by the precedents under former Administrations. That acts were passed authorizing President Washington and President Adams to borrow money, and without any restriction as to the rate of interest.

With respect to the act passed under the Administration of General Washington, the nature of the transaction necessarily limited the rate of interest, so that there was scarcely a possibility of an abuse of power. What, sir, was the object of that law? Merely to enable the President to effect an entire alteration, if he should think proper, of the foreign debt—and for this purpose he was authorized to borrow a large sum of money. The foreign debt drew an interest of only four and a half, or five per cent.; but a small part of the principal was then due, and there was no danger that a much higher rate of interest would be given in order to exchange this debt.

The precedents, therefore, which can be justly considered, as at all applicable to the present bill, are those which were established during the Administration of President Adams. Laws were then passed authorizing the President to borrow money, without any limitation as to the rate of interest, and under which the famous eight per cent. loan was obtained. No act of that Administration was or has been a subject of more universal clamor, or greater obloquy, than the eight per cent. loan, obtained under those laws. But now gentlemen seem willing to shelter themselves under a precedent, which has hitherto been a subject of their execration.

It is said, however, that the complaints were not against the law itself, but against the improper execution of it; that those who were intrusted with this unlimited power abused it in giving eight per cent. when it was unnecessary, and before they attempted to obtain the loan at a less rate of interest. I meet the gentlemen, then, sir, on their own ground. They say, this unlimited power was then abused, to the great injury of the public. May it not again be abused? Is it not, sir, one of the best of reasons against intrusting any man with large and extensive powers, that those powers have been, and in all probability may and will again be abused? Why, sir, has the Constitution, under which we now act, limited the power of Congress itself in certain cases? Why was it said, that treason shall only consist in levying war against the United States, or in adhering to their enemies, and that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus should not be suspended, unless in cases of rebellion or invasion?

The second objection to the bill is, that the President, in order to raise the money, may sell the certificates of stock at such price as he may think proper. It is not pretended, sir, by the advocates of the bill, that this power is justified by any former precedents. It stands then, in this respect, on its own intrinsic merit.

What, sir, is the extent of this power? It is nothing more or less than this, that the President, or rather the Secretary of the Treasury, may go into market with our notes, to the amount of $16,000,000, and, by the aid of a broker, sell them at a discount of ten, fifteen, twenty per cent., or any discount he may think proper.

But, Mr. Speaker, the rate of interest to be given for this large loan, or the discount, at which it may be obtained by the sale of stock, must depend on the funds which you pledge, and on the security which is offered for the payment of the interest and principal of the sums obtained.

Public credit, sir, is a subject of a delicate nature; it is of too much importance to be trifled with. To preserve it unimpaired, is the first duty of legislators, and on this subject no principle is better established than this: That at the time of the loan itself, permanent funds should be provided, and inviolably pledged, for the punctual payment of the interest, and the ultimate reimbursement of the principal. What funds are provided by this bill? None in reality. The third section indeed says, "That so much of the funds constituting the annual appropriation of $8,000,000 for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt of the United States as may be wanted for that purpose, after satisfying the sums necessary for the payment of the interest, and such part of the principal of the said debt, as the United States are now annually to pay and reimburse, is hereby pledged and appropriated for the payment of the interest and for the reimbursement of the principal of the stock, which may be created by virtue of this act." But, sir, from what source is this $8,000,000, which is thus appropriated for the payment of the public debt, to be obtained? Why, sir, from duties on imposts and tonnage, and from the sales of public lands. And, by law, it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, every year, first to pay to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, as they are called, this sum of $8,000,000 from these duties, (after reserving six hundred thousand for the civil list,) and from the sales of public lands. But, sir, if the money does not come into the Treasury from these sources, it is impossible for the Secretary to pay it to these Commissioners.

The Secretary, sir, has told us, in his annual financial report, that the duties on imposts and tonnage (although doubled) will not amount to more than $5,000,000, which will become payable in 1814, and the avails of lands sold, not more than about $500,000; deducting then the civil list, there will remain but about five millions in the Treasury from these sources for that year. The residue can be supplied only by loans or other taxes. It will be observed, however, sir, that out of this pretended fund of eight millions, there must first be paid and satisfied "the sums necessary for the payment of the interest, and such part of the principal of the said debt, as the United States are now pledged annually to pay, or reimburse," before any part can be applied to the payment of the debt to be incurred by this bill. And, sir, the sums, which the United States are now pledged to pay out of this fund, are more than the whole amount which, according to the calculation of the Secretary, will come into the Treasury from duties in 1814, and will exceed the eight millions. What, sir, are the present charges on this fund? They are:

1. Interest and reimbursement of old debt $3,800,000
2. Interest on the loan of 1812, exclusive of treasury notes—loan, say ten millions 600,000
3. Reimbursement of the principal of part of the loan of 1812, payable by special contract in 1814 - 750,000

Aggregate	$14,530,000

The pledge, therefore, held out by this bill, to the money-lender, is a mere pretence, without any foundation. The interest of the present loan can, therefore, only be paid in 1814 by new loans, unless some further provision is made; and I know, sir, that no new taxes are to be laid during the present session. I need not ask, sir, how long public credit can be supported, when new loans must be resorted to, to pay the interest of old ones. The importance of supporting public credit arises, also, from another circumstance. The Secretary of the Treasury, as well as the Committee of Ways and Means, have informed us, that we are to rely solely on loans, to defray all the expenses of the present war; and during the last session, they urged it as indispensably necessary, to make ample provision for paying the interest of these loans. This, however, was not then done, nor is it to be done during the present session.

Under these circumstances, what, sir, will the money-lenders say to you, when you ask them for a loan of more than twenty millions of dollars? Will they not say, if you will not or dare not lay taxes, or make provision for the interest at the time of the loan, and when you are under the necessity of obtaining the money, can we expect you will do so after you have got the money in your own hands? Depend upon it, sir, the capitalists will speculate upon you, and make you pay for every risk. They will also take into consideration the probable amount of the debt which may be incurred in the prosecution of the war. During the last session, the calculation of the Committee of Ways and Means was, that the expenses of the war might be ten millions a year—making, in five years, fifty millions. Experience has proved the fallacy of such calculations.

During the last year, we borrowed from twelve to fourteen millions; and the sums necessary to be procured on loan for the service of the year 1813, cannot be less than twenty-three millions, including Treasury notes—making, for two years, the sum of thirty-five millions.

The whole expense of the present year, as stated by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, will be thirty-six millions of dollars. About twelve millions of this is to be paid from the duties on imports of the last year. The amount of the duties which will accrue on importations during the present year, and become payable in 1814, the Secretary estimates at only five millions. If, then, the expenses of 1814 are equal to those of the present year, and no other provision is made, the sum to be borrowed during the next year must be - $31,000,000. And, with the same expense in the year 1815, must be - 31,000,000. And in the year 1816 must be - 31,000,000. Allowing for contingencies - 2,000,000.

Making, in five years, a debt of $130,000,000

A sum nearly equal to the whole expense of the Revolutionary war, and about double the amount of the debt due at the close of that war.

It appears, from official estimates made in the year 1790, that the whole expenses of the last war were - $135,193,375

That, in the year 1783, the amount of the debt of the United States was	- 42,000,375
And of the State debts, which were assumed by the United States	- 21,500,000

Making, in 1783, about - $63,500,375

The residue of the expense of the war was paid by taxes. This debt, it is well known, for some years lay unprovided for, and was at last funded in terms different from the original contract; and about thirty-three millions of it remains unpaid to the present day. The funding of this debt, sir, ruined the popularity of one Administration, and who will say, that the funding of a debt of double this amount, may not also, at a future period, jeopardize the popularity of another?

During the last session, Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Ways and Means, for the support of public credit during the war, reported a system of taxation. This system contemplated laying a direct tax, sundry internal taxes, and an increase of the then existing duties on imports 100 per cent. These taxes were then denominated war taxes. They were proposed as one entire system, and were calculated to equalize the burdens upon every class of the community. It will be recollected, sir, that no part of this system was adopted, but that of doubling the duties on imports. This, sir, as I then stated to the House, makes the burden of taxes fall very unequally on different sections of the United States. Permit me again to call the attention of the House to this subject.

In consequence, sir, of the increasing population of the interior of the country, the duties on imports, and particularly the high duties on particular articles, fall much heavier on the inhabitants along the seaboard than those living in the interior. To prove this, sir, suffer me to mention the duties collected on spirits imported. These are paid (and particularly on rum) almost wholly by the Northern and Eastern States. It is a fact, sir, that the duties on imported spirits alone, collected from 1792 to 1810 inclusive, have amounted to one-fifth of all the duties collected on all articles imported during that time. The whole amount of duties received, from 1792 to 1810, was $179,862,044; and, of this sum, spirits alone paid $35,849,173.

Not more than one-third of the people of the United States, at present, pay any part of the duties on spirits. The quantity consumed in the United States is now about thirty millions of gallons annually. Of this quantity, more than twenty millions, as appears by the returns of the marshals in 1810, are distilled in the United States, from domestic materials, and on which no duty is laid. While, therefore, the people at the North and East are now paying sixty cents per gallon, on a great proportion of the spirits they consume, those at the South and West are paying nothing on their consumption of spirits. Nay, sir, they can purchase them for a sum much less per gallon, than the people of the East are now paying into the public Treasury, for the purpose of carrying on this war. And, sir, I will venture to predict that these enormous taxes are to be perpetuated, for the purpose of paying the loans to be obtained by this bill. This, sir, is an inequality, to which we cannot expect that the people at the East will long submit; nay, sir, to which they ought not to submit with patience.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 38, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

TREASURY NOTES.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes for the service of the year 1813.

[The bill authorizes the President of the United States to cause to be issued Treasury notes to the amount of five millions of dollars, and also, if he shall deem it expedient, to issue a further amount, not exceeding five millions of dollars, provided the amount issued under the latter provision shall be deemed and held to be in part of the loan of sixteen millions of dollars authorized by the bill passed this day. The notes to bear interest at the rate of five and two-fifths per cent. per annum, to be redeemed one year after the day on which they are respectively issued.]

The bill having been read through by sections, and no objection having been made thereto, the Committee rose and reported it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without division; and then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 27.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Lewis Chacherie" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Claims.

The amendment of the Senate to the resolution relative to the brilliant achievements of Captains Hull, Decatur, and Jones, was read, and concurred in by the House.

An engrossed bill regulating pensions to persons on board private armed ships, was read the third time, and passed.

TREASURY NOTES.

The engrossed bill authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes for the year 1813, was read a third time.

Mr. POTTER said, he knew very well that the Government wanted money and must have it; and if they would not get it at one price they would at another; but he thought it much better to add the sum contemplated to be raised by the bill, to the loan bill, or to create six per cent. stock, and whenever the money was like to be wanted, to give notice a reasonable time, and sell it for what it would bring; in that way the Government would get the highest price for it, and every person who had money and wished to invest it in public stock, would have an equal opportunity to do it. The Government would neither have to lose the interest on their notes, nor pay interest for money until it was wanted. Mr. P. said he was opposed to issuing Treasury notes, because it was creating a new system of patronage and favoritism in the Treasury Department, already too great. As these notes are not to draw an interest of eight per cent., they may be negotiated in such a manner as to give the person who may take them some other advantages as an equivalent, as it is not pretended that the money can be got for six per cent on the stock sold for par; if it is, why give the power in the loan bill, to sell the stock under par, and to give more than six per cent. interest? As those notes had been principally negotiated with the banks the last year, it was to be presumed they would be this; a bank therefore that takes a million of dollars in those notes, and gives the United States credit for that sum, and it is to remain in deposit for their use, not under any particular agreement as for the time it shall remain with them, but with a well grounded expectation that it will not be wanted for some time; if it should remain there six months, and then should all be drawn for at once, which is not very common, the Government will have to pay the interest for a year, when they have had the money only six months. If the money should not be wanted, and it should remain in deposit, undrawn for during the year, (which is not at all improbable) the Government are then paid with their own notes, with their paying a year's interest on the million of dollars, without having used any of the money; and in this way those notes will operate more or less in favor of the favorite bank, without much benefit to this Government.

Mr. P. said, by examining the report from the Treasury Department, he found those notes were negotiated with the banks where the public money is deposited. He said it might be answered, that if the money was borrowed, it would be deposited in those banks; and they would derive the same advantage as from those notes, and the Government derive no advantage from the money deposited. He said that was not the fact; as a bank that would risk to lend an hundred thousand dollars in cash, and immediately advance the money, would risk to lend a million of dollars and take those notes and give the United States credit to that amount; and in this respect it gave banks a very great advantage over individuals who should be disposed to lend their money to the Government, and over the Government likewise; for, if the Government hired money, although it might be paid into those banks, it would be paid in by instalments as it was wanted. The United States would not be obliged to pay interest until the money was actually paid in, nor the lender entitled to the interest until he had advanced the principal. Mr. P. said, he knew very well the advantages that those banks derived from the Government for their deposits, and he believed that during the last year the deposits of public money was nearly equal to the whole amount of Treasury notes issued. That he had on a former occasion introduced a resolution to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit the money belonging to the United States in such banks as would give the most for that privilege; but the resolution was referred to a committee, and that was the last he heard of it. He said, in looking at the report from the Treasury Department, of the money borrowed the last year, he found that the three banks in the State he represented, and in which the money belonging to the Government of the United States collected or borrowed in that State were deposited, had loaned to the Government eighty thousand dollars for six per cent. stock. He said he believed that those banks had at all times that sum and frequently much more of the Government money in their vaults; the consequence was, if the fact was correct, that the Government was paying those banks an actual interest on that amount for their own money.

Mr. P. said, his object had been to show that if the bill was passed, it would extend the patronage of the Treasury Department, already too extensive, to certain banks, and enable it to give them privileges not enjoyed by other banks, or by individuals. They had already been sufficiently favored by deposits in money, which had enabled them to increase their discounts and dividends, and in this way to receive an interest on the money of the Government; and if instead of money they are to keep the amount of the Government deposits in those Treasury notes, they must curtail their discounts to individuals, and the Government will have to pay them an interest on their own notes representing their own money; and those banks must derive an immense advantage the ensuing year, as they will have deposited in them sixteen millions to be raised by loan, five millions supposed to be received by the revenue by double duties, with the money now in deposit—making, in the whole, nearly forty millions.

Mr. P. said, if it was at any time asked, why the people could not be permitted to pay a part of this enormous expense, and why the Government should not wish to mortgage their estates for so large a debt, a part of which they were willing to pay, and at an interest, including expenses, of perhaps ten or twelve per cent, the answer is, that the minority want the Government to tax the people, and thus to make the Administration and ruling party unpopular. Mr. P. said, that it was not a fact, as it respected him. It would cost his constituents too much: it was paying more for their popularity than it was worth. He said he voted for the loan the last year, although he did not vote for any of the expenses, in hopes that it would supersede the necessity of imposing upon the people the most odious and burdensome system of taxation ever imposed in this country, containing among them a shop tax, that never could be enforced in England; and as it respected himself he could truly say, he would not, by any act of his, have brought those taxes, reported by the Committee, upon his constituents, or voted for any measures that even would have brought upon them their Constitutional proportion of this year's expenses, amounting at least to four hundred thousand dollars, (and this is allowing the expenses for this year at only thirty-six millions of dollars,) if it would have put into his power to displace every officer in the Government, from the President to the tide waiter, and to put whom he pleased in their places; that it was of little importance to him who administered the Government of this country; his only object was to have an economical administration—one that would give to the nation peace as soon as possible, and use their best exertions to continue it, and give them all the commerce that the present state of the world was capable of affording; with such an administration he should be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. P. said he had been in hopes, when all the precedents of former times of Executive patronage and favoritism had been exhausted, that we should have been satisfied without resorting to new inventions, having that effect; but in this he had been disappointed.

Mr. P. said, he was in Congress at the commencement of Mr. Adams's Administration. Energy was said then to be the order of the day. The majority were then in favor of an army, a navy, war loans, taxes, salaries, and patronage; they were then opposed by a powerful minority, composed of such men as Mr. John Nicholas, and the late Mr. Venable, of Virginia, and a gentleman now a member of this House, Mr. MAÇON, who were then the friends of peace and economy, and, in debate and by their votes, opposed to army, navy, loan and tax bills, to high salaries, Executive patronage, and for restraining and confining appropriations to the particular purposes for which they were made. He said those principles accorded very much with his own views and feelings. Finding himself very unpleasantly situated, as is commonly the case with those who in party times cannot go all lengths on either side—for, although he approved of some of the measures of the Administration, he was obliged to vote against many of them; he did not wish to vote against the opinion of his constituents, nor could he vote against his own judgment. In this situation he thought, instead of choosing between the two evils, that he would avoid them both, and resigned place.

What, said Mr. P., had since taken place? The people were honestly opposed to the measures of that Administration, and in a Constitutional manner removed them from office and from their confidence, and put in those composed of the then opposition, professing principles more congenial to their own; but they honestly thought they had been contending for principle, and that it was measures and not men that they had been condemning—for, if they were doomed to oppression, it would be no consolation to have their burdens increased by other men. What, said Mr. P., do we now see, and what must we soon expect to feel? We find the times are changed, and we are changed in them. Let us for a moment examine our present situation under the present Administration, compared with the one displaced by the people for their extravagances. We now hear the same doctrines from the present Administration as from the former. They want an energetic Government; they talk of large standing armies, ships, war loans, taxes, salaries, and patronage; and instead of the skeleton of an army of five thousand men, they have the skeleton of an army of fifty-five thousand men, enlisted for different periods. Instead of frigates, they are not satisfied with building new frigates, but must have ships-of-the-line.

Instead of a loan for five millions of dollars, they have passed laws within a year, including the one under consideration, for upwards of thirty-five millions of dollars. Instead of reducing the debt, it was increased last year ten millions six hundred thousand dollars, and, in all probability, will be increased more than double that sum this year.

Instead of reducing the salaries of the War and Navy Departments, to the sums they were before they were raised by a temporary law of a former Administration, which then caused much dissatisfaction with the people, that law, he believed, had been made permanent, and bills are now reported to raise them above the sum to which they were raised before.

Mr. P. here observed, if it could have been possible for him to have been absent out of the country since his resignation, without hearing or knowing anything about the state of parties in this country, and could so have come into this House and have examined the army, navy, loan, and tax bills, and those for raising the salaries of the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments, he should have thought that the same party was now in power; that Mr. Adams was in the White House; that he had by some means contrived to silence the murmurs and complaints of the people and to put down all opposition; and that they had regularly progressed, in many of their measures, from bad to worse ever since.

Mr. P. said, he had often heard it unjustly observed to be a Federal doctrine, that a national debt was not only a bond of union but a very great national blessing. He said if that principle was correct, we shall have nothing to apprehend or even in the least to alarm our fears about a separation or a dissolution of the Union; and the time was not far distant when, in proportion to the time we had existed as a nation and our ability to pay, we should be able to vie with any nation on earth in that kind of happiness.

Mr. CHEVES said that, in the argument he should offer to the House, he should embrace the loan bill passed to a third reading yesterday, as well as the bill now before the House. The bills had originated together; they had been acted upon together; they had an immediate connexion; and, having been accidentally prevented yesterday from replying to the gentlemen from New York and Connecticut, (Messrs. GOLD and PITKIN,) he should, perhaps, now advert to their arguments.

I will first notice, said he, the argument we have just heard on the bill before you. An objection is raised to the particular mode of raising money, which is now submitted to your consideration. The honorable gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. POTTER) says, he would infinitely prefer a direct loan to this measure. His reason is, that if the Government borrow money by this mode, the consequence will be, that the money will be deposited in banks, and they, receiving interest on their notes, will also have the use of the money, and therefore a loan is, in his opinion, preferable. If the United States create stock tomorrow, and receive money for it from the banks, will not the money be deposited in the banks, and will not the holders of the stock have the interest, and the banks at the same time have the benefit of the deposits and carry on a system of banking upon them? They certainly will. Where, then, is the distinction attempted to be drawn? There is absolutely none. Further, the receipts from lands, from imposts, from internal taxes, if they existed, would all be deposited in banks, and the banks would discount on these deposits. The paper now proposed to be issued is not so exceptionable in this respect as a loan. From the peculiar nature of this paper, it may be used as the exigencies of Government require, and the banks do not become purchasers, until it is necessary for the exigencies of Government that the paper should be issued. It is different with a loan, and the evil of which the gentleman speaks exists in a less degree with this species of paper than with the other. The argument against this bill now is exactly that which was pressed with so much force last year by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH;) but the argument is founded on a mistake in point of fact; and the fact, as conceived, is misapplied in argument.

Treasury Notes.

H. OF R.

Another argument of the gentleman was, that public credit is affected by relying on loans, instead, of the imposition of taxes or the acquisition of revenue in other modes. That argument comes under the general considerations which I propose to submit to you. The general principle of relying on loans has been the subject of attack on all hands. An honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. GOLD,) yesterday, commenced an animated speech to prove the great value of public credit. To prove this, he resorted to a writer of great celebrity on public economy; and also referred to the President's Message, and to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was not necessary to go far to prove what is universally admitted. Why should the gentleman labor to prove what no one denies? I admit that public credit is infinitely valuable; it gives more than the mines of Peru and Mexico, without the labor of digging them. But look at the argument of the gentleman. We may have bread, but must not eat; to preserve our credit, we must not use it.

The principle on which the Government sat out in the war was, that there should be a sufficient fixed revenue to pay the annual interest of the old debt, and on the new loans. If it be proved that that object is already accomplished for the present year, then has there been no failure on the part of the Government. I will grant, perhaps, to the honorable gentleman that it might have been better to anticipate a little; to take "a bond of fate, and make assurance doubly sure." But I contend, that there has been, so far, no failure. And has it not been stated, and repeatedly stated, that it is the duty of the Government, and no doubt its intention—that it is the duty and, no doubt, the intention of the Legislature to provide the necessary means, for future years, for paying the interest of the public debt? But the honorable gentlemen say, we should not delay for a moment the execution of this purpose; that we should provide revenue in anticipation. Admitting the general proposition, is there anything which calls for a proceeding of this sort before the authorization of a loan? The year 1813 has already been provided for; and for 1814, provision may be made at the present session; and, if not at this session, by an anticipation of the usual time of the sitting of Congress. If it be not provided, there will be, on the part of the Government, an omission of duty. I do not imagine, sir, that the persons who manage this concern will be guilty of a negligence so culpable as not to provide the means, in due season, for the next year. One measure alone would supply the means for the present and next year—permitting the return of the property of our merchants from Great Britain. If the Legislature resort to this mode, the object of providing the revenue may be accomplished in a short time. Why should gentlemen be alarmed for the public credit, when there is so little apparent cause for alarm? Why should they suspect men, who have heretofore so amply provided for it, of a failure to do so in future?

But honorable gentlemen have said that there should be a sinking fund to secure the repayment of the public debt according to the contract of the Government, and that it has not been provided, according to the usual practice of well-regulated Governments. This I deny. What is the argument of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PRIN?) He endeavors to prove, by a particular detail which he entered into, that there will be imposed on the sinking fund for 1814, thirteen millions and three hundred thousand dollars. This I deny. The sinking fund is the application, under the pledge of the Government, of a certain sum for the sinking of so much debt, and paying so much interest as that sinking fund is capable of effecting. Our sinking fund is eight millions. Ask the honorable gentleman whether, in the only instance which he has in his argument examined of a sinking fund—I mean the English—it be not encumbered every day with an addition of a new debt? Every new debt created becomes an encumbrance on the sinking fund. It may be said, that one per cent. is added to it on the amount of every new debt created. But, sir, our sinking fund bears a greater proportion to any new debt which can be created throughout the war, than the English sinking fund does to their debt. The competency of the sinking fund, therefore, as far as we look to example, is found to be at least equal to that of England. The error of the gentleman is this: that the sum chargeable on the current expenses of the year he puts upon the sinking fund, with which it has nothing to do. Suppose the Government issue ten millions instead of five millions of Treasury notes, the sinking fund must, according to his ideas, be eighteen millions. And suppose, again, that the Government, instead of obtaining a loan for twelve years, should effect a temporary loan, for one year, of five millions; the sinking fund would then be twenty-three millions. The error is in charging upon the sinking fund what is properly chargeable on the ways and means of the year.

The honorable gentlemen differ, however. The honorable gentleman from New York admits, and I doubt not correctly, that if a nation like this shall provide for the payment of the interest of the national debt, and not allow an accumulation of interest and compound interest, the expenses of the war may be defrayed by loans, and its credit may be supported. But the gentleman from Connecticut contends that it is necessary to the support of public credit that during the continuance of war we should pay the expenses of the war to a considerable extent by a revenue raised upon the people within the year. In support of this position he cites the example of the Revolutionary war; and it appears to me that the gentleman was singularly unfortunate in this reference. During the present year we have already secured twelve millions of revenue. There are three millions in the Treasury, making together fifteen millions; and I might defy the gentleman to prove, by anything like accurate calculation, that so much as fifteen millions of revenue raised upon the people accrued to the public treasury during the whole period of the Revolutionary war. I am acquainted with no historical fact to prove that during the whole Revolutionary war fifteen millions were raised on the people. Say that I am wrong as to the precise amount; say that twenty millions were raised, if you please. The revenue during the last and present year will exceed anything that could be supposed to have been received during the whole Revolutionary war. The gentleman I suppose makes out his calculation thus: It has been calculated, he says, that the Revolutionary war cost a hundred and thirty-five millions. Of these there remained payable at the close of the war, sixty-three millions. Therefore, he conceives the difference between the two must have been raised by taxation during the war; I answer that the fact is not so. I ask the gentleman to turn to a historical fact and refute that complaint which runs through the whole history of the war, of the incompetency of the Government thus to raise the sum necessary to the prosecution of the war. How the sum of one hundred and thirty-five millions was made out I am unable at this moment with confidence to say; but I suppose by an arbitrary calculation of the value of bills of credit, of which probably not one-third was funded at all; because the holders of the bills did not think it worth their while to bring them in; they are found now all over the United States in bundles. Every heir finds them in the bottoms of old trunks, and in the garrets of his progenitors. Thus this calculation of the cost of the war must have been founded; and, according to this mode of calculation, I dare say it might be made out to have cost much more. It is not, therefore, proved that the difference stated was raised by the United States. There were no impositions laid by Congress itself. The debt of the General Government at the close of the war amounted to forty-two or forty-three millions—the debt arbitrarily assumed as due to the States was twenty-one and a half millions. How was that sum made up? By the amount of contributions of every description made by the States. That sum more than embraced the whole contributions of the States—because some of it was interest. In any possible view the comparison of the revenue of the Revolutionary Government with that of the present is injurious to the argument of the gentleman. It is no proof that any considerable sum expended in the war was raised during the war.

In fine, sir, a basis of credit now exists which ought to be perfectly satisfactory to every man in the nation when taken in connexion with the religiously good faith with which the public credit has been maintained. A basis is established which none but the most incorrigible sceptic I think would doubt. It is indeed incumbent on the Government to provide a revenue for 1814, and they will be guilty of a dereliction of duty if they do not provide it. But that dereliction of duty has not yet taken place; the accusation, therefore, is premature and unfounded.

The next question is, the practicability of the loan—and here gentlemen admit that there is sufficient capital in the country to supply the wants of the Government, and that the value of money does not exceed six per centum. The honorable gentlemen say, that if a higher interest be given by Government for the money, it will be because the public credit has not been sufficiently secured. But I contend, sir, if the value of money be no more than six per cent. that it will not be because of the defect of security that the Government will have to give more—it will be on account of the confidence given to the recondite calculations of the gentleman from Connecticut, and the fears excited by the rhetorical spectres of the gentleman from New York; it is these fearful predictions and these erroneous calculations of gentlemen, and these only, that can shake the confidence of the moneyed men in the security of the Government. I do not here allude, sir, to what I consider a slander on gentlemen who are opposed to the loan, the assertions in the public prints, that efforts are used to destroy the credit of the Government and defeat the loan. I will not suppose it to be true. Such conduct would be too weak, too wicked, too treasonable, I had almost said, to be believed of any respectable portion of our citizens. Nothing but the honest fears of the people, excited by the arguments of gentlemen here, will prevent them from loaning money to Government on advantageous terms. It will not be for gentlemen hereafter, if the Government should be driven to give more than six per cent. for money, to complain of that which is the consequence of their own imprudence in exciting false alarms. Notwithstanding the like statements, arguments, and predictions of gentlemen about the public debt, the loan for the last year has been obtained, and that wanted for the present year will be obtained in like manner, I trust, at the lowest just rate of interest.

The particulars of the loan bill present the next and last view of the subject. The gentlemen have argued over and over again the question relative to limiting the interest to be given for the loan. The gentleman from Connecticut said there were no examples of such unlimited power. It is painful for me, sir, to repeat arguments I have already urged. The first loan ever authorized by the Government is an example. What was the motive for allowing the Government then to give an indefinite interest? Was it a moment of difficulty? Was the enemy at your gates? Was he in the mouths of your harbors, or on the frontiers? No; the Government was in profound peace. The old debt which was to be redeemed by the loan bore a reasonable interest, and yet an unlimited power as to the amount of interest was given. Why was it done? Because the interest of the Government called for it; it was to put the Government out of the hands of the money lenders. If the Government had then passed a law authorizing a loan at eight per cent. the money-holder would have come forward and demanded it; and he would do so now, and would not abate an iota of the eight per cent. The honorable gentleman says there were but two other examples of this kind, the five million and the three and a half million loans; and he calls upon us to take warning by those examples, alluding to the Administration of that day having given eight per cent. interest. That high interest proceeded, I will not say from the abuse, but from the injudicious exercise of the power vested in the Government; and if the Government were to do now as the Government then did, I should consider it as abusing its power; but I do not mean an immoral abuse of power. The Government may now possibly not get it for less; but, if they do not, it will proceed from causes such as I have stated. Trusting the Government thus with the management of the loan, and the negotiation of interest, is at this time not so indiscreet as to go into market and state their price. I wish you then, sir, to copy the wisdom and avoid the error of the former Administration.

But there were other instances besides that which I have mentioned, and the three and a half and five million loans to which the gentleman has alluded. There was one for naval and military appropriations, of one and a half millions. There have indeed been numerous instances of such grants, and this too in a time of peace. Congress are authorized, therefore, in point of precedent, in granting power to make a loan without limitation of interest—and I will not disregard the value of precedent on this point, though it came from the honorable gentlemen, and though they even disown it.

I need not I hope, sir, give any further answer to the argument that the want of limitation to the interest to be given is an exceptionable feature in the bill. Nor is the authority to sell the stock, or give a premium, more exceptionable. This the honorable gentleman from New York has correctly stated is a matter of calculation. Nothing is more true. If, by the sale of stock, the Government can make a better bargain than by the loan, they will do so; and they will give a premium, if a better bargain may be made in that way.

I need not enter into the argument of the gentleman from Connecticut, going to show the probable expense of the war. I will show one instance however in which the gentleman is in error. The gentleman has stated that in this year twenty-one million will be added to the debt of the nation. Now this is a mistake; there will not be twenty-one millions added to the debt of the nation. For if thirty-six millions, the sum estimated for the present year, be expended, eight millions of it at least will be expended for the payment of the interest and the diminution of the principal of the public debt. There will be expended for interest about three millions. The loan (including the Treasury notes) wanted for the present year is twenty-one millions; so that the amount added to the public debt during the present year will not exceed sixteen millions. The gentleman says, if the war be continued four years, it will add to our debt an hundred millions of dollars. Not, sir, if the interest of the loans be provided for within each year. The whole amount of four years' loans, supposing them not greater than that of the present year, and they cannot well be conceived to be probably greater, will amount to but sixty millions, and will not exceed by twenty-four millions the sum which the republican Administrations of this Government have paid off of the public debt.

I have no more to say, sir, on the merits of these bills. But gentlemen have again given us a dish of all sorts, and called our attention to the war. The honorable gentleman from New York gave us the reasons why he would not support the war or vote for the loan. In the first place, he said there exists a Constitutional right in every member to oppose the war. No man denies the right, and very far am I from questioning it; but I hope there will be a prudent and a conscientious exercise of that right. I do not deny that gentlemen act conscientiously; but I believe they are mistaken in their views. The conduct of the English opposition is offered as an example. But our Government is different from that of England. That Government consists of the people, the Sovereign, and the privileged orders; our Government is one of the people alone. In that Government it is sometimes necessary that that portion of it which represents the people should be in opposition to the Government. But that is not necessary and perhaps not justifiable here. The gentleman from New York (Mr. Stow) the other day, in his admirable speech, gave us illustrious examples of Englishmen disapproving a war, and yet supporting their Government in carrying it on. Gentlemen have a right of opposition, but they ought to exercise it so as not to injure their country, and they ought not uncharitably to upbraid others who, in making war, make nothing but sacrifices, and run every hazard without almost any hope; who can gain nothing but may lose everything; who consequently can have no sinister views, and must therefore be supposed to act honestly.

Gentlemen have again adverted to the particular causes of the war. There is no end to this subject. Mocking is catching. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) during the last session, humorously and wittily, laughed at the gentleman on this side of the House for the frequent recurrence in debate of the project of invading Canada. He said their cry was "Canada, Canada, Canada!" But the gentlemen of the opposition have not only borrowed them, but have almost robbed the majority of their notes—they have not been satisfied with this, but so much enamored of them are they, that they have parodied them, and cry in imitation, almost incessantly, "War, war, war!" Their reasons in opposition to war are so numerous, that in this particular they resemble the address of the mayor of an obscure town in France, which he proposed to deliver to the great Henry, as an apology for not firing cannon on the approach of the Monarch, who visited the town in one of his progresses through the Kingdom. He said they had eighty-nine reasons for not firing cannon; the first was, that they had none! The King besought him not to urge any more. The reasons of the gentlemen seem to be equally numerous, and they have one equally conclusive; they will not support the war! We may number, but how shall we describe the various characters of the reasons of the gentlemen? I know no way so ready as by an alteration of the words which the poet puts in the mouth of the bacchanal as an apology for taking his glass—

"A friend, a toast, or being dry,
Or lest we should be by and by,
Or any other reason why."

To the gentlemen themselves, who abound in fiction and fancy, the materials of poetry, I will leave the alteration.

Mr. PITKIN rejoined.

Mr. WIDGERY made a few remarks in favor of the bill; and the question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH the House resumed the consideration of a resolution moved by him a few days ago, calling on the President for a list of the names of persons holding offices under the Government of the United States. For consideration 80, against it 30.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE stated that the objection he had formerly entertained to this resolution had been done away by subsequent reflection. He had, however, an amendment to propose, the object of which was to procure information which he thought necessary, in order to dispel the ridiculous and false stories which had been circulated through the country of our armies being mainly officered by Frenchmen. He wished to ascertain the facts contemplated by the amendment, which would go to show, that where there was one of French nativity, there were twenty of English to counterbalance them. He, therefore, moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto words to this effect: "and that where the officer shall not have been born in this country, to state the fact, and the time at which he emigrated to this country."

Mr. RHEA opposed the amendment, because impracticable and unnecessary. He had no idea in time of war of publishing the names of our officers to the enemy, or he might have voted for the whole resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he had no objection to the amendment in principle, but could not consent to incorporate it in this resolution, because it would postpone the return by so long a time as it would require the Government to collect the information contemplated by it. He spoke in support of his resolution, and vindicated it from Mr. RHEA's objections, citing in support of his proposition the example of the British Government annually making an official publication of the names of their officers, &c. He was as anxious as any gentleman to ascertain what number of officers there were of foreign birth in the Government and even in this House.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE stated his object only to be, to be enabled officially to refute an infamous slander and falsehood circulated at the eve of recent elections in some of the States.

Mr. RHEA again spoke against the amendment, and cited the recent proclamation of the Prince Regent requiring foreigners to return home, and the conduct of British naval commanders, as reasons against exposing the English nativity of our citizens, &c.

Mr. DESHA then moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution and amendment indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke against the resolution and in favor of postponement. His objection appeared to be to the disclosure of the names of persons employed in secret service. We are surrounded by British emissaries, and he had no idea of being deprived of an opportunity of fighting the enemy on equal ground, without exposing the names of our agents.

The question on indefinite postponement was then taken and negatived—yeas 47, nays 60, as follows:

Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. BAKER were appointed a committee to present the resolution to the President of the United States.

THURSDAY, January 28.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Royal Converse. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

ARMING THE MILITIA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to "An act making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States, and for classing the same."

[This bill provides, in its first section, a further appropriation of $400,000 annually for arming the whole body of the militia of the United States, in addition to sums already in like manner permanently appropriated. The five next sections are mere detail on this head. The 6th section and the remainder of the bill provides for the classification of the militia of the United States, into three classes; the minor, to consist of those between eighteen and twenty-one years of age; the junior, of those between twenty-one and thirty-one; and the senior, of those between thirty-one and forty-five, &c.]

Mr. BURWELL moved to amend the bill by striking out the proviso of the 10th section, which authorizes substitutes, and supported his motion at some length. Mr. WRIGHT opposed and Mr. McKIM advocated the proposed amendment.

The question on the amendment was lost, without a division.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. WRIGHT spoke in support of the bill.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, he was opposed to the principle and details of this bill, as he had been uniformly before to all bills of similar import and character. The first section of the bill on your table proposes to make an annual appropriation of $400,000, in addition to the standing annual appropriation of $200,000, for the purpose of procuring arms, &c., for the militia; and provision is made in the subsequent sections for dividing the whole body of the militia into three classes, to be denominated the minor, junior, and senior classes. The residue of the bill is calculated to carry those principles into effect.

Mr. T. said he would agree with the chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) as to the fundamental principles on which he defended the bill, viz: that the great body of our citizens, who form the militia of our country, ought to be armed; but he differed from him as to the mode of accomplishing the object. The law of May 8, 1792, under the Administration of General Washington, first organized the militia of the United States, by establishing an uniform system throughout the United States. By this law every citizen between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, duly enrolled, was obliged to equip himself completely for the field, which arms were to be exempt from arrests, executions, &c. In obedience to this law, a considerable portion of the militia have armed and equipped themselves, and are at this day, in that respect, fit for any military duty. What is the argument for altering this law? Because another considerable portion of the militia have paid no attention to the law, and have wholly neglected or omitted to arm themselves, therefore it must be altered or repealed. If this be ground sufficient to alter the law, then shall we have a precedent sufficiently broad to alter any law.

But, say gentlemen, that class of our citizens who are enrolled in the militia, are those who are the laboring poor, and unable to arm and equip themselves. I inquire of you, Mr. Chairman, whether this can be the case under the fair construction of our militia law? Is the rich, or the middle class of society more exempt than the poor? Has not the rich man sons and apprentices to arm and accoutre for militia duty, as well as the man who moves in the humbler walks of life? If this law, which has been in operation more than twenty years, and to which our militia systems (especially in the Northern States) have now become assimilated, should now be repealed, I beg leave to ask, what pledge or assurance have we that any other law will share a better fate?

But, sir, although I can never consent to punish those who fulfil the requisitions of a law, while, at the same time, we indirectly reward those who break it, or fail to comply with its provisions, if the fact can be ascertained that the militia really desire this interference of the Legislature to provide them with arms, I will even consent to draw upon the Treasury for this object. But here I take the liberty to remark, that the appropriation contained in the first section of this bill ought not to be made at this time for the following reason: On the 23d of April, 1808, a law was enacted, purporting to be "an act making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States," by which it was declared that the annual sum of two hundred thousand dollars should be appropriated for the purpose of providing arms, &c., for the militia of the United States, either by purchase or manufacture. The President was also authorized to erect additional arsenals and manufactories, for the aforesaid purpose, as he might deem expedient. This law has been in operation nearly five years, and of course about one million of dollars has accrued to the fund for arming the militia. I beg gentlemen to give me their attention for a few moments while I analyze the report of the Secretary of War, laid on our tables on the 24th of December, at the call of this House. By this return we learn that the Secretary of War had drawn from the Treasury the sum of $483,000, of which he had paid over to contractors $99,792, leaving a balance unaccounted for of $383,208. While the bill now under discussion laid on our tables, this return was called for, and after I saw how far the purchases of arms had fallen short of the money appropriated, I called on the Secretary of War, in company with my honorable friend who sits near me, (Mr. REEP,) and inquired why the whole appropriation had not been expended in the purchase of arms? To which he replied, that the money could not be usefully expended in the United States for the objects contemplated by the law. He assured me that it was a very difficult thing to procure muskets of a good quality in quantities sufficient to absorb that appropriation, and, of course, that a further appropriation would be entirely useless.

After this I called on the Secretary of the Treasury, who gave me the specific sums which had been paid to the Secretary of War on the aforesaid annual appropriation of $200,000, which amounted to $500,000, making a difference in the two statements of $17,000 against the Secretary of War. The Secretary of the Treasury further informed me, that, according to a standing law, there had been passed over to the credit of the sinking fund $100,000 of the aforesaid annual appropriation, because it had not been drawn for within the time limited by law; which proves most incontestably one of two things, either that the Executive Department has been guilty of gross neglect in the non-execution of the law of April, 1808, or else that the money could not be judiciously expended. At all events, the fact stands confessed before the House, that even allowing that $500,000 have been expended in the execution of the law of April, 1808, there are now four hundred thousand dollars on hand—$100,000 being lost to this fund as before stated—ready to be expended in the purchase of arms. I inquire, then, in the present state of the Treasury, when loans are authorized to a great extent, unlimited as to rate of interest or price of stocks, whether it can be prudent to make the appropriation contemplated by the first section of this bill? I presume not.

JANUARY, 1813.

Arming the Militia.

But gentlemen say, as there was no appropriation in the law of 1808 to enable the President to establish new factories, he was unable to enlarge the manufacture of arms.

To this I reply, that if the President had discovered this defect in the law, it might reasonably have been supposed that he would have laid the same before Congress. But the fact is, it was not contemplated to arm the militia from the factories of the United States. These were the places where the troops of the United States were to be supplied, and it was expected that the purchases of arms for the militia would have been on contracts with citizens; and, accordingly, you find that, in this way, the Secretary of War reports contracts to have been made. The great difficulty lies in the want of artists, who shall be capable of doing the business in a workmanlike manner. An officer who lately went to one of our public armories (Springfield) to select some muskets for service, reported, on his return, that out of fifty or sixty thousand stands, principally made under the economical direction of General Dearborn, he could not select one thousand fit for use. If this be the case with arms that had been inspected, how can it be supposed that private factories can do much better? If fifteen or twenty thousand stand of arms can be manufactured yearly for the use of the militia, beyond what the public factories can deliver for the use of the troops and arsenals of the United States, I believe it will be as much as may be expected, and the appropriation under the law of 1808 will be adequate for this purpose.

While I am upon this part of the subject, I take occasion further to remark, that, by the third section of the aforesaid law, it was made the bounden duty of the Executive to distribute the arms, &c., purchased or manufactured by virtue of that law, to the several States and Territories composing this Union, in proportion to their effective militia, and for their use. The report of the Secretary of War, on that subject, now lying before me, informs us how this has been done. It is almost five years since that law was enacted, and yet many of the States have not received a single stand of arms procured under that law. Can gentlemen from the South and West expect us to aid them in passing these large annual appropriations, when we receive no part of the benefits designated by the law?

A recurrence to the report will show where the arms have gone. I say, then, that the first section of this bill is worse than useless—

1. Because it purports to be something, when it really is good for nothing.

2. Because the fund under the law of April, 1808, is now more than can be judiciously expended—and

3. Because I am unwilling to borrow money at an extravagant rate of interest, to fill appropriations not absolutely necessary.

It was my intention, when I rose, to have remarked only on the first section of this bill, which relates to the annual appropriation; but, since I am up, I will make a few remarks on the other sections of the bill, which relate to classing the militia. I observe, then, that this principle in the bill, is in my judgment radically wrong, inas much as it is founded on the detestable doctrine that the militia of our country are to be considered as the army of the United States. I cannot too fully impress the sentiment upon this House and upon the nation, that the militia of this country, in a strictly military sense, are the armies of the several States, and should never be under the control of the General Government, only when the exigencies provided for by the Constitution exist. Every new principle, therefore, which is introduced into the militia code, should be examined with a jealous eye. I inquire then, for what purpose this system of forming all the militia into three classes is introduced? The answer is at hand; it is to form them into a more disposable force for the purposes of the General Government; and although the term conscription is odious to every American, and quite offensive to the friends of this bill, still I do say, that this principle of classing the militia partakes of that practice in a degree; and is rendered obnoxious on that account. Is this new system called for by the States? whose troops, I again assert, are to be affected by it. I answer, no. Are those States solicitous for this innovation, who have formed and disciplined their militia in conformity to the law of 1792? Most assuredly not. It must then be a proposition made in behalf of those who have never regarded our militia regulations, to affect those who have complied with the law, and are satisfied with its provisions. I cannot but consider the request as unreasonable in its nature, and dangerous in its consequences, and hope the House will not adopt it.

I will not enlarge on this point, but do now move that the first section be stricken from the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS replied to Mr. TALLMADGE, and opposed the motion to strike out the first section.

Mr. STOW followed in support of the bill, and in reply to Mr. TALLMADGE.

Mr. ELY.—I am decidedly friendly to the arming the militia, but I have been of opinion, that it ought to be done as it has been done from the first settlement of our country—the course has always been to require every militiaman to be armed, and be the proprietor of his arms. But Congress have adopted another course. Now the question is, how can the arms be procured? Not any more speedily by the appropriation in the present bill. We have already appropriations to a great amount, five or six hundred thousand dollars unexpended, and it is useless to make at present further appropriations. When the act of 1808 was passed, making the appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars annually, I was of opinion, and then contended, that even that measure would not materially promote the manufacture of arms in the United States, and I submit to this Committee that our experience has shown that I was correct. The reason is, that the regular appropriation for arms and armories is as much money, or very nearly as much, as can be profitably expended on the manufactures of that article in our country.

H. OF R.

Arming the Militia.

The Chairman of the Military Committee (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS) seems to suppose that the failure of the War Department to apply this annual fund for the purposes intended, is owing to neglect, or to a reluctance in the department to procure those arms for the militia. I am by no means satisfied that any such idea is correct. There are but two ways in which arms can be obtained, by private contract—none can be imported in the present state of the world. When the United States commenced the manufacture of arms, which was under a law passed in 1794, the President located three armories, one in Massachusetts, one in Virginia, and one in South Carolina; two of these soon commenced their operations. These establishments have been gradually progressing in their art, and extending their machinery and their works, as skilful artificers became instructed in the business, or could be obtained, until they produce annually, from twenty to twenty-five thousand stand of arms, and still we find, frequently, suggestions from gentlemen, that the arms manufactured in these establishments, with all these advantages, are imperfect and unsafe, not fit to put into the hands of a soldier. This may be true of those produced in the infancy of the establishments, but I am not sensible that it is the case to any considerable extent. I believe the arms manufactured in the armories have been, by far the greater part of them, good and safe. But it must be acknowledged, that in these institutions, there have been some very unfortunate mistakes. Under the administration of the former Secretary, General Dearborn, there were manufactured in one of them, near 15,000 muskets, with the bayonets soldered to the barrels. These arms, believed to be good in other respects, are considered, in their present form, to be good for nothing, and lie useless. Still it is believed that many of them might, by a new bayonet affixed to the barrel, in the common form, be made good muskets. The great difficulty with these fixed bayonets is, that they are put on with solder that has not strength, they are easily broken off and lost. But why has not the Department gone on with their armory in South Carolina? To me the reason is obvious; it is because artificers of competent skill could not be found, unless, indeed, you call them from the other establishments already in operation, where they are more useful than they could be when removed. In the commencement of almost every manufactory by a private individual, or by a State, inducements have been offered to the men employed in the public armories, to leave them and go to a different rank, and better pay, in these minor establishments. This was a fact which fell under my immediate notice in the commencement of the State's armory at Richmond. The difficulty has been, that skilful artificers in this branch of business have been, and are still scarce, and to this is to be imputed the tardy progress in this manufacture, as well as the insufficiency of the arms produced.

But the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee seems to suppose, that contracts for arms might have been made to any extent, and these safe for the Government, as the persons making them, would be under bonds. I do not think so. It has been found in the experience of the Department, that many of the arms procured by contract, formerly, were very poor, and such as ought not to have been received; that those now contracted for will be, I know not. But what is the course pursued by the War Department at present? They advertise that they are authorized to contract for arms, and are ready to receive proposals, and yet a mere pittance of your annual appropriation is expended. Do you wish your Secretary to make contracts, unless he has good reason to believe that the persons who offer, are competent, and can fulfil them? I trust not; the United States have already suffered enough by this procedure. I have been informed, by the late Secretary of War, that contracts were made by his predecessor, with persons at or near Lancaster, in Pennsylvania, for rifles, where the manufacture in that branch is considered more perfect than in any other part of the Union. That on these contracts, near two thousand rifles were inspected, received and paid for, and this by inspectors highly recommended; that on complaint being made, he ordered a re-inspection by a skilful artist, in that branch of business, by whose report, which I saw, not one rifle of the whole number was found to be fit for use, or good for anything. Would the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee wish the public money to be expended in this way? I presume not. I say that, for all safe contracts that can be made, the former appropriations are sufficient—I am therefore for striking the appropriation from the bill.

After considerable discussion between Messrs. WILLIAMS, and WRIGHT, in favor of the bill, and Mr. TALLMADGE against it, the question on Mr. TALLMADGE's motion to strike out the first section was taken and lost.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill to the House without amendment.

vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Robert Le Roy Livingston, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit certain fines, penalties, and forfeitures, therein mentioned; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. HEMPSTEAD, from the committee to whom were referred the petition of Daniel Boone, and the resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky in his behalf, made a report; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to revive and continue in force 'An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, passed the twelfth day of December, 1804, establishing the fees of the harbor-master and health officer of the ports of Savannah, and St. Mary's,'" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Royal Converse was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "to revive and continue in force 'An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, passed the twelfth day of December, 1804, establishing the fees of the harbor-master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's, was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. POINDEXTER reported a bill authorizing the appointment of additional officers (a marshal and attorney) in the several Territories of the United States, which was twice read and committed.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making remuneration to the officers and crew of the Constitution frigate for the capture and necessary destruction of the British frigate Guerriere.

The sum to be appropriated was fixed, on motion of Mr. BASSETT, at $50,000.

The Committee then reported the bill, and the House having agreed to the appropriation, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the Bible Society of Philadelphia, went through a Committee of the Whole, was ordered to a third reading, 48 to 26, and forthwith read a third time and passed.

TERRITORY OF MISSOURI.

Mr. McKEE, from the select committee which was directed to inquire into the propriety of amending the act for the government of the Missouri Territory, reported against any amendment. The report is as follows:

That they have had the subject to them referred under their consideration, and have examined the act above recited. The principal difficulty suggested to the committee, occurring in the execution of the law, appears to relate to the election of a delegate to represent the interest of the Territory in the Congress of the United States. By the first clause of the 6th section of the act it is provided "that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members elected every second year, by the people of the said Territory, to serve for two years. By the 13th section of the said act it is also provided "that the citizens of the said Territory entitled to vote for Representatives to the General Assembly thereof, shall, at the time of electing their Representatives to the said General Assembly, also elect one delegate from the said Territory to the Congress of the United States. It also appears that an election was held in pursuance of the act on the second Monday of November last, when a delegate was elected. It appears that doubts have been entertained whether the delegate thus elected can legally hold his seat after the 3d day of March next, and an alteration in the law has been suggested as necessary to obviate the difficulty. It seems to the committee that the first clause of the 6th section, and the 13th section of the act, taken together, leaves no room for doubt, but evidently fixes the period for which the delegate may hold his seat at two years from the second Monday of November last; and it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the delegate elected in pursuance of the law, and for the term of two years, cannot be deprived of his right to a seat by any subsequent law.

It also appears to the committee that the Territorial Legislature are furnished, by the 7th section of the act, with competent power to change the time of holding elections so as to obviate any difficulty that may occur in the subsequent elections of a delegate.

The Committee, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the act entitled "An act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri," requires no amendment.

By Benjamin Howard, Governor of the Territory of Louisiana, Commander-in-Chief of the Militia thereof, and Superintendent of Indian Affairs, in and over the same:

A PROCLAMATION.

In discharge of those duties enjoined on the Governor of this Territory by an act of the Congress of the United States of America, approved the 4th of June, 1812, entitled "An act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri," I have made the following arrangements, preparatory to the new organization of Government to be instituted by the said act, and which will commence its operation on the first Monday in December next: that is to say:

I have divided the future Territory of Missouri into five counties, excluding from the civil jurisdiction of each of said counties any tract or tracts of country which may fall within their respective general limits, as hereinafter set forth, the Indian title to which may not have been extinguished.

That portion of territory situated north of the Missouri river, and usually known by the name of the Forks, as lying between that river and the river Mississippi, shall compose one county, and be called the county of St. Charles.

That portion of territory bounded by the Missouri river on the north; by the Mississippi on the east; on the south by the Platin creek, from its mouth to its source; thence by a west line to the Missouri river, or to the western boundary of the Osage purchase; and on the west, by the said western boundary of the Osage purchase, shall compose one other county, and be called the county of St. Louis.

That portion of territory bounded by the county of St. Louis on the north; on the east by the Mississippi; on the south by Apple creek, from its mouth to its source; thence by a due west line to the western boundary of the Osage purchase; and on the west, by the said western boundary of the Osage purchase, shall compose one other county, and be called the county of St. Genevieve.

That portion of territory bounded on the north by the south limit of the county of St. Genevieve; east by the Mississippi; west by the western boundary of the Osage purchase; and south by that line which formerly separated the commanders of Cape Girardeau and New Madrid, and known more recently as the boundary between those two districts, shall compose one other county, and be called the county of Cape Girardeau.

That portion of territory bounded north by the south limit of the county of Cape Girardeau; east by the Mississippi; south by the 33d degree of north latitude, (the southern boundary of this Territory as settled by act of Congress;) west by the western boundary of the Osage purchase; and from the southern extremity thereof to the 33d degree of north latitude aforesaid, shall compose one other county, and be called the county of New Madrid.

And I do hereby make known and declare that elections of Representatives, to serve in the General Assembly of the future Territory of Missouri, shall be holden throughout the Territory, on the second Monday of November next, at the respective seats of justice of the present districts, which are hereby declared to be the seats of justice for the several future counties respectively, except that the town of New Madrid shall be the seat of justice of the future county of New Madrid, which said future county will comprehend the present districts of New Madrid and Arkansas; to wit: at the town of St. Charles for the future county of St. Charles, at which time and place there will be chosen for the said county two Representatives. At the town of St. Louis for the future county of St. Louis, at which time and place there will be chosen four Representatives. At the town of St. Genevieve for the future county of St. Genevieve, at which time and place there will be chosen for the said county three Representatives. At the town of Cape Girardeau for the future county of Cape Girardeau, at which time and place there will be chosen for the said county two Representatives. And at the town of New Madrid, for the future county of New Madrid, at which time and place there will be chosen for the said county two Representatives.

And I do, moreover, make known and declare that, on the said second Monday of November next, an election will also be holden, at the several seats of justice aforesaid, for a Territorial delegate to the Congress of the United States. And I do enjoin and require that these elections be holden by the sheriffs of the present districts, or in their absence, or inability to act, by the coroners respectively; that the said sheriffs or coroners shall take the polls of those qualified to vote; that the clerks of the courts of the present districts, or their deputies, shall respectively write down the names of the voters in a fair and legible manner, and that the presiding judges of the courts of the present districts respectively, or in case of absence, or inability to act, the next in commission shall attend, and be judges of the qualification of the voters; that the said elections shall be opened at the respective seats of justice aforesaid, at or before 9 o'clock in the morning of the said second Monday of November, and close at sunset of that day.

And the sheriffs or coroners respectively, after having caused the proces-verbal of said polls to be signed by the clerks or their deputies, who may have respectively committed the same to writing, and countersigned by the judges respectively who may have attended the elections, will themselves certify the same, explicitly stating, at large, the names of the persons elected as Representatives, and the name of the person having the greatest number of votes as a delegate to Congress, and make immediate return thereof to the Governor of the Territory.

And I do, lastly, enjoin and require, that the Representatives of the several future counties, so as aforesaid to be elected, do convene in the town of St. Louis on the first Monday in December next, as provided by the act of Congress aforesaid.

In testimony, whereof, I have caused the seal of the Territory of Louisiana to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the town of St. Louis, the first day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twelve, and of the independence of the United States of America the thirty-seventh.

BENJAMIN A. HOWARD.

For the information of the people who are called on to decide the right of suffrage by the Governor's proclamation, we have inserted below that part of the law which defines the qualification as well of the Representative as of the voter.

"No person shall be eligible or qualified to be a Representative, who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-one years, and who shall not have resided in the Territory one year next preceding the day of election, and who shall not be a freeholder within the county in which he may be elected; and no person holding an office under the United States, or an office of profit under the Territory, shall be a Representative. In case of vacancy, by death, resignation, or removal or otherwise of a Representative, the Governor shall issue a writ to the county wherever a vacancy may be as aforesaid, to elect another person to serve the residue of the term. That all free white male citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, who have resided in said Territory twelve months next preceding an election, and who shall have paid a territorial or county tax, assessed at least six months previous thereto, shall be entitled to vote for Representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory."

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message of the 4th day of November last, as relates to our Foreign Affairs, report:

That in presenting to the House at this time a view of our relations with Great Britain, it is deemed unnecessary to recite the causes which produced the war. The wrongs which the United States had received from that Power, for a long series of years, had already been laid before the public, and need not again be enumerated; they were too deeply felt to have been forgotten, although they may be forgiven by the American people. The United States having engaged in the war for the sole purpose of vindicating their rights and honor, that motive alone should animate them to its close. It becomes a free and virtuous people to give an useful example to the world. It is the duty of a representative Government to render a faithful account of its conduct to its constituents. A just sensibility to great and unprovoked wrongs and indignities will justify an appeal to arms; an honorable reparation should restore the blessings of peace; every step which they take should be guided by a sacred regard to principle.

To form a correct estimate of the duties which the United States have to perform, it is necessary to take a view of the communications which have passed between the Executive of the United States and the British Government since the declaration of war. Such a view, the committee is persuaded, will show distinctly the existing ground of controversy between the two nations, and the indispensable obligation on the United States to maintain it.

Your committee has seen with much satisfaction, that, at the moment of the declaration of war, the attention of the Executive was engaged in an effort to bring it to a speedy and honorable termination. As early as the twenty-sixth of June last, the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at London was instructed to propose to the British Government an armistice, to take immediate effect, on conditions which it is believed the impartial world will consider safe, honorable, and advantageous to Great Britain. They were few in number, and limited to positive wrongs daily practised. That the Orders in Council should be repealed, and that our flag should protect our seamen, were the only indispensable conditions insisted on. Other wrongs, however great, were postponed for amicable negotiation. As an inducement to the British Government to forbear these wrongs, it was proposed to repeal the non-importation law, and to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the public and private vessels of the United States; particular care was taken that these propositions should be made in a form as conciliatory as they were amicable in substance.

Your committee cannot avoid expressing its astonishment at the manner in which they were received. It was not sufficient to reject the proposed armistice; terms of peculiar reproach and insult were adopted to make the rejection offensive.

It happened, that almost on the same day in which the United States, after having been worn out with accumulated wrongs, had resorted to the last and only remaining honorable alternative in support of their rights, the British Government had repealed, conditionally, its Orders in Council. That measure was unexpected, because every application for it had failed, although repeated to the very moment it was decided on. Conditional as the repeal was, it was admitted to have removed a great obstacle to accommodation.

The other only remained: the practice of impressment. It was proposed to the British Government to open an amicable negotiation to provide a substitute to it, which should be considered an ample equivalent. The substitute proposed was defined, and of a character so comprehensive as to have removed, as was presumed, every possible objection to an accommodation. The proposition before made to exclude British seamen from our service was enlarged, so as to comprehend all native British subjects not already naturalized, or entitled to naturalization, under the laws of the United States; this was likewise rejected.

Your committee have sought with anxiety some proof of a disposition in the British Government to accommodate on any fair condition the important difference between the two nations relative to impressment, but they have sought in vain; none is to be found either in the communications of the British Minister to the American Chargé d'Affaires at London, or in those of the Commander of the British naval forces at Halifax made by order of his Government to the Department of State. They have seen with regret, that although Lord Castlereagh professed a willingness in his Government to receive and discuss amicably any proposition having in view either to check abuse in the practice of impressment, or to provide a substitute to it, he not only declined entering into a negotiation for the purpose, but discountenanced the expectation that any substitute could be proposed which his Government would accept. It merits notice, also, though it ceased to be a cause of surprise that, in the communication of Admiral Warren to the Department of State, the subject of impressment was not even alluded to.

Had the Executive consented to an armistice on the repeal of the Orders in Council, without a satisfactory provision against impressment, or a clear and distinct understanding with the British Government to that effect, in some mode entitled to confidence, your committee would not have hesitated to disapprove it.

The impressment of our seamen being deservedly considered a principal cause of the war, the war ought to be prosecuted until that cause was removed. To appeal to arms in defence of a right, and to lay them down without securing it, or a satisfactory evidence of a good disposition in the opposite party to secure it, would be considered in no other light than a relinquishment of it. To attempt to negotiate afterwards for the security of such right, in the expectation that any of the arguments which have been urged before the declaration of war and been rejected, would have more weight, after that experiment had been made in vain, would be an act of folly which would not fail to expose us to the scorn and derision of the British nation, and of the world.

On a full view, therefore, of the conduct of the Executive in its transactions with the British Government since the declaration of war, the committee consider it their duty to express their entire approbation of it. They perceive in it a firm resolution to support the rights and honor of their country, with a sincere and commendable disposition to promote peace, on such just and honorable conditions as the United States may with safety accept.

It remains, therefore, for the United States to take their final attitude with Great Britain, and to maintain it with consistency, and with unshaken firmness and constancy.

The manner in which the friendly advances and liberal propositions of the Executive have been received by the British Government has, in a great measure, extinguished the hope of amicable accommodation. It is, however, possible that the British Government, after instructing Admiral Warren to communicate to the Department of State the repeal of the Orders in Council, may have declined the arrangement proposed by Mr. Russell, in the expectation that that measure would have been satisfactory to the United States. Be this as it may, your committee consider it the duty of this House to explain to its constituents the remaining cause of controversy, the precise nature of that cause, and the high obligation which it imposes.

H. OF R.

Foreign Relations.

JANUARY, 1813.

From what has been stated, it appears that however great the sensibility to other wrongs, the impressment of our seamen was that alone which prevented an armistice, and in all probability an accommodation. Had that great interest been arranged in a satisfactory manner, the President was willing to rely on the intrinsic justice of other claims, and the amicable spirit in which the negotiation would have been entered into, for satisfaction in their favor. Great Britain claims a right to impress her own seamen, and to exercise it in American vessels. In the practice British cruisers impress American citizens, and from the nature of things, it is impossible that that abuse should not be carried to a great extent. A subaltern or any other officer of the British navy ought not to be the arbiter in such a case. The liberty and lives of American citizens ought not to depend on the will of such a party.

The British Government has insisted that every American citizen should carry with him the evidence of his citizenship, and that all those not possessed of it might be impressed. This criterion, if not otherwise objectionable, would be so, as the document might be lost, destroyed, or taken from the party to whom it was granted, nor might it in all cases be entitled to respect, as it might be counterfeited, transferred, or granted to improper persons. But this rule is liable to other and much stronger objections. On what principle does the British Government claim of the United States so great and shameful a degradation? Ought the free citizens of an independent Power to carry with them on the main ocean, and in their own vessels, the evidence of their freedom? And are all to be considered British subjects, and liable to impressment, who do not bear with them the badge? Is it not more consistent with every idea both of public as well as of private right, that the party setting up a claim to any interest, whether it be to persons or property, should prove his right? What would be the conduct of Great Britain under similar circumstances? Would she permit the public ship of any other Power, disregarding the rights of their flag, to enter on board her merchant vessels, take from them such part of their crews as the boarding-officer thought fit, often her own subjects, exposing by means thereof their vessels to destruction? Would she suffer such an usurpation to derive any sanction from her patient forbearance?

With the British claim to impress British seamen, the United States have no right to interfere, provided it be in British vessels, or in any other than those of the United States. That American citizens should be exempted from its operation, is all that they demand. Experience has shown that this cannot be secured otherwise than by the vessels in which they sail. Take from American citizens this barrier, which ought to be held sacred, and there is nothing to protect them against the rapacious grasp of the British navy. This, then, is the extent of the demand of the United States, a demand so just in itself, so consistent and inseparable from their rights as an independent nation, that it has been a cause of astonishment that it should ever have been called in question. The foundation of the British claim is, that British seamen find employment in the service of the United States; this is represented as an evil affecting essentially the great interests of the British nation. This complaint would have more weight if sanctioned by the British example. It is known on the contrary that it is in direct repugnance to it. Great Britain does not scruple to receive into her service all who enter it voluntarily. If she confined herself within that limit, the present controversy would not exist. Heretofore the subjects of even the most despotic Powers have been left at liberty to pursue their own happiness by honest industry, wherever their inclination led them. The British Government refuses to its seamen that privilege. Let not this, then, be a ground of controversy with that nation. Let it be distinctly understood, that in case an arrangement should be made between the two nations, whereby each should exclude from its service the citizens and subjects of the other, on the principles and conditions above stated, that this House will be prepared, so far as depends on it, to give it effect, and for that purpose to enact laws, with such regulations and penalties as will be adequate. With this pledge, it is not perceived on what ground the British Government can persist in its claim. If British seamen are excluded from the service of the United States, as may be effectually done, the foundation of the claim must cease. When it is known that not one British seaman could be found on board American vessels, it would be absurd to urge that fact as a motive for such impressment.

In declaring a willingness to give effect to the proposed arrangement, your committee consider it equally the duty of the House to declare, in terms the most decisive, that should the British Government still decline it, and persevere in the practice of impressment from American vessels, the United States will never acquiesce in that practice, but will resist it unceasingly with all their force. It is not necessary now to inquire what the course would have been with respect to impressment, in case the Orders in Council had been repealed before the declaration of war—or how long the practice of impressment would have been borne, in the hope that that repeal would have been followed by a satisfactory arrangement with respect to impressment.

War having been declared, and the case of impressment being necessarily included as one of the most important causes, it is evident that it must be provided for in the pacification. The omission of it in a treaty of peace, would not leave it on its former ground; it would in effect be an absolute relinquishment, an idea at which the feelings of every American must revolt. The seamen of the United States have a claim on their country for protection, and they must be protected. If a single ship is taken at sea, and the property of an American citizen arrested from him unjustly, it rouses the indignation of the country. How much more deeply then ought we to be excited, when we behold so many of this gallant and highly meritorious class of our fellow-citizens snatched from the bosoms of their families and of their country, and carried into a cruel and afflicting bondage! It is an evil which ought not, which cannot be long tolerated. Without dwelling on the sufferings of the victims, or on that wide scene of distress which it spreads among their relatives through the country, the practice is in itself in the highest degree degrading to the United States as a nation. It is incompatible with their sovereignty—it is subversive of the main pillars of their independence. The forbearance of the United States under it has been mistaken for pusillanimity.

The British pretension was maturing fast into a right. Had resistance been longer delayed, it might have become one. Every Administration remonstrated against it, in a tone which bespoke the growing indignation of the country. Their remonstrances produced no effect. It was worthy the illustrious leader of our armies, when called by the voice of his country to the head of the Government, to pause, rather than recommend to his fellow-citizens a new war, before they had recovered from the calamities of the late one. It was worthy his immediate successors to follow his example. In peace, our free system of Government would gain strength, and our happy Union become consolidated. But at the last session, the period had arrived when forbearance could be no longer justified. It was the duty of Congress to take up this subject in connexion with the other great wrongs of which they complained, and to seek redress in the only mode which became the Representatives of a free people. They have done so by appealing to arms, and that appeal will be supported by their constituents.

Foreign Relations.

Your committee are aware that an interesting crisis has arrived in the United States, but they have no painful apprehension of its consequences. The course before them is direct. It is pointed out equally by a regard to the honor, the rights, and the interests of the nation. If we pursue it with firmness and vigor, relying on the aid of Heaven, our success is inevitable. Our resources are abundant; the people are brave and virtuous, and their spirit unbroken. The gallantry of our infant Navy bespeaks our growing greatness on that element, and that of our troops when led to action inspires full confidence of what may be expected from them when their organization is complete. Our Union is always most strong when menaced by foreign danger. The people of America are never so much one family as when their liberties are invaded.

The report concludes by recommending the passage of the following bill:

A bill for the regulation of the seamen on board the public vessels and in the merchant service of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the termination by a treaty of peace of the war in which the United States are now engaged with Great Britain, it shall not be lawful to employ as seamen or otherwise, on board of any public vessel of the United States, or of any vessel owned by citizens of the United States, or sailing under their flag, any person or persons, except natural born citizens of the United States, or citizens of the United States at the time of such treaty being made and concluded, or persons who, being resident within the United States at the time of such treaty, and having previously declared, agreeably to existing laws, their intention to become citizens of the United States, shall be admitted as such within five years thereafter, in the manner prescribed by law.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the time as aforesaid, when this act shall take effect, it shall not be lawful to employ as seamen or otherwise, as aforesaid, except as is by this act excepted, any person or persons not natural born citizens of the United States, unless such person or persons shall produce to the commander of the public vessel, or to the collector of the customs of the district to which the private vessel belongs, the certificate of his or their having been naturalized. The President of the United States is hereby authorized, from time to time, to make such other regulations, and to give such other directions to the several commanders of public vessels, and to the several collectors, as may be proper and necessary respecting the requisite proofs of nativity or citizenship to be exhibited to the commander or collectors aforesaid. And no person shall be admitted or employed as seamen or otherwise, as aforesaid, on board of any vessel owned by citizens of the United States, or sailing under their flag, unless his name shall have been entered in a list of the crew approved and certified by the collector for the district to which the vessel belongs.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the time as aforesaid, when this act shall take effect, no seamen or other seafaring man not being a citizen of the United States, shall be admitted or received as a passenger on board any public vessel of the United States, or of any private vessel owned by citizens of the United States, or sailing under their flag, without a passport from the proper officers of the country of which such seaman or seafaring man may be subject or citizen.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the time as aforesaid, when this act shall take effect, the consuls or commercial agents of any nation at peace with the United States shall be admitted, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President of the United States, to state their objections to the proper commander or collector as aforesaid, against the employment of any seaman or seafaring man on board of any public or private vessel of the United States, on account of his being a native subject or citizen of such nation, and not embraced within the description of persons who may thus be lawfully employed, according to the provisions of this act; and the said consuls or commercial agents shall also be admitted under the said regulations, to be present at the time when the proofs of the nativity or citizenship of the persons against whom such objections may have been made, shall be investigated by such commander or collector.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, if any commander of a public vessel of the United States shall employ or permit to be employed, or shall admit or receive, or permit to be admitted or received on board his vessel, any person whose employment or admission is prohibited by the provisions of this act, he shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars for each person thus unlawfully employed, or admitted on board such vessel.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, if any person shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, be employed as a seaman or otherwise, or be received as a passenger on board of any vessel owned by citizens of the United States, or sailing under their flag, the master or commander, and the owner or owners of such vessel, shall each, respectively, forfeit and pay five hundred dollars for each person thus unlawfully employed in any one voyage; which sum or sums shall be recovered, even although such seaman or person might have been admitted and entered in the certified list of the crew aforesaid, by the collector for the district to which the vessel may belong; and all penalties and forfeitures arising under or incurred by virtue of this act, may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, with costs of suits, by action of debt, in the name of the United States, or by indictment or information in any court having competent jurisdiction to try the same, and shall accrue and be one moiety thereof to the use of the informer, and the other moiety thereof to the use of the United States, except where the prosecution shall be first instituted on behalf of the United States, in which case the whole shall be to their use; and may be examined, mitigated, or remitted in like manner, and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrictions, as are prescribed, authorized, and directed by the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," passed the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and made perpetual by an act passed the eleventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to forbid any commander or master of a public or private vessel of the United States, whilst in a foreign port or place, from supplying any deficiency of seamen on board such vessel by employing subjects of such foreign country, with the permission of the Government thereof.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall have no effect or operation with respect to the employment, as seamen, of the subjects or citizens of any foreign nation, which shall not have forbidden on board her public and private vessels the employment, as seamen or otherwise, of native citizens of the United States; or who shall permit the commanders of her public vessels to impress or take away from on board any vessel, sailing under the flag of the United States, any seaman or any other person, not being a soldier, or otherwise, in the employment of an enemy of such nation.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent any arrangement between the United States and any foreign nation, which may take place under any treaty or convention, made and ratified in the manner prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and by which the reciprocal employment, as seamen, of citizens or subjects of the two countries, may, in the instances and manner provided by such treaty or convention, be permitted.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That no person, who shall arrive in the United States, from and after the time when this act shall take effect, shall be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, who shall not, for the continued term of five years next preceding his admission as aforesaid, have resided within the United States, without being, at any time, during the said five years, out of the territory of the said States.

The bill was twice read and referred.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that the bill be made the order of the day for Monday.

Mr. SEYBERT said, the time mentioned by the gentleman from Tennessee was too short to allow members, who, for the first time, at this moment were allowed a knowledge of the provisions of the bill—the principle seemed one of too much importance to be hastily acted on. It concerns, said he, not only this nation, but all civilized mankind. The principles of the report of this day were so much at war with those reported by the same committee at the last session, that it was impossible for him to reconcile them—time was necessary to understand this subject. Mr. S. said, this was the first report we have received from the Committee on Foreign Relations during the present session. They probably were maturing their schemes for more than two months. Is it fair to expect that the members of this House could be prepared to act on them definitively in the course of two days? He doubted the constitutionality of the measure; to him it seemed the very error of the moon. He must again and again consult his pillow, before he could be brought to vote in favor of the passage of the bill. Perhaps he might consider it a duty to offer some remarks, whether or not. Wednesday was a short time to ask of the House. He moved to consider it on that day.

Mr. GRUNDY said it was not his intention at this time to defend the bill, or to make any observations in reply to the remarks and insinuations thrown out against the committee, of which he had the honor to be one. When the subject should come before the House, he would put himself on this House and the country for the correctness of that report and of the bill. Whatever others might say, he would support a measure which he believed essential to the interests of the country. He wished the gentleman had reflected a little before he ventured, without knowing anything at all of the subject, to denounce the bill reported by the committee. On this subject, Mr. G. said, he felt no disposition to accommodate gentlemen who, without having examined, were prepared to condemn the bill. The committee which reported the bill, he assured the gentleman and the House, were not to be intimidated from supporting it; they were willing to stake themselves on the consequences which would grow out of the bill. Mr. G. concluded by expressing his anxiety that this bill, on which he conceived so much to depend, should come before the House at an early day.

Mr. SEYBERT in reply said, he was willing to give the necessary despatch; he was not unreasonable in his request; the printing cannot be done in time. As to his understanding the subject, the gentlemen from Tennessee was out of place in his remarks; he said when he was up before, that he did not understand how to reconcile the present report with that of the last session; he feared he saw too plainly the tendency of the measure now proposed, and he concluded by persisting in his motion.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke warmly in favor of a postponement of the question to Wednesday. He wished, as the committee had taken since the 4th of November, to make up their report, they would at least give the House three days to consider.

Mr. GRUNDY having withdrawn his opposition to the postponement of the bill to Wednesday, it was made the order of the day for that day.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved to refer the report to the same committee, that, being a statement on which the bill was predicated, it might proceed pari passu with the bill, and receive a like examination.

Mr. GRUNDY moved that it lie on the table, as it merely embraced the reasoning of the committee which had led to the conclusions they had reported.

PLASTER OF PARIS.

Mr. KENT offered for consideration the following resolution; observing, that as it merely proposed an inquiry, he did not expect it would meet with any objection:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of remitting the penalties of the non-importation law, in favor of all importations of plaster of Paris, which may be made, whether in neutral or American vessels.

Mr. BAKER spoke in favor of the resolution at considerable length.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE, Mr. RHEA, and Mr. McKIM, opposed the resolution, as aiming a blow at the non-importation act, which they were disposed religiously to enforce.

Mr. KENT defended his proposition, as merely for an inquiry on a subject very interesting to the agricultural interest in some parts of the country.

The resolution was eventually rejected. For the motion 51, against it 56, as follows:

ARMING AND CLASSING THE MILITIA.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act for arming the militia, and for classing the same.

Mr. FITCH moved to strike out all that part of the bill which provides for the classing the militia of the United States.

Mr. ELY said that he was totally opposed to the classification of the militia; that it had been pressed upon us from year to year, by gentlemen from the Southern section of the Union, he knew not why; that he thought the effects of the measure in rendering the militia efficient, for Constitutional purposes, were very trifling and unimportant. From some cause or other, the militia in the Southern States are very little improved, and gentlemen seemed to imagine that classification was to supply the place of arms, of organization, of discipline, of everything. This would not prove to be the case. He said that the laws heretofore made had proved in the Northern States, particularly in Massachusetts, abundantly sufficient to answer all the purposes of forming an efficient militia; but they have been followed up by State regulations which had been enjoined by penalties sufficiently severe. These, he had understood, had been in a great measure neglected in the South, and this was the reason that the militia were so imperfect; and if the States would not enforce those laws, he had no idea they would enforce this. The sums expended on the militia in Massachusetts, both from the public treasury and by private individuals, is very great—that State has furnished more than sixty artillery companies, with their pieces, ammunition carriages, and everything appurtenant to them, complete; the artillery and cavalry are completely uniformed and equipped, and are required so to be by law; for the greater part, the infantry are in uniform complete, are well armed, and are equal in all respects to any militia in the world. That this classification would add to their burdens, and they had already burdens enough; that it would be an insidious thing, and so considered by the militia, and go to destroy the harmony of the militia corps. That if gentlemen in the South thought it would be useful, let their State governments, who were the best judges, adopt as much of it as they pleased. No one would object to that, if they did not interfere with existing regulations. All will acknowledge that the State governments have it in their power, and it has been, in some form or other, exercised by some of the States, and particularly by Pennsylvania—this measure will interfere with their favorite mode. He said he was disposed to have the militia in the South improved, but he prayed gentlemen not to adopt a measure calculated to injure one part of the militia more than it would benefit the other; he hoped the provisions for classing the militia would be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. STOW opposed the motion.

The question was decided by yeas and nays: For striking out 58, against it 65, as follows:

A new member, to wit: from North Carolina, WILLIAM KENNEDY, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Gen. Thomas Blount, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Edward Kean and Aquila Deaver; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "giving the right of pre-emption, in the purchase of lands, to certain settlers in the Illinois Territory," with an amendment; in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ARMING THE MILITIA.

The bill supplementary to the act for arming the whole body of the militia, and for classing the same, was read the third time.

Mr. QUINCY, of Massachusetts, said that he rose with no hope of changing a vote; that the subject had been sufficiently canvassed now, and formerly, by himself and others; and that he had no other intention in rising than to bear testimony against the classifying principle contained in this bill, and to express his belief and his hope that the people of the Northern States, particularly of Massachusetts, would treat that classifying principle precisely as the people of the Southern States had treated the old militia law of the United States, in relation to arming their militia, with utter neglect. At every Constitutional peril he trusted that such an attempt would be evaded.

Mr. Q. said it was curious and alarming to see gentlemen, who admit their own militia to be worth little, and also admit that our Northern militia is worth much, instead of attempting to adapt our system to their exigencies, are attempting to wrest our practical system to their speculative theories.

Mr. Q. said it was an objection to him, if it were not to others, that this was a French system; that it was a tyrant's system, and not suited, nor could be adapted to those old principles of Saxon liberty, on which the Constitutions of this country are built.

Mr. Q. said that he did not know as there was any difference between him and the friends of the bill, as to the efficiency of the system, considered as a mode of obtaining a subservient military force, suited for all times and purposes. The difference between them, he said, was this, that they deemed the militia capable of being turned into a mere instrument of power—whereas he did not believe in any such thing. The resulting force might be called a conscription, Imperial guards, or the like, but it was not a militia.

The great object, Mr. Q. said, was to place, in the first instance, all the youth of the nation at the command of the Executive, as a disposable force, to march anywhere, and do anything for which any Congress may pass a law. It is perfectly well understood that the young men, once carried into the field, and deprived of their guardians and friends, and perhaps dragged away a hundred or a thousand miles from their homes, may be wrought into the temper and character of a soldiery very easily. Ignorant of the world and their rights, and fascinated by the hopes of glory, they will, with facility, be turned into the tools of ambition. This is the example of France—and its effect upon the happiness and liberties of that country, said Mr. Q., is warning enough for me. I agree, that without the classifying principle, Bonaparte would not have found the French population such convenient tools. But it is yet to be shown that had he limited his purposes to mere self-defence, to guard French altars and hearths, that a militia, organized as is the militia of Massachusetts, would not have been sufficient for the purpose. My own opinion is, it would have been ample for that object.

Mr. Q. said that it had become very fashionable of late to decry the militia. For his part, he neither wished to elevate it far above, or suffer it to be depressed very far below the real state of that system. He considered the state of the militia of Massachusetts to be about where it ought to be—adequate to all the exigencies of the defence of their altars and hearths, in the present condition of the society in which we are found.

JANUARY, 1813.

Constitution and Guerriere.

H. OF R.

It is efficient for every necessary purpose, with the exception, perhaps, of our seaboard and cities, which are exposed to predatory incursions; partly owing to their extent, and partly owing to the neglect of the General Government, to which that protection is intrusted; except in this respect, we are safe in Massachusetts. We have nothing to fear from any external force. We sleep in security under our own militia shield.

After this bill passes, three effects will result. There are others, but I shall notice only these. First.—The young men will be disgusted, and rendered willing to evade exposure to militia duty. At the period between eighteen and twenty-one, the destinies of the young men are shaped more distinctly than at any other period. They will feel the peculiarity of their exposure. Instead of a lot among all classes of active citizens between eighteen and forty-five, as at present exists, it will be a lot among a very small class between eighteen and twenty-one. The difference of the chance is immense, and cannot fail of creating disgust to the service in the young mind.

Second.—The parents will be also disgusted and apprehensive. Their sons will be subject to be called from them, and put at the disposal of the Executive, under circumstances peculiarly calculated to excite parental apprehension. Instead of being mingled with the old and middle aged, and associated with them in the ranks, under whose care they might be placed, and to whose guardianship they might be intrusted, the young conscripts will be removed from their parents, and collected in bodies, composed of youths of their own age, and exposed to all the vices and temptations of a camp, at a period of life peculiarly subject to be misled by the artifice of officers, whose business it may be to fascinate the young mind and render it subservient to the purposes of ambition.

Third.—It renders the militia less efficient for the purpose for which it is designed and for which it ought to be used. The object of the militia is self-defence. It is impossible but that our young men should go to the field with less alacrity if they were carried there, in a body, unaccompanied and unsupported by the other ages of society. The great strength of the militia system, and which stands it instead of discipline, must, from the nature of things, result from this circumstance—that sons, brothers, and fathers, the old and young, the rich and the poor, are formed and associated in one phalanx in defence of their household goods. This system of classification deprives the militia of all the advantages derived from the sympathies of this association. It is impossible but that on this account the efficient force of the militia, for its legitimate objects, should not by classification be diminished. It might be good for Frenchmen; and good for foreign conquest; and good for corruption; but it is bad for self-defence, and bad for Americans.

Mr. ROBERTSON replied to Mr. QUINCY, and advocated the bill.

Mr. TALLMADGE followed, in opposition to the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. STOW spoke in support of the bill, and Mr. BIGELOW against it.

Mr. NELSON opposed the bill, on the ground that it is not so constructed as to satisfy the various and conflicting interests of the different sections of the Union, and from his dislike to the provision authorizing substitutes, &c., although approving the additional provision for arming the militia; and concluded by moving to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole for amendment.

The question on recommitment was negatived. For recommitment 46, against it 51.

Mr. RHEA supported the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS followed in support of the bill, and in reply to Mr. QUINCY and Mr. TALLMADGE.

The question on the final passage of the bill was then taken by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 67, nays 48, as follows:

[The bill authorizes a grant of $50,000.]

Mr. McKEE opposed the passage of the bill, on the ground that the President has no authority to expend the public money in gratuitous grants to individuals.

Mr. SAWYER stated, that he wished to make some remarks in reply to Mr. McKEE, but, from the lateness of the hour, and an indisposition with which he was oppressed, it was not now in his power. He therefore moved an adjournment, which was carried—ayes 54.

MONDAY, February 1.

Mr. SEAVER presented a petition of Benjamin Waterhouse, medical doctor, of Boston, stating that he is willing, and wishes to undertake the inoculation of the Army of the United States with the "kine-pock inoculation," and praying the aid and patronage of Congress in that undertaking.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill giving further time to the purchasers of public lands to complete their payments; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill "giving the right of pre-emption, in the purchase of lands, to certain settlers in the Illinois Territory," was read, and concurred in by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed two bills: one "for the relief of Washington Lee," and the other "for the relief of Reuben Attwater;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Washington Lee" was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Reuben Attwater" was read twice, and referred to the same committee.

PENNSYLVANIA RESOLUTIONS.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

At the request of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, conveyed through the Governor of that State, I transmit to Congress copies of its resolutions of the 16th of December, 1812. JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 30, 1813.

The resolutions are as follow:

Viewing the present state of our foreign relations, we, with astonishment and regret, behold the Emperor of the French withholding from our country those indemnifications which ought to have been rendered with liberality and promptness. After the aggressions of Great Britain had, by long continued practice, been regarded by her Government as right, after the forbearance of the American Government had assumed the appearance of cowardice, war is reluctantly, unavoidably, but decisively declared. Animated by the most sincere love of peace, the President of the United States in the same despatch announces to the British Government the existence of war, and the equitable, easy, and honorable means, by which its progress might be arrested, and its calamities permanently prevented; but this extraordinary proof of a humane and pacific disposition is treated with contempt. Familiarized with the slaughter of man around the globe, the British Government prefer the effusion of human blood to a suspension of the inhuman practice of impressment, even during the short space of an armistice agreed on for the purpose of negotiating a just and honorable peace; nay, notwithstanding the offer made by the Government of the United States to exclude British subjects from our merchantmen, and Navy. But what atrocities are too enormous to be found in that Government, whose characteristic features are cruelty and perfidy, which stimulates the savage to drench his tomahawk and scalping knife in the blood of our frontier men, women, and infants; which, making the most solemn professions of friendship and peace, strives by the malignant breath of its secret emissaries to kindle in our nation dissatisfaction, discord, rebellion, and civil war, with all their sanguinary and horrible consequences! Thus is extinguished in the American Government, and in every American bosom, the last hope of finding in the conduct of Great Britain toward the United States a single voluntary act of justice or humanity. Impressed with these considerations, and with others of a collateral and subordinate nature, we, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, do adopt the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the declaration of war against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, issued, by the General Government on the 18th of June last, was the result of solemn deliberation, sound wisdom, and imperious necessity.

Resolved, That the sword being drawn, should never be sheathed till our wrongs are redressed, our commerce unfettered, and our citizens freed from the danger of British impressment in the floating dungeons of the British navy, and the painful necessity of fighting the battles of an inveterate enemy, against their fathers, their brethren, their native country, and their friends.

Resolved, That, to exert all the energies of his body and of his mind, and to devote his property to bring the existing war to a speedy, just, and honorable issue, and to teach our insolent foe that the Americans are as free from timidity, and weakness in battle, as from covert and disguise in negotiating, is a duty which every citizen of the Union owes to himself, to his country, and to his God.

Resolved, That with painful regret we contemplated the refusal by the Executive authorities of some of the States in the Union to furnish, on the President's demand, their quota of militia for the defence of the sea-coast; and that with confidence we expect from the National Legislature a prompt attention to this alarming and unprecedented occurrence.

Resolved, That the promptness and the zeal with which the Governor of this Commonwealth executed the military orders of the President, since the commencement of hostilities, entitle him to the gratitude of this General Assembly of Pennsylvania, and of the nation.

Resolved, That the Governor of this Commonwealth be instructed to transmit a copy of these resolutions to

YAZOO CLAIMS.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "to carry into effect the report made to Congress, in February, 1803, by James Madison, then Secretary of State; Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury; and Levi Lincoln, Attorney General of the United States—commissioners appointed in pursuance of the act, entitled 'An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory, in obedience to the provisions of the act supplemental to the last mentioned act'—made a report; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next. The report is as follows:

That, after a careful investigation of the subject, and examination of the provisions of the bill referred to them, the committee deem it their duty to present a particular view of the subject only so far as the United States are at present concerned in its decision. Had the committee possessed the means of correct information, they had not the leisure, nor did they believe that any practical good would result from any general exposition they could present of the circumstances attending the case from its origin. They have, therefore, viewed the subject in the aspect and on the ground upon which it has been placed by the former acts of the Government in relation to it. The committee, therefore, give no opinion on any of the questions that have been agitated respecting the competency of the Legislature of Georgia to dispose of the unappropriated territory in that State, or the validity of the act or pretended act of the 7th of January, 1795, purporting to alienate the right of soil to great extent of such territory, nor respecting the effect of the rescinding act passed by a subsequent Legislature. The necessity of a legislative decision on these questions appears to be superseded by prior conventional and legislative acts of the Government. The agreement and articles of cession between the State of Georgia and the United States, confirmed by a legislative act of the one, and assented to by the Legislature of the other, the subsequent act of Congress appropriating and providing for the disposal of the lands acquired by the cession, and the several after acts providing for the sale of lands in the Mississippi Territory, all proceed on the ground that the act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, of the 7th of January, 1795, was not valid to give title. Although every act of the Government in relation to the subject is predicated on the invalidity of the said act or pretended act, yet it would appear that the articles of cession from Georgia, the report of the Commissioners to Congress, and the subsequent act of Congress appropriating the lands received by that cession, would all seem to recognise in the present claimant an equitable claim to some compensation.

The articles of agreement and cession, after having made specific provision for several species of claims, provided a fund of five millions of acres of land, to be placed at the disposal of Congress, "for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, or compensating for any claims other than those before recognised, which may be made to the said lands, or to any part thereof." The existence of the claims in question was made known to the Commissioners who concluded the agreement, and, as no excluding provision was introduced with respect to them, the inference is pretty obvious, that those claims came within the contemplation of the Commissioners, and were designed to be provided for.

The Commissioners of the United States who concluded the aforesaid agreement with those of Georgia, in their report to Congress, recommend these claims to the consideration of the Legislature, and state, in relation to them, that "various equitable considerations, which may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on reasonable terms."

The act of Congress "regulating the grants for land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," approved on the 3d of March, 1803, which appears to have been passed in pursuance of the articles of agreement and of the aforesaid report, by the eighth section provided "that so much of the aforesaid five millions of acres should be appropriated, as might be necessary to satisfy certain classes of claims not recognised by the articles of cession; and so much of the residue of the five millions of acres, or of the net proceeds thereof, as may be necessary for that purpose, are thereby appropriated for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, and compensating for such other claims to the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee, not recognised in the above-mentioned articles of agreement, and which are derived from any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, which Congress may hereafter think fit to provide for." The language made use of by the Legislature, in appropriating the residue of the five millions of acres placed at their disposal, appears to be descriptive of the claims in question.

Congress, then, in the opinion of the committee, are at liberty, in conformity with the articles of agreement and their own act, either to apply the aforesaid lands, or any part of them, or the proceeds thereof, for the purposes proposed by the bill under consideration, or to withhold them, as to them may appear proper. How far it would now be for the public interest to quiet claims that may interfere with grants made, or to be made, by the United States, is a consideration of expediency alone; the decision must also rest on the opinion that may be formed of the equity or want of equity in the claims of the present claimants. The committee think proper to state, that a gentleman, in the character of an agent for many of the present claimants, produced to them several powers of attorney and letters, which, although they do not give positive assurance, yet give a reasonable ground of expectation that the present claimants will generally consent to compromise their claims on the terms proposed by the report of the Commissioners. In case the House shall think proper to authorize a compromise of the claims in question, by passing the bill under consideration, the committee would recommend a modification of the terms originally proposed by the Commissioners, and assumed as the basis of compromise by the bill, as passed by the Senate. According to the agreement with Georgia, five millions of acres constituted the whole fund applicable to the satisfaction of claims not recognised by that agreement. It has not been ascertained (nor can it be with precision) what quantity of those lands have already been appropriated by Congress. The residue applicable to the satisfaction of the claims in question is conjectural in quantity and value; and, in the absence of other objections to the commuting of this residue for a specific sum in money, that uncertainty would form one of considerable weight. It appears to the committee that the alternatives proposed to the option of the claimants, by the report, are not equal; that if the land should be located in the manner provided, and be brought into market at the same time with other lands, the proceeds arising from the sales would not discharge the interest and redeem the principal of two million five hundred thousand dollars, to which amount the certificates are proposed to be issued. In making the compensation proposed, Congress ought not to transcend the fund placed at their disposal for the purpose. If the estimate of the committee be correct, the fund would be overdrawn by the issue of certificates. If they should be incorrect, and the land be of equal value, then it should be equally acceptable to the claimants as the certificates; and, in that case, no injury would arise in confining their compensation to land alone. The committee, therefore, recommend a modification of the terms, and will report an amendment accordingly.

The sixth section of the bill provides that the United States shall sue for and recover such parts of the original purchase money as have been improperly withdrawn from the treasury of Georgia; which provision the committee consider exceptionable, and have proposed a substitute.

Amendments proposed.

SEC. 2. After the word "lands," in the second line, insert "the evidence of claim to which shall have been exhibited to, and recorded in the office of, the Secretary of State." Same line, after the word "exhibited," strike out the word "to;" and after "recorded," strike out "in the office of the Secretary of State."

SEC. 3. Insert after the word "aforesaid," in line ten, the following: "in so far as the said terms proposed as the basis of compromise contemplate an indemnity in lands to the claimants. But it shall be understood, and is hereby expressly provided, that no alternative shall be offered or given to the claimants, or any of them, to receive certificates, with interest or without interest, at their option, in lieu of the lands proposed; and the indemnification authorized by this act shall be allowed to the claimants in land only, and to the amount and in the manner by the aforesaid terms proposed."

SEC. 4. Strike out, after the word "report," inclusive, in the sixth line, to the end of the section, and insert in lieu thereof "provisions of this act."

SEC. 6. Strike out from the word "aforesaid" to the end of the section, and insert in lieu thereof, "shall be holden and liable to refund and pay such sum or sums of money, so had and received, as aforesaid, to the person or persons at present claiming the lands for which such sum or sums, so had and received, were originally paid into the treasury of Georgia; and any right, interest, or claim, which the United States have had or now have to demand, sue for, and recover the said sum or sums of money, so received and withdrawn from the treasury of Georgia, shall be and is hereby transferred to and vested in the present claimant or claimants of such lands, as aforesaid, for the purpose of enabling him or them to demand, sue for, and recover the sum or sums of money aforesaid, from the person or persons, or any of them, who shall have received or withdrawn the same from the treasury of Georgia in the manner aforesaid. And the lands which the said present claimant or claimants shall or may receive from the United States, for compensation or indemnity of his or their claims, shall not be holden or adjudged in bar of his or their right to demand, sue for, and recover the sum or sums of money aforesaid. And the Commissioners, in awarding the dividends to any of the present claimants who shall have the right to sue for and recover the sum or sums aforesaid, shall deduct from the dividend he or they would otherwise be entitled to a quantity of land equal in value to the sum or sums of money as aforesaid, which the said Commissioners shall judge such claimants may recover, making a reasonable allowance for cost.

CONSTITUTION AND GUERRIERE.

The House resumed the order of the day on the bill making compensation to the officers and crew of the Constitution for the destruction of the frigate Guerriere. The bill being on its third reading—

MR. SAWYER spoke in support of the bill, and in reply to MR. MCKEE.

MR. DAWSON.—MR. Speaker: The bill which is now on your table, and which I hope will soon receive your signature, was drawn from a resolution, or rather the part of a resolution which I had the honor to offer you at the very commencement of the session.

When I offered you that resolution, I did hope, and I did believe that it would have received the immediate attention and unanimous approbation of this House; that regardless of those punctilios which too often shackle the best intentions, and do injury to the best causes, and in compliance with the sentiments and feelings of the nation, we should have immediately expressed our own, thereby giving force to that expression, and have rendered that tribute which is justly due to undaunted valor, and to modest merit; that we should have declared our admiration, and the high sense we entertain of the gallant conduct of the defenders of their country's flag, and the defenders of her rights, and while we gave to some testimonials of our approbation, we should have yielded to all that which is justly due.

In this expectation I have been wofully disappointed; doubts, difficulties, and delays have taken place; commitment has succeeded commitment, and so many amendments, or rather alterations, have been made to the original resolution, that I can scarcely call it my own; it has received the fostering care of so many step-fathers that I am almost constrained to disown it as illegitimate; but as it is natural to protect that which we call "our own," although all the features do not please us, so I shall vote for that bill although all its provisions do not please me.

Some gentlemen, with a liberality which I neither envy, nor shall I imitate, are willing to load those brave tars with all the praise, with all the applause, which the pride of language can bestow, or which a resolution written on paper gilded with gold can confer; and, becoming their own judges, they think that ample compensation for all the hardships they have suffered, for all the dangers they have encountered, for all the wounds they have received. With all the respect which I feel for these honorable gentlemen, and the high value which I set on their good opinion, I do not think it ample compensation to the brave and indigent tars who have boldly fought your battles, and generously sacrificed their interest for your good; they merit some more substantial stuff than air; they have acquired for you, sir, they have given to your enemy, something more substantial.

Others there are, who are well pleased to bestow on the brave officers who have distinguished themselves, some testimonials of our approbation—some insignia of their merit. With these gentlemen I most perfectly agree, and most cordially voted in favor of the bill for that purpose. But, while I remember the gallant captain who proudly steps the quarter-deck, I will not forget the sailor boy, "who whistles o'er the lee," or the aged mariner who fathoms the deep; and on whom, when the battle rages, danger has no more effect than the foaming surge which surrounds him has on the hard rock, when it dashes and breaks against its side; they all, sir, are entitled to your applause and gratitude; they all demand your justice; and to render that justice is the object of the bill now on your table, as I will presently show, and which had it passed at an earlier period of the session, as I did expect it would, your "Constellation" would not have lain for weeks within your view for the want of men, and is still, I believe, in your waters, but would long since have been at sea, and would have added new trophies to those already won.

The Secretary of the Navy, I mean the late Secretary, in whose veracity and integrity I have the highest confidence, who carries to his retirement the best wishes of my heart, and under whose auspices this gallant exploit was achieved, and Commodore Hull, whose disinterestedness seems only equalled by his valor, have informed us that "the Guerriere" when she went into action was worth two hundred thousand dollars, and that she had articles on board to the value of one hundred thousand dollars. She was one of the finest frigates in the British navy, well manned, and commanded by one of their most experienced and gallant captains! This ship, our frigate, "the Constitution," of equal force, attacked, vanquished, and captured, after a short, though one of the most brilliant actions recorded in the naval history of any country; thereby giving certain presages of future glory, and a character to our rising navy, coeval almost with its existence, and setting an example which other officers and crews, equally emulous of fame, have since imitated, and have obtained the same laurels, which will never fade.

Agreeably to the act for the better government of the Navy of the United States, the ship, with all articles on board her became their prize; they might have used it to their best advantage; they might have brought her into port, and divided the whole among themselves; but apprehensive that from the crippled state of the prize she might again fall into the hands of your enemy; say, sir, that your own frigate might be endangered in protecting and conveying her, they with that liberality, with that magnanimity which marks the character of the sailor, determined to destroy her, thereby sacrificing their interest for your good.

And here, Mr. Speaker, let me ask what other class of men in our society can you find who would have acted thus nobly? I fear, sir, we shall search for them in vain. I am sure, sir, that we shall not find them among those who daily violate your laws, relieve your enemy of his surplus manufactures, or supply him with your provisions, and then come here and receive indemnification, remission for the crimes which they have committed.

And, sir, what is the mighty boon which these brave and indigent tars ask from you? or rather was it that I, in the name of justice, demanded for them?—it is one-sixth part in value of that property—of their property, which they have sacrificed for your good, rather than it should fall into the hands of your enemy. And will you refuse it? No, you will not, you cannot, you dare not. You will not, because every consideration of policy, and the best interest of our country, forbid it; you cannot, because every feeling which ennobles the human heart, and I think I know yours, forbids it; you dare not, because justice forbids it, and you dare not do an act so flagitious.

Mr. Speaker, during the very lengthy discussions which have taken place in this session, I have remained silent in my seat; this has not arisen from a supineness of disposition, or from an inattention to the public business, or the public welfare, but in the hope, that when gentlemen had exhausted all their eloquence, they would have permitted us to progress, and to place our country in the situation demanded by the crisis; and I should have indulged that disposition which I have to be silent, had not an attempt been made to deprive the brave and needy tars of that which is justly due to them; but under these circumstances I could not restrain my feelings, and have to regret that I cannot give to them that utterance which the occasion calls for.

I shall vote for the bill, although the blank has been filled with only half the sum which I wished, and which the Committee of the Whole did sanction; and although the incitement is but small, I trust that the day is not far distant when our ships will ride in security on the highway of nations, or snatch from its proud mistress that trident which she has so long usurped to the injury of unoffending nations, civilized and savage, and particularly of these United States; and when our merchant vessels will visit every quarter of the globe unmolested by British arrogance, or the arrogance of any other nation.

Mr. McKee replied with considerable warmth. Mr. Stow advocated the bill.

[The argument against this bill was that it would be setting a precedent which would be considered authoritative in future cases; that it was giving a donation for an act of duty only, though gallantly performed. It was rewarding a service, which, had it been rendered on land, would have received no remuneration, as experience had proved in the case of the Tippecanoe expedition; and that it was contrary to justice to confer pecuniary rewards on one class of our citizens in exclusion of others. In favor of the bill, it was stated that the captured vessel, if she had been brought into port, would have produced six times the amount now proposed to be allowed to her; and that the captors ought not to incur a total loss from the destruction of the vessel, which the fear of her falling into the hands of the enemy had rendered necessary to the public service. It was urged, that if any city in the United States had to legislate on this subject, five times as much would have been awarded as is now proposed. All the gentlemen who spoke offered the tribute of their respect to the gallantry and conduct of the officers and seamen of our public vessels.]

The question on the passage of the bill was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 59, as follows:

So the bill was rejected.

SALARIES OF HEADS OF DEPARTMENTS.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to increase the salaries of the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. C. then rose, and stated that the salaries of these officers heretofore had not been equal to those of the Secretaries of State and Treasury, probably because their duties had not been considered as arduous; but that now the duties of these officers had become equally arduous, they required equal talent, incurred equal responsibility with the other two officers, and were liable to equal expenses. It had been, therefore, thought by the Committee of Ways and Means, that the salaries of all the Secretaries ought to be placed on an equal footing. He moved to fill the blank in the bill for the amount of the salary with "five thousand dollars," the present salary of the Secretaries of State and Treasury.

After a few observations from Mr. FINDLEY in favor of the bill, the motion was agreed to by a very small majority.

Mr. RHEA moved to amend the bill by incorporating therein a provision for raising the salary of the Postmaster General of the United States from three thousand to "three thousand five hundred" dollars.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to amend the amendment, so as to increase the salary of the Assistant Postmaster General to "two thousand dollars."—The motion was lost.

The question on Mr. RHEA's motion was then decided in the negative by a small majority.

The Committee rose and reported the bill; and the question being stated on concurrence with the Committee of the Whole on the principles of the bill—

Mr. RANDOLPH stated his objections to the measure. He was opposed to the bill, not because he did not believe the salaries, abstractly considered, with reference to the grade of talent which ought to grace these offices, might be too low, but because, compared with the salaries of the judges, and other officers of the United States, their salaries were, comparatively, already too high. He drew a comparison between the fate of this bill and of that just rejected for compensating the officers and crew of the Constitution, unfavorable to the decision of the House on these two cases. He was not for lavishing treasure on those who were basking in sunshine at home, and withholding with a niggardly hand the remuneration justly due to the merits and exploits of the latter.

Mr. CHEVES replied. He fully agreed with Mr. RANDOLPH that salaries of other officers were too low; but it was no reason against placing officers of the same grade on an equal footing that other officers were too low. The greatest objection to the present inequality of the salaries of the Heads of Departments was the inferiority which it implied in two of these officers to the other two, though all were placed in the Cabinet on an equal footing, &c. He, too, lamented the decision of the House which had just taken place, but it was no reason whatever against the measure now before the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke in explanation, and added some other remarks to those he had before made. He particularly objected to an increase, at this moment, of the salaries of those who had placed the nation in its present situation. The equality of compensation would not place these officers on an equal footing. He contended that the one would still take precedence of the other, in ridiculous imitation of the customs of foreign Courts. Equality of salary would not place these officers on the same footing; it could not, as he said, compensate for the inequality created by the inferiority of intellect, supposing that to exist, &c.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Proceedings.

Mr. CHEVES rejoined, and replied to some of Mr. RANDOLPH's remarks.

Mr. BIBB spoke in favor of the bill, and stated that it had been reported without any reference to personal considerations, for it had been laid before the House before it was known what gentlemen were to fill these two offices.

The vote on concurrence with the Committee in fixing the compensation at five thousand dollars, was—for concurrence 50, against it 66, as follows:

Mr. CHEVES moved that the bill lie on the table.—The motion was lost.

The bill was then indefinitely postponed.

TUESDAY, February 2.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to impose a duty on the importation of iron wire. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The bill giving further time to the purchasers of public lands to complete their payments passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to increase the capital stock of the Bank of Washington passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to encourage vaccination (by appointing an agent to preserve the genuine vaccine matter, and to clothe him with the privilege of franking the same,) passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the select committee relative to the military lands due to the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line in the Revolutionary war on State establishment.

After some debate, the report of the committee, favorable to the granting the land therein referred to, was disagreed to.

The Committee rose and reported their disagreement thereto.

On the question of concurrence, considerable debate arose, and the House adjourned without having come to any decision.

The principal speakers were, in favor of the claim or right of the officers and soldiers, Messrs. NELSON, RANDOLPH, GHOLSON, and others; and against them, Messrs. GOLD, WRIGHT, and others.

WEDNESDAY, February 3.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, reported the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Washington Lee," without amendment; the bill was then committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, presented a bill in addition to an act regulating the Post Office Establishment; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. LACOCK, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill in confirmation of an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, establishing a Board of Wardens, and regulating pilots and pilotage, for the port of Philadelphia.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee, touching the claims of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line of the Revolutionary army to bounty lands; and, on motion, the report was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WIDGERY, a committee was appointed to consider the expediency of altering the time of holding the district court of the United States for the district of Maine, now holden at Wiscasset, from the first Tuesday of March, to the last Tuesday of February; with leave to report by bill, or otherwise; and Mr. WIDGERY, Mr. RICHARDSON, and Mr. ELY, were appointed the committee.

An engrossed bill giving further time to the purchasers of public lands to complete their payments was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill authorizing an increase of the capital stock of the Bank of Washington was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to impose a duty on the importation of iron wire was read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY BOUNTY LANDS.

The House then proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee touching the claims of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line of the Revolutionary army to military bounty lands.

The question was then taken to concur with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the resolution recommended by the select committee, which is as follows:

Resolved, That provision should be made for securing to the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army of Virginia, on State establishment, in the land or sea service of the said State, the bounty lands which were promised to them, either by a law or resolution of the said Commonwealth, out of the lands not otherwise appropriated, and lying on the northwest side of the river Ohio, within the Virginia cession, to be of good quality, according to the true intent and meaning of the promises made on the part of Virginia, and that, if a sufficiency of good land within the meaning of the aforesaid engagement cannot there be found, that their bounties shall be satisfied out of any other public land of the United States, not heretofore otherwise appropriated:

And was determined in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 41, as follows:

REGULATION OF SEAMEN.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill prohibiting the employment of foreign seamen in the armed vessels and merchant service of the United States.

The first section of the bill having been read—

Mr. GRUNDY said: Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the unkind reception with which the bill under consideration met with from a particular quarter, on its first appearance in the House, I am still its advocate, and solicit a calm and temperate discussion of its merits. I ask this not on my own account—for the storm of debate has no terrors to me—but I ask it in order that justice may be done to the subject.

We all know, that when the passions are excited, or those prejudices which are incident to man in his most perfect state indulged, reason, the pride of our nature, is thrown from its place, and errors of the most pernicious kind often follow. Having requested that a mild temperament of mind shall characterize the debate upon which we are now entering, I shall be the last to disregard it myself. Hoping that nothing which I shall say may produce a single unpleasant sensation, either in this House or elsewhere, I shall proceed to an examination of the principles of the bill on your table. To these I shall confine my remarks at present, believing that any objections which are intended to be made to the various details, by those who are opposed to its passage, will be withheld until the opinion of the committee can be taken upon the main question. The propriety of this course is strongly enforced by the consideration that all amendments which may be deemed necessary to render the bill more acceptable to gentlemen can be offered, and, if approved, adopted at a subsequent period. And, sir, permit me to assure you, that those members of the committee who directed the bill to be reported to the House will cheerfully accede to any modification which is not calculated to defeat the objects intended by them to be attained. We do not pretend that the bill is a perfect one; the novelty and difficulty of the subject forbid us to entertain an idea of that kind: at the same time, they furnish an apology for any imperfections which may be pointed out. In order that I may be distinctly understood, I shall in the first place consider this measure as unconnected with the present peculiar state of the country, and afterwards inquire into the time and circumstances under which it is offered.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Regulation of Seamen.

H. OF R.

This, sir, is not intended as a temporary, short-lived expedient; it is proposed to make it a permanent law of the country. If adopted, it is hoped that experience alone will point out its defects, and apply the necessary remedies. In considering this subject, gentlemen should divest themselves of narrow, sectional views, and recollect that the welfare of every portion of the country, however remote, must be consulted in connexion with the particular districts which they more immediately represent. In casting our eyes over the United States, we see in the Eastern section an overflowing population; there, also, is found a great proportion of the tonnage; and there, too, is the spirit of commercial enterprise. There both the laborers and the labor to be performed are concentrated, combined with the proper skill and spirit to give direction to both. American citizens who adventure their lives and fortunes on the ocean, have assuredly a legitimate claim on their Government for protection—their liberty and livelihood should at least be secured; but, under existing regulations, neither is sufficiently guarded. In times of peace, the Governments of Europe permit their seamen to find employment in the merchant service of the United States; upon the appearance of war, they claim the right to withdraw them. What effect has this practice upon the seamen and commerce of this country? When no war rages among the nations of Europe, swarms of foreign seamen flock to the United States in search of a livelihood; by reason of which, your own seamen are thrown out of employment, or their wages greatly diminished. This is, to my mind, a species of injustice against that class of the community which ought not to be tolerated. Look, sir, at its operation on the mercantile interests of the country. If on the eve of a war in Europe foreign seamen are withdrawn, a deficiency of sailors to navigate American vessels must be the unavoidable consequence. The fair trader cannot prosecute his customary voyages; the wages of seamen are suddenly raised, and the difficulty of obtaining them at any price is often productive of serious embarrassment. It is true, that a total exclusion of foreign seamen from our service might compel our merchants to raise, in some decree, the wages of American seamen; but for this they would be amply compensated by the uniformity of wages which would be established, and the certainty of being at all times able to obtain the number of seamen necessary. For, sir, I have been assured by gentlemen on both sides of the House, acquainted with the subject, that, were foreigners excluded altogether, there would at all times be of native citizens a number of seamen equal to the prosecution of the various branches of commerce usually carried on between this and other countries, as well as our coasting trade. And when all who reside in our seaport towns concur in this opinion, I presume no reasonable doubt can be entertained of its accuracy; and when it shall be known that the livelihood of American seamen is not to be rendered precarious by the contingency arising from the competition of foreigners, and that they will be exempt from the danger of impressment, many will no doubt engage in that course of life who are at present deterred from it.

In a national point of view, how does this subject present itself? According to existing regulations, when the United States are engaged in war, we must rely on foreigners, who have no attachment to our country. It may happen that they are natives of the very country with which we are contending. If this bill shall be adopted, the country will be in safer hands; you will have men to navigate your vessels and fight your battles who have their family connexions amongst us, and whose feelings and attachments are purely American. In other respects, this measure is important: It will diminish the points of collision between this and other nations; it may do away the necessity of future wars (for I wish it to be understood, that nothing I now say is intended as having any relation to the present controversy between Great Britain and the United States.) By this bill you will show foreign nations the limits to which our claims extend; it will mark out by a defined boundary the extent of our national rights, so far as they relate to the subject-matter of this bill. They will see that beyond the indisputable rights of the country nothing is claimed; and will know, of course, that should they intrench upon them, the people of the United States will put forth their strength in opposition to the invader. Further, sir, it will do away all doubt as to the propriety of resistance among ourselves. If a single individual is then impressed, we shall all know that a political brother has lost his liberty. And, sir, although we now divide in opinion, let this be reduced to such certainty as to be incapable of contradiction, and we are an united people. If this bill goes into effect, it will be known by all, that none but an American can be taken from under our flag. Then let a course of impressment occur, and no man will dare raise his voice against relieving his fellow-citizen from bondage, and punishing the Power which has deprived him of his liberty.

By the bill on your table, is not every claim which any human being has on the American Government secured? To the native citizen, its language is, whether you inhabit the soil or visit the most distant climes, wherever you may lawfully be, the protecting hand of your Government shall cover you. So long as you shall not attach yourself to another community, but retain your native character, to be able to say you are an American citizen, it shall be your shield and safeguard. To naturalized citizens, and those who have commenced a course of naturalization, we are under obligations. They have claims on us which must be discharged. For myself, I can never consent that Punic faith shall be ascribed to the American nation; and although, from the other side of the House, it is at some times intimated, and at others faintly urged, that the same kind of protection is not due to naturalized as to native citizens, I doubt very much whether any member on this floor will hazard a declaration to that effect.

As between naturalized citizens and this Government, how does the subject of allegiance and protection stand? The Constitution of the United States authorizes Congress to pass laws for the naturalization of foreigners. In pursuance of this authority, Congress laid down a rule; the terms and conditions were prescribed; it was published to the citizens and subjects of all nations. By this foreigners were invited to come forward and form a part of the American family—many have complied; in conformity to your requisitions, they have renounced their allegiance to their parent State, and have sworn allegiance to the American Government. Are you not bound to protect so long as their duty of allegiance continues? I cannot see how any man can bring himself to doubt on such a point. In other words, you have made the proposition—they have accepted and fulfilled the terms on their part; and you cannot be released from the obligation which the compact thus entered into imposes; and any attempt to withhold full protection from this description of men would be a violation of the pledged faith of the Government. To these men all the rights of native Americans attach, and the bill on your table places them precisely on the same ground.

Are we under obligations to any other description of men? As Christians and civilized men we owe the kind offices of humanity and hospitality to every member of the great human family; but I deny that we are under political obligations to others, than those I have enumerated. Sir, those who are citizens of other countries form no part of our political association; they have not consented to participate in our dangers and difficulties; they form a part of a different community. There they owe allegiance, and to that community should they look for protection. I intend not by this to contravene the sentiments expressed by that distinguished statesman, who declared, that America should form an asylum for oppressed humanity. Far from it; but I mean to say, that foreigners who wish to enjoy the benefits shall stay within the asylum, according to the terms specified in the bill before you.

Let us now inquire whether anything is conceded by the provisions of this bill to other nations which tends to degrade the American character. We exclude foreign seamen of those nations from our service, who will reciprocate that regulation—we also require that the American flag shall protect all who sail under it, except those who may be in the service of an enemy to that nation which claims the right to seize on board the vessel of a neutral Power. This it is believed is in conformity with public law, as acknowledged by all nations, until Great Britain, in the confidence of her maritime superiority, had attempted to innovate upon it. There is, sir, no regulation in this bill, except one, of which I shall presently speak, which is not required to be reciprocal. On the point of our demanding an exclusion of American seamen from foreign ships, in consideration of this country excluding their seamen from our vessels, I feel a perfect indifference. If it were made a question between this and another nation, I would yield nothing to its demands; a perfect reciprocity should exist in all things. But if I am asked to yield to our own citizens the right of unqualified locomotion, and to extend to them the privilege of seeking employment wherever they choose, I am ready to grant it; the inducements to remain in the American service are so strong that no evil can result from permitting it. I am also the more willing to surrender this part of the bill, lest some gentlemen might think it abridged the rights of expatriation. Consuls and commercial agents are permitted by the provisions of the bill to claim the citizens or subjects belonging to their respective countries and to be present when the investigation takes place, and in this particular the same privilege is not secured in behalf of American Consuls and agents. Two reasons had influence in preventing the committee from inserting a similar provision as it regards American citizens—first, it might be deemed arrogant and presumptuous in us to attempt to make a regulation, which was required to be executed in another country, precisely in our way, without giving to other nations an opportunity of suggesting or proposing a mode by which the objects could be effected in a manner more agreeable to them and as safe to this country. In the next place it was and is still seriously doubted, whether such rigor should be exercised towards American citizens.

I trust I have succeeded in establishing the utility of this measure, as a permanent and lasting regulation, and will proceed to a consideration of the time and circumstances under which the proposition is offered. It is made, and you are asked to adopt it, when we are in a state of actual war with Great Britain, and this I know constitutes the only objection which some gentlemen have to it. I ask them to reflect coolly, and answer me, with the same plainness and simplicity in which I make the inquiry, this question, Is it ever wrong to do right? For my part, I think there is no period at which it is improper to declare to the people of the United States and to the world the nature of our rightful claims; how far they have been disregarded, and upon what terms a settlement of existing differences can be had, and to perform any act which shall be deemed necessary to satisfy our own citizens and other nations of the sincerity of our professions. Sir, you must not attempt to conceal from the public eye your sentiments on any great political subject—if you do, a degree of distrust unfriendly to the movements of the Government will be produced. Sir, if I know anything of the American people, the way to retain their confidence, is to ask nothing unreasonable or unjust from other Governments; extend your claims so far as to include every American right, and no farther; have no contest for anything which lies beyond the true boundary, but with firmness of mind and determination of character protect everything within. Sir, the people of this country are brave in defence of their rights; and unjust war they will not wage; is it not then important that you convince every portion of them, that this war is not carried on wantonly, but to protect essential rights? When they see you placing the American cause upon the true and just point, and declaring that you will never recede, they will support you; nor will they misconstrue your conduct; they will not mistake solid determination for timidity. No, sir, they think with him who knew how to acquire glory in the field—that there are no laurels so estimable as those which are engrafed upon the olive.

Mr. Chairman, a Roman Senator, upon an occasion not unlike the present, is represented as saying—

“True fortitude is seen in great exploits,
That justice warrants and that wisdom guides;
All else is towering frenzy and distraction”

And, sir, shall the counsellors of a great nation be so misled by a momentary passion or frenzy, as to lose the opportunity of doing an act, which will give strength to the American arm in the prosecution of a just and necessary war; a war which must and shall, so far as my voice will go, be carried on until every American right is secured, and every wrong redressed? There are reasons which render the passage of this bill peculiarly proper at this time. What will give most vigor to the war? Union. What will produce union? Convince all men that you are disposed to act justly; that you commenced and now prosecute this war from necessity, not choice. I know this is the case; the people I represent are satisfied of it, and their conduct has proved it. But there are men who have deceived themselves into a belief that you are not willing to see harmony restored between the two countries. I ask you to undeceive them, take the bandage from their eyes, let them see their error, many of them will unite with us.

Admit that there are men who hate this Administration more than they love their country, and therefore will not unite in the prosecution of the war, will not those who have been misled by their counsels leave them? Yes, sir, with this manifestation of the rectitude of your intentions, I think I am safe in saying to my political friends that the opposition cannot stand before them; you sweep the ground from under their feet; you leave them nothing on which to stand. At present we have truth on our side; adopt this bill, and you disarm your adversaries of all plausible argument.

In the effects to be produced by the passage of this bill, I think I cannot be mistaken. Have not the gentlemen on the other side of the House called for it repeatedly during the present session? Have they not said, do this and you have peace, or a union of all parties in the prosecution of the war? The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PEARSON) was explicit on this point. Sir, I am willing to yield to their request; the thing is right in itself, and they have asked for it; as honorable men they cannot fail to comply with their former declarations. If, however, they should not, I would still grant their request; I would give it to them as a rod with which to chastise them. For, sir, rely on it, that it is necessary to destroy the means of error, and the effects of misrepresentation. And, sir, if we use well the means in our power, the remainder will be done in our respective districts.

Sir, it is due to the opposition that this step should be taken; many of them do believe that a fair and equitable peace will be the consequence. I differ from them in opinion, but I am still disposed to gratify them. If they are mistaken, their error will be more manifest; it will convince them that justice cannot be obtained from the enemy. Suppose, on the other hand, that peace should follow from the adoption of this measure, where is a man to be found who is unwilling to see a just, honorable, and reciprocal treaty between the two nations? If such a feeling exists in any man, he will never venture to express it before the American people. Any other treaty than such as I have described, I should condemn, and I feel confident that the Executive would not listen to propositions which would place the nation over which he presides on dishonorable ground.

Other reasons than those already enumerated dictate the propriety of now acting on this subject: we are in a state of war; we are a divided people. I regret that truth compels me to say this, but the fact is so. Much misrepresentation prevails with regard to our motives; so long as this is the case, the people will not go so heartily with us, and render all that support which is desirable in the present state of the country. They have the right to know distinctly for what you are fighting; and let me tell you how far I think they will support you. So long as you are contending to protect native Americans or foreigners, to whom the United States owe protection, they will be with you; but let them suspect that the object is to secure deserters from foreign vessels, and they will tell you that their blood and treasure shall not be expended for such an object, and in a voice which must be obeyed they will command you to desist. Sir, we should not only do right, but avoid the appearance of evil. Let it be known to all men that this contest is kept up for American rights, purely so, and a high-minded, honorable people, will never abandon us.

Sir, I ask this demonstration of the sincerity of your motives in behalf of the people I represent; they have confidence in you; let it not be impaired. I ask it in behalf of men who will not halt at the margin of a river; men who will not stop to consult the Constitution and geography of their country when the enemies of America are in view. Preserve the minds of such men free from doubt; if you do not, double the number required by Government will not again rally around your standard at the call of their country, and that too with a view of encountering the severest seasons and the worst of climates, in addition to the enemies of the land.

By the bill on your table, is a single American right surrendered? Nay, more, do you yield anything which your Government has ever claimed? All must answer in the negative. I would then ask all men of sober sense, how is this nation degraded? This is not intended as a mere stepping stone, to enable the Executive to make an overture for peace, but it will authorize him, should the proposition come from the other party, to stand on even ground in the negotiation.

Some gentlemen think this measure belongs exclusively to the Executive under the treaty-making power. Sir, they misconceive the subject. This is intended as a general law, not applicable to Great Britain alone; but suppose it were, they would gain by this nothing in the argument. Has not Congress the power to say who shall navigate the vessels of the United States? Has it not the right to regulate the navigation of the country? Is it not its duty to pass naturalization laws? Surely, no man can seriously believe that we have not the Constitutional power to act. And, sir, whatever may be the correct opinion on the point so ably discussed on the adoption of the last treaty between the United States and Great Britain, gentlemen should recollect, that although the Constitution gives to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the power to make treaties; it also gives to Congress the right to pass laws for the naturalization of foreigners. If, then, a treaty should be concluded by the proper authorities, containing provisions on a subject confided by the Constitution to the Congress of the United States, I very much doubt whether a House of Representatives could be found which would willingly consent to be used as a piece of mere machinery, to carry into effect stipulations contrary to the judgment of its members. I wish to avoid a discussion on the question which occurred in the year 1796. It is not necessary to enable us to come to a correct decision on the subject now under consideration; and, sir, nothing but necessity shall ever induce me to advocate an opinion in which I differ from that man to whom I owe the right of thinking and speaking freely; him to whom I am indebted for the high privilege of addressing an American Congress; him, for the honor of whose birth, not seven cities alone, but more than seven nations would have contended, had not the title of America been unquestionable.

It is expedient to act at present on another account; the Executive has offered these terms; the British Minister declined their acceptance, partly on the ground that Congress might not sanction the measure. I question the sincerity of the British Minister on this subject; but, pass this bill, and you bring him to the test; if insincere, you put your enemy more in the wrong. The British nation, the American people, and the whole world will see, that the continuance of this war is not owing to any disregard to justice on our part.

Mr. Chairman, I have been amused when I have heard certain objections to the passage of this bill stated in conversation. It has been said, in opposition to it, that Lord Castlereagh, when discussing American affairs with Mr. Russell, used certain expressions loftily. I will tell you, sir, what I think of Lord Castlereagh's conduct on that occasion. I view it as unbecoming, undignified, and rude. But it certainly is attaching too much importance to it, to permit the councils of those who have in charge the interests of seven millions of people to be moved by it. Sir, unaffected by his smiles or his frowns, we should pursue our object, and not be driven from our purpose. By not passing this bill, will you not justify that distrust expressed by Lord Castlereagh? Whatever may be your motives, will not your actions show an unwillingness to accede to the just and equitable terms held out by your own Executive? Sir, I do greatly fear the consequences.

Mr. Chairman, should this bill be rejected, I shall feel no other mortification than that which arises from a conviction that the true interest of the country has not been sufficiently consulted. But for this I will not abandon my political friends on this floor; no, sir, I will go with them through good and evil report, so long as I entertain the same good opinion of their motives, which I now do; and of one thing let all be assured, that I never will be content to surrender an American right, so long as a current runs in these veins.

Mr. WRIGHT replied to Mr. GRUNDY, and opposed the bill at considerable length. He considered it as a violation of public law, and as a violation of our Constitution, so far as respects naturalization. He also viewed it as an attempt to wrest the treaty-making power from the hands of the Executive, and offered many objections to the bill in principle and detail.

After he concluded, the Committee rose, and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 4.

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD, the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to military affairs, were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to cause ten companies of mounted riflemen to be raised for the protection of the Northwestern frontier.

On motion of Mr. BOND, a committee was appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what, amendments are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "An act to extend the right of suffrage in the Illinois Territory, and for other purposes;" with leave to report by bill, or otherwise; and Mr. BOND, Mr. LITTLE, Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. ALSTON, and Mr. MCKEE, were appointed the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Henry Gassaway, made a report; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House. The report is as follows:

"The committee to whom was referred the petition of Henry Gassaway, a lieutenant in the army of the Revolution, in the Maryland line, have had the same under their consideration, and report: That it is inexpedient, from principles of general policy, to apply the national bounty to a particular case, however meritorious the applicant, where numerous cases alike claim the national liberality; that Henry Gassaway has strong claims on the gratitude of his country for his Revolutionary sacrifices on the altar of liberty, during the war that secured our independence; that, having received no wound, his case is not provided for by the act giving pensions. The committee, however, feel it their duty to recommend to the justice and magnanimity of the United States' Government, as well as to the governments of the respective States, the appointment of such meritorious officers and privates to such offices as their talents would enable them to discharge, with profit to themselves and justice to their country, that the evening of their lives might be as serene and easy as their youthful toils have been honorable to themselves, and profitable to their country.

"They recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Henry Gassaway be permitted to withdraw his petition and papers."

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the report of the select committee on the petition of Daniel Boone, and the report and petition were committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

REGULATION OF SEAMEN.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill regulating the employment of foreign seamen in the merchant service, and in the armed vessels of the United States.

Mr. SEYBERT said he had a desire to lay before the Committee the views which had presented themselves to his mind concerning the bill in question. The vital principle of this bill was to be found in the first section. To try the sense of the Committee he would move to strike out the first section. Having made this important motion it was his duty to give the reasons whereon it was grounded.

Sir, (continued he,) the great principle of this bill is, to forbid, after a certain period, the occupation of seamen to persons who may become citizens of the United States. Yesterday we were informed by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) that this was not to be considered a temporary regulation—it was intended to form a permanent navigation system for the United States. To this Mr. S. replied it was not proper to form permanent regulations of the kind during a state of war, because the commerce of the country must then be liable to many uncertainties; such a system could be better matured during a state of peace.

He said the provisions of this bill were the consequence of the horrid practice of impressment which Great Britain exercised towards the seamen of the United States. For more than twenty years last past the Government of the United States has been protesting against this practice. By some it is pretended this bill will remove the difficulties in question, and restore peace to the United States—would to God it may produce this effect should it pass! In this light he said it was worthy the serious consideration of the Legislature; for facts, he should rely upon the authentic documents which were at various times laid before Congress—your tables groan under their pressure and seem to rise into resistance.

Sir, said Mr. S., the practice has always been declared unjustifiable; it cannot be grounded on natural or national law; numerous proofs are extant of the uniform protest of every Administration of the Government of the United States against it; it has been unceasingly destructive to our honor and our interests—no other nation has ever submitted to it. Such have been the declarations of your several Presidents; they were supported by the opinions of Messrs. Pickering, Wolcott, McHenry, Stoddert, Charles Lee, and Chief Justice Marshall. The last named gentleman considered the impressment of our seamen "an act of violence for which there exists no palliative." He well imagined, if the practice was continued, it would lead to a rupture between the United States and Great Britain. Every Administration, including the present, has failed in their numerous efforts to negotiate on and regulate this subject with the British Government. In vain did we yield that "in the ports of Great Britain and Ireland, the impress of British subjects found on board our vessels must doubtless be admitted." After the many fruitless efforts which have been adverted to—after the more recent offers tendered by Mr. Russell to the British Government—after the several declarations of Lord Castlereagh that "they cannot consent to suspend the exercise of a right upon which the naval strength of the empire mainly depends until they are fully convinced that means can be devised, and will be adopted, by which the object to be obtained by the exercise of that right can be effectually secured"—after his Lordship candidly confessed "that no Administration could expect to remain in power that should consent to renounce the right of impressment, or to suspend the practice, without the certainty of an arrangement which should obviously be calculated most unequivocally to secure its object"—after Mr. Hamilton, the British under-Secretary of State, asked Mr. Russell "if the United States would deliver up the native British seamen who might be naturalized in America"—after Mr. Russell informed the Government of the United States that Lord Castlereagh told him all the expectations which had been entertained by our former Minister at the Court of St. James on this subject were impracticable and unfounded—after it had been most satisfactorily proved to Mr. Russell that nothing could be done with Great Britain on the subject—the Government of the United States declared war against that Power, and placed the odious practice of impressment as the first of its causes on that list which has been sarcastically termed "an ingenious catalogue." This declaration was by Mr. S. considered as the "final attitude" of the United States with regard to Great Britain; all his subsequent views were turned towards its vigorous prosecution. But, alas! the Legislature has another "crisis" brought before it—its merits must be inquired into. If other circumstances did not require it of him, Mr. S. would content himself with observing that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations afforded sufficient arguments why the bill should not pass. The committee acknowledge there seems no disposition on the part of the British Minister to treat on the subject! When speaking of the propositions which have been tendered by Mr. Russell they declared "your committee cannot avoid expressing its astonishment at the manner in which they were received. It was not sufficient to reject the proposed armistice; terms of peculiar reproach and insult were adopted to make the rejection offensive." Again they tell you, "your committee have sought with anxiety some proof of a disposition in the British Government to accommodate, on any fair condition, the important difference between the two nations relative to impressment; but they have sought in vain: none is to be found, either in the communications of the British Minister to the American Chargé des Affaires at London, or in those of the commander of the British naval forces at Halifax, made by order of his Government to the Department of State."

H. OF R.

Mr. S. then said he considered the passage of this bill inexpedient as to time and existing circumstances. It has already been remarked that no prospect of being able to treat with the British Government on the great cause of dispute now exists. Your committee has informed you that propositions similar to those contemplated by this bill have been rejected, in terms of peculiar reproach and insult. Your late accredited agent at the Court of St. James has communicated—nay, he says he is satisfied, and every circumstance "proves most unequivocally the predetermination of the British Government to reject, at this time, every overture for the discontinuance of this degrading practice." Lord Castlereagh is uniform in his declaration that no suspension or modification of the practice can be admitted which should render doubtful the security of the object! What, sir, demanded Mr. S., is the object? He said it was man stealing; and asked, if anything but the practice itself could secure the end in view? This crime, said he, in the great catalogue of human enormities, stands alone, and no equivalent can be offered for it. The mere supposition of that being possible, implied a degree of baseness to which he hoped the people of the United States were strangers. Will our honor, will our interest, permit us again to stretch forth the arm of submission to Great Britain? Do not forget that public safety is incompatible with degradation. Great Britain knows she will be met on honorable ground if she was disposed to take it. Peace he considered the greatest of blessings if properly secured—it may be purchased at a rate which will consume your vitals. Ask nothing from Great Britain which she cannot grant consistent with her sovereignty and independence. Nothing is expected from Great Britain for which an equivalent is denied; to be on a level with her on this question is the right of a free, sovereign, and independent Power. Look to yourself and secure the safety of your people; the true path to prosperity and security must be that which we have indicated—all other terms, it is hoped, will be treated with the contempt which they merit. Have the wrongs been redressed for which the United States have contended? Has atonement been made for our violated rights? Have our impressed seamen been restored to their wives, their children, and their parents? Has Great Britain shown a disposition to meet us after we have advanced more than two-thirds of the way? No! and no alone must be the uniform answer to all these questions. Our course and our duty cannot be of a doubtful character—"Prove to the enemy and to the world that we have not only inherited that liberty which our fathers gave us, but also the will and power to maintain it." Such a course and conduct alone will secure to you and to posterity those blessings which the God of nature has so bounteously bestowed on us.

Have we, said Mr. S., reason to entertain any hopes from a late change of administration in Great Britain? Certainly not; the same spirit which has been prevalent in her councils for the last twenty years still exists—the virtuous Castlereagh, with whom we have been negotiating for the several years last past, continues to control the foreign department of that Government; he is aided by his former adherents and by the result of the late elections for members of Parliament. You can expect nothing more from this man than what your power can achieve; this haughty Minister treated your propositions with neglect, when they were offered for a purpose to which he attached much less consequence than he does to the present question. It was communicated to this man, that a repeal of the unjust edicts of Great Britain, in all probability, "would be followed by a war between the United States and France;" your President informed you that, "even this communication received no attention!" Sir, said Mr. S., this act, if it be Constitutional, would be much better timed if we had remedied the disasters which we have so often been exultingly told now stain our arms and our reputation. The disasters of the last campaign gave him no uneasiness for the result in future, if it shall be determined to carry on the war with energy, and without regard to temporary expedients—all calculations should be founded on a prolongation of the war; thus will you be prepared to meet the worst from your enemy—you cannot fail to conquer her on the continent of North America.

He said, he had heard it pretended that this act contemplated nothing more than to place the President of the United States, touching the case in question, on a level with the King of Great Britain, as regards his treaty-making powers. He maintained, the President was so already; and asked, why, at this time, pass an act, which is intended to be operative only after a treaty shall have been concluded with the United States and Great Britain? If the provisions of the bill be Constitutional, there seemed no occasion for the act, since the stipulations therein contemplated might form a part of the treaty. The Constitution of the United States declares, "that all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." To him, it seemed the President of the United States had as much control over the question as has the King of England. In Great Britain the King cannot naturalize an alien, no more can the President of the United States—there it must be done by act of Parliament; here by a statute of Congress. The King cannot repeal an act of the Parliament of Great Britain; he, like the President, acts in his Executive capacity. Seamen, who have served two years on board his Majesty's ships of war, the merchantmen, or privateers of Great Britain are, ipso facto, naturalized by a British statute, whether they enter voluntarily or not! No power other than that of the Legislature of Great Britain can repeal this clause, and absolve the allegiance which they claim from our impressed seamen, who may have served two years on board His Majesty's ships, or other vessels, in Great Britain. It may be said, Parliament will enact such a repeal, and thus make the matter easy of accommodation between the two Governments, since it may allow such of our seamen to quit their service as are forcibly detained therein; whilst, on the other hand, we may suffer those to continue their allegiance to the King; who may see fit to do so. This is the only possible mode of proceeding which offered itself to his mind—he questioned the disposition of the Parliament on the subject; they must consult the feelings of the people of Great Britain before they could venture on it. Suppose it shall seem plausible that the Parliament would proceed in this way to meet our views; let me, said he, pray you not to be lulled into a state of fatal security by the passage of this bill. It must be remembered, before the information of its adoption can have arrived in England, the Parliament will be out of session, and they will not assemble before the ensuing Winter; thus may we be unprepared for the coming campaign, and the most fatal consequences may befall this nation.

Sir, continued Mr. S., on a former occasion, the time when this bill was first introduced to the House, the constitutionality of the act was questioned; much reflection continued with increased force the same impressions which originally had operated conviction on his mind. Allow me, said he, to state the reasoning upon which this opinion was grounded. The Constitution of the United States declares Congress shall have power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." Sir, the rule only relates to the mode, it is only operative during the nascent state of the political conversion, and it ceases to have effect the moment after the process has been completed. Your Constitution only recognises the highest grade of citizenship that can be conferred—the alien is thus made a native, as it were, and is fully vested with every right and privilege attached to the native, with the exception impressed on the Constitution. Your statutes cannot deprive any particular species of citizens of the right of personal liberty or the locomotive faculty, because the Constitution does not characterize the citizens of the United States as native and naturalized. Our great family is composed of a class of men forming a single genus, who, to all intents and purposes, are equal, except in the instance specified, that of not being eligible to the Presidency of the United States; the only exception to the rule is expressed in the Constitution: if other exceptions had been contemplated by the framers of that instrument, they would also have been expressed; none other having been expressed, he said, it followed that your legislative acts could not make individual exceptions touching the occupation of the citizen. All freemen, citizens of the United States may pursue their happiness in any manner and in any situation they please, provided they do not violate the rights of others. You cannot deny to any portion of your citizens, who desire to plough the deep, the right to do so, whilst you permit another portion of them the enjoyment of that right. The rule must be uniform, as it regards place, and as it respects the persons who are naturalized; the probationary process must be the same, whether it be performed at Charleston or at Boston; it must be alike in its application, whether the alien be a German or an Englishman; it must be the same to all Englishmen, be they artisans or seamen. You cannot pass this bill, and thereafter naturalize foreigners with limited privileges, unless the Constitution be amended, so as to establish different grades of citizenship. In most European Governments these gradations do exist; in the United States they are unknown. Whether it would be policy on the part of the Government of the United States at this time, to deny naturalization to aliens hereafter, was a question of too much magnitude for him to decide upon without much previous investigation and serious reflection. This question is not now before the Committee. He said, he would defer the discussion of it to the proper period. Let me add, said he, (God be praised!) we have no bill of rights for the government of the citizens. The rights and privileges which we enjoy as citizens of the United States, constitute the original rights which are reserved to the people. The Congress of the Revolution on the 4th day of July, 1776, declared these States free and independent; they further declared, "we hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Has it become the duty of the Congress of 1813 to deny these well-founded principles? Principles for which your illustrious predecessors lavished the blood and treasure of this nation, during the hard fought conflicts of a seven years' war! Are we now prepared to violate, abridge, and to deny to ourselves, the attributes which are common to all free, sovereign, and independent States? Will you spontaneously take a secondary rank amongst civilized nations, and do this without making an effort to resist it? Does it seem fit, that the only free nation on earth should be the first to make a voluntary sacrifice of the rights which man has inherited from the God of nature? Rights, which are beyond the control of human usurpation. Can you descend to this? Let me answer for you. "I'll not believe it;" the act alone could convince him that you are about to introduce into the political system of the United States, the abominable India graduation of castes, and thus limit the pursuit of happiness. At the moment when Great Britain, by regal proclamation, declared all her subjects, which your statutes have naturalized, traitors, if found in arms fighting your battles! you are engaged in the passage of an act yielding to her one of the most sacred principles of civilized society; though she has thousands of your citizens, whom she pretends to have naturalized, on board of her armed ships, forced to spill the blood of their countrymen and their kindred. Perdition to the horrid thought! If, said he, England complains of the emigration of her people to the United States, she cannot accuse us of using foul means to effect the purpose—the fault lies with herself; let her make her people happy; that will be found to be the most certain method of keeping them at home.

You may term, said he, this bill a Navigation Act; designate it by whatever title you please, its object and tendency cannot be mistaken. By its passage you consign the liberties of this nation to the mercy of European Governments. Let me beseech you to pause before you take this fatal step. Remember that the least abandonment of correct principles will inevitably lead to destruction. We are the constituted guardians of the rights of our fellow-citizens. It becomes us to respect, nay, it is demanded of us, that we should preserve them inviolate to posterity. It is an inheritance which they do not derive from us, and of which we have not the power to deprive them. If you pass this bill, the mischief will not end here; you must make other sacrifices; you will have to "deliver up" to Great Britain the seamen whom you have naturalized. The question has been already put to Mr. Russell. Great Britain will not be content if you go thus far. She has further claims on your weakness. You cannot refuse to her to relinquish the right to naturalize any British subject hereafter. Her claims to her artisans and manufacturers are as strong as those in favor of her seamen; the industrious of Birmingham, Sheffield, Manchester, and Leeds, are of as much consequence to her prosperity. Her seamen cannot be supported without them. It is her pretended power which she will array against your acknowledged feebleness. You can only maintain your ground by a manly resistance; there is no other mode left to save the Republic. Is it your intention to abandon the thousands who are now impressed, confinied, and who groan on board the floating dungeons of Great Britain? It may be presumed that fifteen thousand American seamen are now on board her ships of war. This does not rest upon speculation; it is founded upon the facts communicated by Commodore Rodgers. If you demand these citizens in the feeble tone of supplication, the answer will be, they are the naturalized subjects of Great Britain, and that it is her practice to defend and protect them as the law directs. If you shall insist on retaining the British subjects which have been naturalized according to your rule, she will determine to detain those who became her subjects according to the provisions of the acts of Parliament. You dare not abandon these citizens; the Constitution forbids it. If you will persist in the course which this bill is about to establish, and naturalize a class of men with limited rights, you will furnish the catalogue of human nature with a genus of nondescripts; civilized society will be infested with a race of semi-naturalized men. Perhaps you may be disposed to offer violence to nature; attempt a change of color and complexion, and thus furnish new subjects for the natural historian.

Sir, it is pretended that we are surrounded by difficulties. Were it so, they might be surmounted; but this bill could not be the remedy for them. Let me beseech you not to accumulate them by acts of weakness. When the war was about to be declared against Great Britain, he was prepared to look for a powerful, a proud, and a haughty foe, though one whom we had subdued in the embryo state of our country, at a time when her strength seemed to enable her to contend with Hercules himself. Shall we fear to venture when we have arrived to manhood, and the enemy has sunk into superannuation? The Republic is safe. It matters not so much what pilots direct the ship; the crew is sound and able-bodied, and will carry her to a port of safety. The loss of his commission was not worth the recollection. By making these repeated advances without any reasonable prospect of success, we do nothing but injury to ourselves; we have a lesson before us. He alluded to the declaration of Lord Shelburne to the Marquis de Bouille, in 1784, concerning the peace of 1783. His Lordship observed, perhaps loftily:—"Had your Court appeared less solicitous to terminate the war, it would have obtained from us far greater sacrifices." We ask no sacrifices from Great Britain; we only demand justice from her. Then our policy is plain; our wisest, nay our most pacific measure would be, to show ourselves ready for the emergency; to present in front of Great Britain a force which would make her feel her danger.

Mr. ARCHER said he felt much interest for the fate of the bill before the Committee, yet he regretted the necessity which compelled him to deliver his sentiments, as he felt a delicacy in replying to the observations of his friends. Such however had been the extraordinary nature of the objection urged by his colleague from Maryland, that he hoped the Committee would indulge him in replying to them, and he trusted that his friend from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT) whose experience called for his respect, whose patriotism demanded his veneration, and who would as willingly draw his sword to avenge the wrongs of his country, as he would be to denounce before the Representatives of the people any measure which might be considered detrimental to their interests, would pardon him in devoting many of the observations which he should make to the arguments which that gentleman had urged against the bill.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Regulation of Seamen.

H. OF R.

When he had the honor upon a former occasion of addressing the House, he had taken the liberty of expressing his entire willingness, to exclude by law from the merchant service of the United States the seamen of Great Britain. This opinion was neither expressed hastily nor formed without much deliberation. Nothing had fallen from the gentlemen who had preceded him, which induced him, in the smallest degree, to change his opinion. Indeed the positions which the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SEYBERT) had taken, although supported with much ingenuity, were in themselves so extraordinary, that they appeared to him to be in no way susceptible of proof.

The gentlemen to whom he had alluded had both declared the tendency of the bill to be unconstitutional. The opinion was grounded by each upon distinct principles. He would first endeavor to show that this objection was without foundation. This demanded the first consideration; for whatever force other arguments might have against the measure now under consideration, this of itself, if it were sustained, would be sufficient to occasion the rejection of the bill.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) declares that this measure is a usurpation of the powers of the Executive, by legislatively interfering with the treaty-making power. That this bill is to form the basis of a treaty; that it is made in anticipation of one which is to contain the same principles, appear to be facts assumed as the ground-work upon which was built the whole superstructure of the gentleman's argument. But what is the real state of the case? A proposition has been made by the President to the British Government. It is alleged that this proposition cannot be received because Congress have a right to carry into effect a treaty founded upon such principles if they please; or they have a power to reject it if they please. Now it is contended that such a treaty would be absolutely obligatory and that Congress could not reject it; but he would contend that Congress had constitutionally the power to reject it, and the inference would be necessarily deducible that this bill was indispensable to put the President upon an equal footing with the Executive power of England in any negotiation hereafter to take place, embracing the same objects which it contained. He was sorry to find that his friend had abandoned the sound and Constitutional doctrine for which the House of Representatives had been sticklers at a very early period after the organization of our Government. It would be remembered that when the House of Representatives were called upon to carry into effect the British Treaty, by making the necessary appropriations, they required of the then President certain information which might enable them to judge of the propriety of making these appropriations. This information was refused, principally on the ground, that a treaty, when ratified by the Senate, was the supreme law of the land, and that it was not discretionary with that body whether they would carry it into effect or not. The House of Representatives asserted what they considered to be their Constitutional right upon the subject, by the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution, that the President shall have power by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties, but that when a treaty stipulates regulations of any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution of such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the Constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or in expediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be the most conducive to the public welfare.

The principles laid down in this resolution were of the first importance, and such as he hoped the House would ever contend for. He was willing to admit that a treaty was the supreme law of the land, but he must dissent from his colleague in the opinion that the House of Representatives were in all cases bound to carry it into effect. He contended that the expression in the Constitution, "that a treaty should be the supreme law of the land," was to be understood in a limited sense, in order to give operation to other powers granted in that instrument. A treaty was defined to be of two kinds: the first containing nothing more than obligations of the natural law; the second, where some new engagements were added to the obligations of that law. A treaty of the first kind, when ratified, was the supreme law of the land; but a treaty of the latter kind might contain principles affecting the sovereignty and unity of the nation, and interfere with the legislative powers of Congress. In all such cases, it required the exercise of the powers vested in Congress to give it complete effect. This he would endeavor to illustrate by an example or two, which would place the view he had taken of the subject in a clearer light: Suppose a treaty should contain a stipulation for the cessation of a positive wrong, on the part of the United States, towards another nation; this would be a mere obligation of natural law, and, not interfering with the powers of Congress, would therefore be definitive. But, suppose the President and Senate would make a treaty with a foreign nation, in which it was stipulated that the United States should raise and support an army, build a navy, and declare war against a certain Power; would it be so far the supreme law of the land, as that the President would be bound, as in ordinary cases, to execute the law, by raising the army, building the navy, and proceeding to acts of hostility, without laws enacted by Congress for carrying into effect the provisions of such a treaty? Or, suppose a treaty were formed, regulating all the complicated machinery of commerce, would not the aid of Congress be indispensably necessary, under the Constitution, to carry into operation its stipulations? Would not Congress be bound, in all these cases, to exercise a sound discretion, and either pass the necessary laws, or, by refusing to do this, make such treaty void? Unquestionably they would; else the grant of power to Congress in these specified cases was nugatory. If a contrary construction were to prevail, the Legislative would be completely subservient to the Executive department of the Government. It would be giving to the regal and aristocratic branches of our Government an entire control over the democratic: Congress could not exercise its volition; it would be compelled to register the edicts of the Executive, however obnoxious, or however injurious to the people they might be. This was a most dangerous doctrine, and might strike at the foundation of our Government; for the Executive might sever, by treaty with a foreign nation, one of the States from the Union, and Congress would have no power to interfere. The powers of each department of the Government were distinctly marked out. If one branch should step beyond the landmark, violence would be done to another; and, at any rate, it seemed to him to be too much like concentrating power in the hands of one or a few, with whom, the fate of every nation would tell, it could not be so safely trusted as in those of the many. The popular and representative body was not so liable to encroach on the Executive, as was the Executive on the Legislative body. The true distinction seemed to be, that, wherever a treaty was made which contained stipulations exclusively confided to the power of Congress, there a law was required before the treaty was the supreme law of the land; but, where its regulations did no interfere with any grant of power, it was, when ratified, the supreme law of the country. The cases, the existence of which he had supposed, were analogous to the one now under consideration. This bill contemplated, in some degree, the qualification of the rights of persons hereafter to be naturalized. The power to naturalize was exclusively confided to Congress, and, according to the construction which he had given of the Constitution, it was impossible for the President to pledge the faith of the nation in a stipulation to which alone Congress could give efficacy. And of this opinion the Cabinet seemed clearly to be; for Mr. Monroe, in his letter of instructions to Mr. Russell, says: "A stipulation to prohibit by law the employment of British seamen in the service of the United States, is to be understood in the sense and spirit of our Constitution. The passage of such a law must depend of course on the Congress, who, it might reasonably be presumed, would give effect to it." If this reasoning were correct, its application would unquestionably be the same to the law, whether passed now, in contemplation of a treaty to happen in future, or adopted after the ratification of such a treaty.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SEYBERT) had contended, that the bill was unconstitutional upon a different principle. To the Congress (said he) was granted the power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization; and to limit or qualify the general grant, would be unconstitutional. This idea seemed to be founded upon the technical meaning of the word naturalization. The word, certainly, in that point of view, meant the investment of an alien, by fiction of law, with all the rights of a native-born citizen. But in order to estimate the Constitutional power of Congress upon the subject of naturalization, it would be necessary to recur to a variety of considerations. He believed that every civilized nation, previous to the adoption of the Constitution, had in a greater or less extent naturalized foreigners. But no nation had found it to be their policy, or their interest, to practise in their laws upon this subject upon the technical meaning of the word naturalization; on the contrary, they uniformly naturalized with certain qualifications; they either did not make the protection promised them co-extensive with that which they extended to their native citizens, or they affixed certain limits to his rights, or excluded him privileges which were enjoyed by other citizens. In England, the statutes upon this subject uniformly contained limitations. In the reign of George the Second, a statute declared, that no act of Parliament should give to a foreigner the right to be a member of the Parliament, of the Privy Council, or to engage in foreign commerce. What was the practice of the several States before the adoption of the Constitution? It was to exclude from the exercise of certain rights, or the enjoyment of offices, those whom they naturalized. When we find, then, this practice pervading everywhere, even in the States, is not the conclusion inevitable, that the framers of our Constitution did not intend to confine Congress to the technical meaning of the word naturalization in the exercise of that power, the more especially when the comprehensive word rule was made use of? The principle upon which the power was to be exercised was left to the judicious exercise of Congress; all that was required was, that the rule should be uniform throughout the States. In the grant there is no other specification as to the exercise of it, than that of its uniformity. The term naturalization was borrowed from England. It must be understood here in the sense and meaning which was there attached to it. Whether it was absolute or qualified, it was still a naturalization. But the grant of a power in general terms necessarily implied the right to exercise that power in all its gradations. It was in the political, as it was in the natural world; the genus included the species. Besides, the power to naturalize was an attribute of sovereignty. It was either absolute or qualified; and if the grant to Congress only implied a power of unlimited naturalization, the power to qualify existed in the States or in the people; for what was not specifically granted was reserved. What would then be the result? Congress would place an alien in the same condition with a native; the States would have the power to qualify the grant; and if they had the power, they might strip him of all his privileges. Here then would the powers of the States and of the General Government, in their exercise, in all cases, be incompatible with each other. This could not have been intended by the framers of the Constitution. Congress had the power to prevent the emigration or importation of foreigners of any description. They could exclude a Frenchman and admit an Irishman. From this power the inference was deducible, that they could naturalize the citizens of one nation, and not those of another; still the rule might be uniform; and the power to exclude naturally implied the power to assign the terms of admission. But the only exception, said the gentleman, is expressed in the Constitution—if other exceptions had been contemplated, they would have been expressed. But what was the fact? In treating of the Executive power, the Constitution defines the qualification of the President. It declares that he should be a natural-born citizen, or a citizen at the adoption of the Constitution. This article is unquestionably no limitation of the power of Congress upon the subject of naturalization. It was impossible to abridge a specific grant of power without specific limitation; and the article alluded to could not be tortured by the most ingenious mind to diminish even by implication the authority of Congress upon a subject to which it was totally irrelevant.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Regulation of Seamen.

H. OF R.

But, apart from all these considerations, we had a right to pass this bill under the general clause—"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce." To this power was necessarily incidental the power to regulate seamen. This power we could exercise by the adoption of means the most necessary and direct to carry it into execution; and he would challenge the gentleman from Pennsylvania to prove that the bill now before the House was not a necessary mean, and that this was not the proper time to adopt that mean.

So many charges (he would not call them arguments, for they had not been supported by any reasoning) had been made against the bill, that he would, perhaps, be unnecessarily consuming the time of the House in replying to them. It was asserted, that this bill was a violation of the law of nations. A bill for the regulation of American seamen, on board the vessels of the United States, a violation of the law of nations! That the exercise of a sovereign and delegated right, in no wise affecting foreign nations, was a violation of national law, was, he confessed, a novel doctrine: with the same propriety might it be said that the Orders of Council were grounded on national law, or that the impressment of seamen, as exercised by Great Britain, was a right vested in her by the law of nations. If these propositions were all correct, the law of nations would mean anything or nothing, and might be resorted to with equal facility upon all occasions.

Equally strange is the objection to this bill that it is a surrender of sovereignty, by placing our destinies in the hands of England. It is really surprising that a bill, which proposes to prohibit in the service of the United States the employment of British seamen, or of persons who shall migrate to this country after a pacification, should have drawn down such heavy denunciations. The passage of a municipal law, dictated by policy, flowing from a Constitutional and delegated power, abridging the rights of no man who now treads on the American soil, and solely assigning the limits to that protection which will be afforded those who, flying from the tyranny and persecution of the Governments of Europe, may seek an asylum here, is declared to contain a principle which submits the American people to the control of Great Britain! This objection is presumed to arise from a section of the bill which declares that it shall not become a law until the practice of impressment shall be abandoned, nor until reciprocal regulations shall be adopted by Great Britain. Is it the contingency of the reciprocity of the act and the cessation of wrong which is objectionable? The most fastidious mind could not object to that part of the bill which requires reciprocal regulations: and he must confess he did not see any utility which would flow from that principle in the bill which made its existence dependent upon the relinquishment of impressment: but still a precedent might be found for it, and one which, he had no doubt, would have considerable weight with the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT). He alluded to the non-importation law, to which, he believed, that gentleman had not only originally given his sanction, but to which he was still attached. That law was wholly conditional. It was dependent for its operation not only upon the act of one but of two Governments. If Great Britain repealed her Orders in Council it was to go into operation against France. If France repealed her decrees while Great Britain should adhere to her Orders in Council, it was to operate against England. The present bill is analogous. We say to England, cease to impress seamen from American vessels and we will exclude your citizens from our commercial service: thus we obtain from England, on the supposition that this law should ever be executed, the relinquishment of the practice of impressment, a practice which, for twenty years, she has tenaciously adhered to. And this is effected without, on our part, the sacrifice of a single right, or the relinquishment of any pretension or claim which we ever set up.

But it is declared that the present bill places our citizens under the protection of the King of Great Britain, and subjects them to the British judiciary. Your citizens, said the gentleman, will be tried by an English jury. Where was this provision to be found? He would advise the gentleman to peruse the bill again. It will be found that all persons who shall violate the provisions of this law are to be tried by our own courts, and that the penalty goes to the informer and the United States. The gentleman has fancied the existence of the most obnoxious provisions in this bill, and has declaimed against the degradation which would be the consequence, with the same enthusiasm as if such principles had been admitted into it. He has not, I fear, examined the bill with his usual accuracy. Although intended for the protection of impressed seamen, the gentleman declares, the word impressment is no where to be found in the bill! Let me refer him to the eighth section. It has been said, with much apparent soundness, that this measure is trifling with the dignity of the nation, by telling our citizens that we will not protect them; on the contrary, he would say that it was a declaration that we would protect all to whom protection was due. That for such—and such alone, we would continue the contest. This law will abridge the right of no man in the community. It is calculated to furnish additional security to all those to whom the faith of the nation is pledged. If it shall be effective it will conclusively establish the principle that the American flag will protect all who shall sail under it. It had been urged against this bill that it would be the certain precursor and cause of disaster and defeat during the next campaign. This was an arbitrary supposition. A nation, while it should look to peace as the object of a war, would be destitute of common sense if it should lay down its arms and trust to the mildness and mercy of its enemy. To suppose that the Executive would slacken its operations in consequence of this law, would be supposing that he would violate the confidence of the nation in neglecting to be the faithful executor of its law: the best way to procure peace is to show ourselves prepared to meet events; and the President was too much of a statesman not to know that peace, in all human probability, could alone be obtained by the prowess of our arms. The conduct of Congress in the enactment of laws for raising an additional army, in augmenting the navy, and in voting the necessary supplies, was in coincidence with the wishes of the Executive, and was evincive of a determination in every branch of the Government to prosecute the operations of the war with the greatest effect. This measure was an abandonment of no ground which had been taken, it was not the extension of the olive branch to Great Britain, it was a measure of sheer and necessary justice. The proud and domineering spirit of her Ministry would induce a belief that, until it was subdued and broken, she would not terminate hostilities without sacrifices on our part; we must continue our exertions until this flood has subsided, and the stream of popular opinion in England has sunk within its natural and accustomed channel. Then, and then alone, could justice be done. But, as the causes which had produced it were temporary, when its effects had ceased this measure would prepare us to accept justice at the hands of our enemy.

It has been asserted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this measure is inexpedient as to time. In this opinion he could not concur. It will be recollected by those who have read the correspondence between Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Russell, communicated by the President to Congress at the commencement of the present session, that Mr. Russell had expressly stated to Lord Castlereagh, "that the power of the Government of the United States to prohibit the employment of British seamen must be exercised in the sense and spirit of the Constitution. But that there was no reason to doubt but that it would be so exercised effectually, and with good faith." This, too, was done under the authority of Mr. Monroe, the Secretary of State. What, then, do we find to be the pretext of his Lordship for a refusal to accede to the propositions made by Mr. Russell? First, that he was not authorized to propose any specific plan with reference to which the suspension of impressment could be made the subject of deliberation, that he had no instructions for the guidance of his conduct upon some of the leading principles which such a discussion must involve; and, secondly, that the practice of impressment could not be suspended on the mere assurance that Congress would afterwards pass a law to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the service of the United States, and that Great Britain would have no agency in the regulations to give effect to the prohibition. And it seems to have been made a serious objection by that Minister, in the interview which took place between himself and Mr. Russell, on the 16th September, that Mr. Russell could not pledge his Government that the stipulations he proposed entering into would ever be sanctioned by the American Government; that they stood upon unequal ground, as he, from his situation, would necessarily plight the faith of the British nation. While that Minister was at the head of the Foreign Department, while the objections were fresh in his recollection, it seemed an extremely expedient time for Congress to step in and do away these objections to an arrangement of differences; to give at once a positive assurance that a pacific plan for the exclusion of British seamen had met the sanction of Congress, and to show that nothing was wanting to prevent the operation of the law but the cessation of injustice on the part of Great Britain. To convince her that, although she would take no share in the regulations for the prohibition, yet that those regulations were of such a nature as to secure to her the objects which she pretends to have in view. He contended that our Chargé des Affaires and Lord Castlereagh did stand upon unequal ground when the subjects under discussion were brought into consideration. It was impossible, from the nature of our Constitution, for Mr. Russell to have given any positive pledge that the stipulations which he might enter into would be carried into effect, while he was as free to admit that the British Government would have been absolutely bound to have adhered to such a treaty as Lord

H. OF R.

Castlereagh might have agreed to with Mr. Russell. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SEYBERT) was totally mistaken when he supposed that the agency of Parliament was indispensable in the formation and ratification of a treaty. At this time, said he, the inexpediency of the present measure must be apparent, because, before the intelligence of its adoption by Congress could reach Great Britain, the Parliament would have adjourned, and it could scarcely be supposed that the Prince Regent would assemble them barely for the purpose of submitting to their consideration a treaty which might be formed, or the law which might pass this body. Sir, the authority of the King of England is unlimited in declaring war, in accepting overtures and terms of peace, and in forming all sorts of treaties with foreign Powers. With respect to treaties, the King's power was undefined by law. If a treaty should be disapproved by Parliament, they would call the advisers of its adoption to account, but still the treaty would be valid. It was perfectly competent for the British Minister to stipulate that American seamen should be excluded from the service of Great Britain, and the nature of the stipulation was such as not to infringe upon the laws of England, as the gentleman had supposed. He seemed to think that it could not be carried into operation without repealing the British naturalization laws in respect to seamen. Hence the necessity he had supposed of the sanction of Parliament. But the exclusion, by treaty, of American seamen could, by no possibility, interfere with the law of naturalization to which he had alluded. Thus, it appears to be necessary for Congress to interpose, to place the President in relation to the present subject upon a footing with the treaty-making power of England. In point of time it could never be inexpedient to do this. Nor was it necessary to inquire whether any disposition existed in the British Cabinet to terminate hostilities upon equitable grounds. Lord Castlereagh, it would be found by a reference to his letter of the 29th of August, had said that the British Government now, as heretofore, is ready to receive, and amicably to discuss, any proposition which professes to have in view either to check abuse in the exercise of the practice of impressment, or to accomplish, by means less liable to vexation, the object for which impressment has hitherto been found necessary; but they cannot consent to suspend the exercise of a right upon which the naval strength of the empire mainly depends, until they are fully convinced that means can be devised, and will be adopted, by which the object to be obtained by the exercise of that right can be effectually secured. Thus it appeared that they would not suspend the practice of impressment until the proper means for effectually securing their seamen were devised and adopted. This, he fully believed, was a mere pretext to avoid the arrangement, whatever plausibility it might by some be supposed to possess. But it was not the less, by this circumstance, incumbent upon us to take from this insolent Minister the only ground upon which he rested the vindication of his conduct. It was peculiarly expedient to unmask this man to his own countrymen and to the world, and, by devising and adopting a measure calculated to secure to England her own seamen, show to the world the principle for which she was contending. If her object be man-stealing, as the gentleman has said, this measure will not be calculated to make her desist from her iniquitous practices, but it will make her aware that the object of impressment is not to search for British seamen, but to supply her ships with American sailors. From this avowal, the necessary result will be, that the people of England will withdraw their support from Castlereagh and his coadjutors; and an union of honest American hearts in the prosecution of the present war will be effectuated. This measure will weaken the Administration of the British Government, while it will strengthen the energies of our own. But if, on the other hand, honesty pervades her councils, much will be gained by coming to a clear understanding. The causes of the present war, from a succession of events, are narrowed down to the single one of impressment. This was to us a vital injury, and should be resisted to the last, and, in the situation in which we stand, the first session of Congress after the repeal of the Orders in Council, it seemed at this very period, to him, peculiarly expedient to say to England: We do not wish to deprive you of your seamen; but we will protect to the last extremity the rights of our own. It seemed to him peculiarly expedient to take a position which should be tenable and definitive; one which the nation would pledge itself to maintain at every cost and at every hazard. The present measure placed the American nation in that position. It placed us on a high ground, from whence we could not fall. Upon another principle, it must be admitted, that the bill before you is expedient. Something was due to conciliation, the conciliation of our own citizens, not of a foreign Power. We find many of the people led astray and deluded, by the ambitious and daring, who have their existence in misrepresentation. The daily bread of many an individual is procured in circulating false views of the objects of the American Government, and in sounding the justice and magnanimity of our declared enemy. It has been circulated with much industry, that the United States are now prosecuting a war with Great Britain for the protection of British seamen. Not only has this belief been endeavored to be inculcated by the news-hawkers of the day, but we find it sounded by men whose situations entitle them to a portion of popular respect. He alluded to a message lately delivered to the General Assembly of a powerful and distinguished State. He would ask leave to read to the Committee an extract from the speech of Governor Strong of Massachusetts to the General Assembly of that State at its present session. He says, speaking of our national affairs, that "as the principal alleged cause of hostility against England has been removed by the repeal of the British Orders in Council, and a desire has been evinced to keep the way open to a reconciliation," he can hardly suppose that the war will be continued to protect, in our merchant vessels, the seamen of Great Britain against the claims of that Government. This belief, if such a belief existed in the heart of any man who gives himself the trouble to deliberate for himself, it was necessary for this body, by some act, to put down; to prove to be fallacious and unfounded. To produce so desirable an effect, the present bill was well calculated. Gentlemen should reflect well on the inevitable consequences of rejecting this bill. The popular delusions will be confirmed. What is now suspicion will instantly grow up into belief; this belief will gain ground as time progresses. Our enemy will pride themselves in their foresight. They were apprehensive that the Congress would not lend their aid to exclude British seamen from the American service, and their apprehensions we confirm by our own act. We shall furnish a weapon to our political opponents, which their dexterity will not fail to use successfully to displace the present Administration of our national affairs, and put down the present war waged for the redress of a great national wrong and the obtainment of important and vital national interests. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SEYBERT and Mr. WRIGHT,) should remember, before they lend their aid to the rejection of the present bill, that, by negating it, we should stamp with reprobation every step which had been taken by the present Administration, and that which had preceded it, to effect an arrangement with Great Britain upon the subject of impressment. Nearly the same proposal had been made by Mr. Jefferson in the year 1805, and precisely the same terms had been offered by Mr. Madison since the declaration of war. The proposition, at least, was made by Mr. Russell, and was declared by him to be within the spirit of his instructions. We should be careful lest we mark with denunciation the propositions of the present President, which had met with the approbation of every American heart that beat with an anxiety for the blessings of peace, but feared not to encounter the dangers and difficulties of war to vindicate wrongs, and effect their redress. Notwithstanding this measure differs in no one particular from that which has been offered, but is the proposition itself expanded into substance, shape, and form; notwithstanding it is dictated in the very spirit of that policy which should be the guide of our councils; notwithstanding it is no abandonment of the actual or possible rights of a single individual in the community; notwithstanding it is calculated to produce union among ourselves in the prosecution of the present war, or to put a termination to it by procuring for ourselves every object of the contest, gentlemen have denounced it as submission. To the charge of submission, he would plead not guilty, and for trial would put himself upon the country.

Mr. WRIGHT replied, also at some length, to the observations of his colleague, Mr. ARCHER.

Mr. WIDGERY spoke against the motion to strike out the first section. He had some objection to the detail of the bill, but thought it might be so amended as to make it acceptable.

Mr. NELSON spoke for about an hour in support of the bill, and in reply to the objections made to it.

Mr. PEARSON.—I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to striking out the first section of this bill. I trust the decision of the Committee will be in opposition to the motion now under consideration—not, sir, because I am satisfied with the provisions of the bill in its present form, but because the leading principle, if I understand it, is correct and important, and the details are susceptible of such modifications, as to give us some reasonable assurance of availing ourselves of the benefit of the principle. Indeed, so ardent is my desire for peace—so fatal do I consider the continuance of this war to the best interests if not the absolute safety of the country, that I should deem it a positive crime not to advocate any measures which had a tendency, however slight, to that object, not inconsistent with the nation's rights. With this view, I may be induced ultimately to vote for this bill in its present imperfect and questionable shape, should the House even refuse to adopt those modifications which are necessary to give effect to the professed principle of the bill, and which are in my judgment indispensable to reconcile the manifest inconsistency between its several sections.

In declaring the inclination of my mind to vote for this bill, in the crude form in which it is presented, I beg to be understood as going upon a sort of forlorn hope, for the issue of which I am not responsible. The incorrect conclusion which the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) has drawn from the remarks which I had the honor of submitting some weeks ago, on the bill for raising twenty thousand additional troops, renders it necessary for me to state the substance of the project I proposed, and the extent of the pledge, as the gentleman terms it, which I gave. I did state, sir, as my impression, that this war could be terminated with honor and advantage to the nation without a further appeal to force. This opinion was aided by the fact of an arrangement, on the question now in dispute, having been entered into by our Commissioners, Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, with the British Government, in the year 1806, which, in the opinion of those gentlemen, in my opinion, and I believe the opinion of a large portion of the American people, was both honorable and advantageous to the United States; and as we have no evidence of different principles or claims being now advanced by the British Government, it was fair to conclude that an arrangement at least equally advantageous could still be obtained. On this basis I bottomed my project of passing a law for the exclusion of British seamen from our maritime service, and following up the law, using it as an instrument, by fair, candid, and liberal negotiation. On this basis I ventured the assertion, or pledge, if the gentleman pleases, "that if Great ' Britain will not be satisfied to arrange this subject fairly, so as to exempt us from the abuse of the practice of impressing from our vessels, when such security as is in our power to give, and such as she ought to ask is given her, that her seafaring subjects shall not be employed in our public or merchant vessels; then we shall have a cause of war, (and be united in it) more worthy of the energy of this nation." This is the pledge I gave; I now repeat it, and only wish the gentleman had the inclination and the power of binding myself and the nation for its redemption. The gentleman did ask me what I considered an essential right for which I would contend—my reply was, that the protection of native American citizens was such a right. I will go further, by extending this right to naturalized citizens whilst they remain within our jurisdiction, and in all cases where protection can be given to them not inconsistent with the claims of their native sovereign. But how the gentleman has brought himself to the belief, that the mere passage of this bill is to work the effect of placing the contest in which we are engaged on the issues I have stated, is to me perfectly inconceivable. If he wishes to avail himself of my admissions, let him adopt my entire propositions; go the whole length required, and his claims will be better founded. This, however, the gentleman and his friends are not willing to do. They tell us at the threshold, and I regretted to hear it, that this bill is not intended as a stepping-stone to negotiation. If this is the case, then indeed, sir, my hopes are much disappointed, and the goodly prospects which the first introduction of this bill inspired, must vanish—for, if it is not intended as an instrument for negotiation, it is perfectly useless, and must remain a dead letter on your statute book. I agree perfectly with the gentleman from Tennessee, in the view he has taken of the advantages likely to result from the adoption of the principle of the bill under consideration; considering it solely as a general and permanent regulation, totally disconnected with the present involved state of the country. But those advantages can only be applicable to and result from a state of peace; it is therefore idle to be legislating for futurity—for a state of society which does not exist—unless, indeed, our acts tend to hasten the period when and when alone they can be effectual. In whatever light other gentlemen may consider the object of this bill, and the object of introducing it at this time, I cannot but consider it either as a measure of pacification, or as a mere exhibition of pacific professions calculated to strengthen the declining popularity of the war and its authors. The gentleman from Tennessee has entered his protest against holding out false colors, in recommending the adoption of this bill—I will not; it would ill become me to question the sincerity of the gentleman, the more so as he has expressed his willingness to admit of various modifications to the details of the bill.

Regulation of Seamen.

H. OF R.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention, nor is it the proper time, to pass in review the several sections of this bill and point out their inconsis-ency and defects. I will, however, remark generally, that the regulations and penalties are insufficient to secure its faithful execution. The first and second sections are at variance with each other, and the eighth section calculated to produce difficulties—totally unessential to ourselves and not free from Constitutional objections. I therefore admonish gentlemen, if they wish to avoid the imputation of deception, on the very face of their proceedings, to amend the bill so as to reconcile the first and second sections. As those sections at present stand, the first excludes from our maritime service all foreigners who shall not have been naturalized, or have commenced a course of naturalization at the time of this law going into effect, and shall have remained within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States for the space of five years. Agreeably to my construction of the second section, (and I doubt not it is the correct construction,) not only the two descriptions of foreigners before stated, but all those who may at any time hereafter be naturalized are allowed the same privilege. The sections are therefore at war with each other, and it is for gentlemen to determine which they will adopt and which reject. I contend they are bound to reject the second section, for it will be recollected, in the course of the discussions this session in relation to the pacific advances, as they are termed, made to the British Government since the declaration of war, almost every gentleman of the majority who spoke on the subject availed himself of the unauthorized proposition, which Mr. Russell tells us he made to Lord Castlereagh, viz: that all British seamen should be excluded from our public and commercial service, except such as had already been naturalized. Gentlemen have given, on various occasions, their approbation to this proposition, and brought it in aid of their arguments as a legitimate Executive act. I require then that you seal your approbation of that alleged proposition by making the provisions of the bill co-extensive with it. If you do not, you condemn that which you heretofore professed to approve.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) contends that no distinction exists, that none ought to be made, as to the extent of privilege or prohibition between native and naturalized citizens. This position is in a great degree correct, and whilst the two descriptions of persons remain within the jurisdiction of our laws, they are equally entitled to protection; and I should very reluctantly give my assent to any law, which had for its object the abridgement of one single right or privilege which naturalized citizens now enjoy and have been accustomed to exercise; nor do I contend for the exclusion of those already naturalized, from the maritime service of the United States. My feelings are against such a course; the sentiment of the country is against it; and the individuals themselves, from the long enjoyment of the right, would think themselves abandoned. Moreover, the inconsiderable number of persons of that description in our sea service, will prevent it from being a question of serious import, if this country and Great Britain are disposed to accommodate the differences which unfortunately exist. But, sir, if the question is to be decided on abstract principles of national or social law, whether one nation can, by any contract, expressed or implied, with a native citizen of another nation, totally dissolve the political obligations which existed between such citizen and his native State, it must be determined against such a right. I contend that all civilized nations do recognise material distinctions between their native and adopted citizens. Distinctions which arise from the nature and first principles of society—principles which impose obligations and duties paramount to Constitutional or written law, and without which nations could not exist and individuals would be always insecure. These great principles are on the part of the nation protection, and on the part of the citizen allegiance; and as it is admitted that a nation cannot denationalize at pleasure its citizens, so neither can the citizen by any act of his own, or by consent with a foreign Government, expatriate himself, and become to all intents and purposes an alien in relation to his native State. Nor do these principles interfere with or contravene the naturalization laws of our own or any other country, which are merely municipal regulations, in the nature of a contract between the individual and the naturalizing country, subject at all times to the superior claims of the native country, when the citizen leaves the adopted nation or places himself in the power of his native sovereign. We all know that Great Britain denies the right of expatriation—we also know that her naturalization laws are expressed in the same or broader terms than our own. How is it then possible to reconcile this apparent inconsistency without resorting to those great first principles of civil society which I have stated? By doing which all is rendered clear and intelligible. I am also authorized to state that the same doctrine is held by our own courts, and may be illustrated by a plain case: Suppose a native American citizen, possessing real estate in this country, where aliens are not entitled to hold real estate, should go to England and there become naturalized; would he, by thus being naturalized in a foreign country, be considered in all respects as an alien and his lands subject to confiscation as in case of aliens? I presume there can be no difficulty in deciding that the person thus situated would not be considered an alien, and were he to return to this country he would enjoy his lands, receive the protection of the Government, and be obliged to perform the duties of a citizen.

It is unnecessary to say more on this part of the subject, or to further demonstrate the incorrectness of the gentleman's position, that there is no distinction between native and naturalized citizens. I hope we shall seldom be under the necessity of making a distinction; but it is important that we should know our duty, and always if possible do right.

Mr. Chairman the eighth section of this bill is peculiarly objectionable. It is inconsistent with the idea, so much insisted on, that this measure is intended as a beneficial, permanent regulation; because you trust to the convenience or good pleasure of other nations, whether it is ever to have any effect or operation whatsoever. You exhibit the strange spectacle of an independent nation depending on foreign Governments for the effect of laws which you say are intended as general and permanent and not arising out of the particular circumstances of the country. As a measure of pacification, it is altogether unnecessary, it may prove injurious—unnecessary, because we never have complained of the employ even of our seamen by other nations. The superior inducement to men in our employ is the best security for their services, and nothing but the continuance of your wretched restrictive system can drive them from their country. It may and in all probability will prove injurious; because Great Britain will not finally abandon the right of impressing from on board neutral merchant vessels, in consideration of that kind of security which is given by this bill, that none of her subjects shall be on board; she will not thus barter away the right of expatriation, against which she has so long and invariably contended; and unless she is extremely desirous of putting an end to this war, which we ourselves have declared, she may not be disposed to exclude from employ those American seamen who have voluntarily entered the service and may wish to continue.

In point of principle this section is also highly objectionable, and is the very opposite extreme of all those doctrines about personal rights, with which we have been so repeatedly assailed by gentlemen in the majority. We here require other nations to exclude our native citizens from their maritime service. Have gentlemen well considered the extent of this principle? Do they recollect the maxim, that what we do by another we ourselves do? I ask, then, if we have the right not only of denying to our citizens the privilege of expatriation, but of locomotion—the right of leaving the country in time of peace, and seeking such temporary employ in other countries as their inclination or interest may point out? If we cannot do this, we cannot procure it to be done through the instrumentality of others.

If you admit this power in the Government over the citizen, all your fine theories about personal rights vanish. You admit more than Great Britain has ever contended for—more than I deem correct, and more than is necessary or proper as a peace offering; if indeed this war was commenced or prosecuted for anything like the principle here involved: the fact is, no principle is in contest, and if there were, we give it up by this bill; for although it is said, in the report which accompanied this bill, that the flag shall protect those who sail under it, yet in the same breath all those are excluded from it whom our enemy contends are not entitled to be thus protected.

I had intended, sir, to comment more at length on the extraordinary nature and character of this war, but the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NELSON,) who preceded me, has rendered it unnecessary—particularly as his exposition is entitled to more weight from the circumstance of his having been an advocate for the declaration of war. That gentleman has correctly stated that the continuance of this war exhibits a phenomenon to the world. "Ask," says he, "any man for what we are fighting, and he cannot tell you. Is it for the right of prohibiting British seamen? We disclaim any such right. Is it for the protection of American seamen? Great Britain does not deny our right. It is then solely for the abuse in the exercise of those rights, and in the practice of both nations wrong has been done to each other. Great Britain has a right to her seamen, and in the severe contest in which she is and has long been engaged with France, she required their services. The unlimited employ which we give them operated injuriously to that Government. On the contrary, in the exercise of the right of impressing her own subjects, American citizens often by design or mistake become the victims—thus the question solely turns on the abuse of acknowledged rights."

This I understood to be the substance of the argument of the honorable gentleman from Virginia. It is unanswerable—and it is the duty of this House, as far as depends on them, to remedy this abuse and then stop. The misfortune has been, in all the negotiations and discussions on this subject, we have been eternally involving fine-spun disquisitions about principle, without seeking a remedy for practical abuse.

The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) has resorted to an argument in favor of this bill, which I doubt not will be irresistible with many of his political friends, and which develops but too plainly its real object. He has stated that he does not believe it will lead to peace. I say it cannot become a permanent regulation, because its operation is made to depend on a state of peace. But, says this gentleman, it will place the opposition clearly in the wrong—strengthen the powers that be, and give popularity to the war. For myself, sir, the gentleman is perfectly welcome to all the benefit which he may anticipate from such an argument. I can assure gentlemen of the majority that it is not for the love of opposition, but from a sacred consciousness of duty, that my name is so frequently recorded against them; and whenever they may do right, whatever be their motive, I hope not to be found in the opposition. They ought, however, to recollect, that real virtue brings with it its own reward—that the merit of a good act is much impaired by an incorrect or unworthy motive. I therefore hope that those who hold in their hands the destinies of the nation, will be actuated not so much by the desire of placing others in the wrong, as by the superior and laudable desire of doing what is right, regardless of consequences. Motives of action, which spring from the allurements of place and power (in a Government so equally and happily constituted as this) can seldom or never be felt by those who are really qualified to administer its public concerns, who are entitled to public confidence. I disclaim those influences on myself—and were the country in the enjoyment of its wonted peace, or could I perceive, in the virtue and wisdom of those who govern, the prospect of its ultimate safety and prosperity, I would willingly retire from the turmoil of this assembly, and seek for quiet in more humble scenes.

When Mr. P. sat down, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 5.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, reported the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Reuben Attwater" without amendment, and the bill was then committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. WIDGEBY, from the committee appointed on the 3d instant, presented a bill for altering the time for holding the District Court in the district of Maine; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the select committee on the petition of sundry inhabitants of Knox county, in the Indiana Territory; when the said report was again read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. GOLD,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the time of holding the District Court in and for the district of New York, (other than those in the City of New York,) and the District Court in and for the district of Virginia, holden at Norfolk; and, also, of extending the provision of the "act for the more convenient taking of affidavits and bail in civil causes depending in the Courts of the United States," to Judges of the District Courts; with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. GOLD, Mr. BASSETT, and Mr. BLEECKER, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. McKIM,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of relinquishing, in favor of the officers and crews of the public armed ships of the United States, a greater portion of the value of prizes than they are now by law entitled to; and, also, to inquire into the expediency of providing further encouragement to equipping and employing private armed vessels of war against the ships and commerce of the enemy; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

REGULATION OF SEAMEN.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill prohibiting the employment of foreign seamen in the service of the United States—Mr. SEYBERT's motion for striking out the first section still under consideration.

Mr. DESHA said that a sense of duty compelled him to express his disapprobation of the bill under consideration, for the regulation of seamen on board the public vessels and in the merchant service of the United States. As one of the Committee of Foreign Relations, said he, I opposed this bill, and have to regret that it ever was reported. I may be mistaken, sir, but I view this measure, if adopted, as being attended with the most deleterious consequences; for, instead of its having a tendency to conciliate Britain, or our political opponents, it will, I am afraid, have a tendency to irritate and disgust the friends of the Administration, the firm supporters of the war, and paralyze the national energies, by operating injuriously on the loans, and the recruiting service. Sir, the injustice of our enemies forced us into war; the true policy of this Government is to prosecute it with vigor, in order that it may be brought to a speedy and honorable termination, instead of persisting in that disposition for temporizing; a kind of policy that has degraded us beyond calculation—caused us to lose credit abroad and respect at home, and brought us almost to the brink of ruin. I view this measure as a link of the old temporizing chain; a link that will ultimately break and suffer the small remains of national respectability to be prostrated.

This measure, sir, however gentlemen may disguise it or try to gloss it over, is nothing more nor less, than an overture, in the shape of a law, to Great Britain for peace. It is in fact begging for peace; it is humbling ourselves at the footstool of British corruption. For, sir, the substance, as contemplated in this bill, has three several times been proposed to the British Government since the declaration of war. The two first times it was rejected in a very indecorous and insulting manner; the last time, it was treated with silent contempt. Mr. Chairman, I must take up a few moments of your time in referring to some documents. If gentleman will turn their attention to the letter from Mr. Russell to Lord Castlereagh, of the 24th day of August, 1812, they will find the proposition made the first time. Mr. Russell says, speaking of his Government:

"It has, therefore, authorized me to stipulate with His Britannic Majesty's Government an armistice, to commence at or before the expiration of sixty days after the signature of the instrument providing for it, on condition that the Orders in Council be repealed, and no illegal blockades be substituted for them, and that orders be immediately given to discontinue the impressment of persons from American vessels, and to restore the citizens of the United States already impressed; it being moreover well understood that the British Government will assent to enter into definitive arrangements, as soon as may be, on these and every other difference, by a treaty to be concluded either at London or Washington, as on an impartial consideration of existing circumstances shall be deemed most expedient. As an inducement to Great Britain to discontinue the practice of impressment from American vessels, I am authorized to give assurance that a law shall be passed (to be reciprocal) to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the public and commercial service of the United States."

Well, sir, in Lord Castlereagh's letter to Mr. Russell, dated August 29, 1812, the answer will be found; in which, after giving some specimens of his diplomatic chicanery, he says:

"The British Government now, as heretofore, is ready to receive from the Government of the United States, and amicably discuss, any proposition which professes to have in view, either to check abuse in the exercise of the practice of impressment, or to accomplish by means less liable to vexation, the object for which impressment has hitherto been found necessary; but they cannot consent to suspend the exercise of a right upon which the naval strength of the Empire mainly depends, until they are fully convinced that means can be devised, and will be adopted, by which the object to be obtained by the exercise of that right can be effectually secured."

Mark, well, Mr. Chairman, that in this last sentence, couched in ambiguity, the bait lies, at which we are nibbling. There appears to be a shadow of hope left, that if we would make an overture in the shape of a law, promising not to employ British seamen, that perhaps we might yet obtain a relinquishment of the principle of impressment by negotiation. Vain hope! They are only leading us on by degrees to see how low we can stoop—how far we can degrade ourselves. It is indeed like a drowning man catching at a straw.

Well, sir, in Mr. Russell's letter to Lord Castlereagh, dated September 12, 1812, we find the same proposition in substance was made, except as respects the Orders in Council, they having been suspended; and in Lord Castlereagh's letter to Mr. Russell, of the 18th of the same month, you have the answer and rejection. I will read the latter part of his letter, which is as follows:

"This course of proceeding, as bearing on the face of it a character of disguise, is not only felt to be in principle inadmissible, but as unlikely to lead in practice to any advantageous result, as it does not appear, on the important subject of impressment, that you are either authorized to propose any specific plan, with reference to which the suspension of that practice could be made a subject of deliberation, or that you have received any instruction for the guidance of your conduct on some of the leading principles, which such a discussion must in the first instance involve. Under these circumstances the Prince Regent sincerely laments, that he does not feel himself enabled to depart from the decision, which I was directed to convey to you in my letter of the second instant."

Well, sir, what is the substance of this letter to which Mr. Russell is referred for a final answer? Why, sir, notifying him that R. G. Beasley has the liberty of residing in England as the United States agent for prisoners of war, and that he encloses him his passport; which amounts to saying to him, that we are tired of your importunities, we are not disposed to grant any of your requests, and that you may return to your Government and make report.

Here, sir, is the second time the proposition was made since the declaration of war, and you see how it was treated; with hauteur, accompanied with insult, by a direct charge of duplicity or disguise. Well, sir, it appears from a letter from the Secretary of State to Admiral

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Regulation of Seamen.

H. OF R.

Warren, dated October 27th, 1812, that overtures for a pacification was made the third time, which was treated with silent contempt—they have not even condescended to answer the letter. Now, sir, will we have no more respect for our national character and standing than to truckle at the feet of our oppressors by making the proposition the fourth time, which would virtually be the case if we adopt this measure? Sir, however gentlemen may, by casting a veil over it, try to disguise or hide its deformities from the people, they will understand it; they are not to be deceived—they will view it as humiliating to the American character; they are not destitute of information, as the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) seems to insinuate, when he says it is necessary to let the people know what is the matter in controversy—what we are contending for—and if they are in an error take the bandage from their eyes. Sir, for years back considerable numbers of the documents have been printed—generally from five to ten thousand copies—which have been distributed through every section of the Union, and, I have no doubt, critically examined. The people read, understand, and judge for themselves. They have deliberately declared, as appears in the recent elections, that the war in which we have embarked is a just war, and I have no hesitation in saying that they will support it at the expense of blood and treasure; but rest assured, sir, that if they discover a disposition in the Administration to temporize any longer; to retrograde, or, if gentlemen like the term better, I will say back out, by the adoption of this measure and the repeal of the non-importation, which I understand is contemplated, however much confidence they may have in the Administration, they will at least withdraw a portion of it. They calculate, and very justly too, that while there is any disposition to temporize, nothing of a decisive character will be done by our arms. Sir, if this measure of promising that after the conclusion of the war you will not employ as seamen on board of your public vessels or vessels owned by citizens of the United States, or sailing under their flag, any persons but natural born citizens of the United States or citizens of the United States at the time of a treaty being made, or persons who being resident within the United States at the time of such treaty, and having previously declared, agreeably to existing laws, their intention to become citizens, is not intended to conciliate Britain, in the name of common sense what is it intended for? It is not to take effect till the termination of the war. Then why legislate in anticipation? Why adopt it at this time? Why not suffer it to remain in the hands of the treaty-making power, to form an arrangement in a treaty when one shall be concluded? No, sir, gentlemen have become discouraged; things have not gone on as they expected. The disasters and discomfitures that our arms met with the last Summer have, I am afraid, made them despond, as the adoption of this measure looks very much like trying to shuffle out of the difficulty. Sir, if those who by their valor achieved our independence had suffered themselves to be discouraged by trifles, we would yet have been in a state of vassalage to Britain. But gentlemen ought to recollect that it is very natural for discomfitures to occur at the commencement of a war, after thirty or forty years' peace. The people, sir, are not in a state of despondency, but, on the contrary, the defeats of last Summer have had a tendency to rouse all the military ardor in the country. The people know their rights and will protect them. Sir, if we will lay aside our temporizing, and do our duty, the people will do theirs.

But, say gentlemen, this measure will have a tendency to conciliate our own citizens and put down Federalism. Mistaken policy! I have no hesitation in believing that four-fifths of the people at least are attached to the cause, and will support it at the expense of blood and treasure; and, as to conciliating Federalism, this you have tried often, and have as often failed. Nothing will satisfy them short of putting you out of your places, ousting you from your seats. I repeat it, sir; it is mistaken policy. Your true policy is to lay aside temporizing. Give up all thoughts of succeeding by negotiation with a Government whose acts are marked with Punic faith. Hold out liberal bounties, by which speedily obtain a formidable army and prosecute the war vigorously and successfully. Then, sir, you not only silence Federalism, but put it down, and raise the spirits of the citizens generally.

Sir, what were the objects in view when we embarked in this war? To have commerce unshackled, a relinquishment of the principle of impressment, a release of our impressed citizens, and a remuneration of damages sustained by spoiliations on our commerce by British cruisers; to stop short of this would in my mind be the height of imbecility, because we have the physical force as well as the whole resources necessary to insure success. Although war is an evil, therefore is to be deprecated, yet it is often necessary and even an indispensable evil, when by that alone those claims can be supported, which it would be baseness to renounce. Such is our present situation. It is not now to inquire how we got into war; but the question is how to get out of it honorably! What are the means to be adopted the best calculated to bring it to a speedy and happy conclusion! Temporizing any longer won't do. No, sir, you must double your diligence and energies in nerving the national arm, in order that it may be prosecuted vigorously and successfully. We ought never to lay down our arms short of having our rights amply redressed, and complete remuneration for damages; and the only remuneration we have within our reach is, to lay hold of the British North American provinces. The Federal gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, those exclusive friends of peace, will act perfectly consistent in voting for this bill; they were opposed to war, they would be consistent in voting for any pacific overture. But I confess I am at a loss to know how gentlemen who were advocates of and voted for war, can reconcile it to consistency to be in favor (particularly at this time) of overtures of pacification; but, as I am not disposed to arraign motives, I will leave it to gentlemen's own ingenuity to reconcile.

Sir, recollect you are putting a powerful weapon in the hands of your opponents, which I suspect will not be wielded much to your advantage. One of the objections to the declaration of war was, because it was premature. You are now by the adoption of this measure putting the proof into their hands, as it will not only be considered an attempt to ease off, but varying the cause of the war; because, if the principle contained in this bill did exist at the time of the declaration, there is no necessity for its adoption; if it did not, it must unquestionably be considered as varying the cause of war. But, say gentlemen, as a municipal regulation, this is necessary, and that is due in justice to our enemy. If this is a fact, sir, we have done Britain extreme injustice in not adopting it sooner. How has it happened that this discovery was never made before this time? We have been negotiating on the subject of impressment and seamen upwards of twenty years; it is rather astonishing if we had not ingenuity enough to make this important discovery ourselves, that the British, among their able diplomatic characters, should not have notified us of it. If it is the fact, that we have been doing them injustice for upwards of twenty years, (which, by the by, I do not admit,) could we be surprised at their refusal to do us justice? Sir, admitting that there was no objection as to the time of making an overture, can we calculate on getting out of the war by overtures of pacification, after the recent declaration of Castlereagh to Mr. Russell, when he says, (speaking of impressment,) that they cannot consent to suspend the exercise of a right upon which the naval strength of the Empire mainly depends?

I make great calculation, sir, from this war, if well managed; hence my extreme dislike to anything that looks like temporizing, and anxiety for a vigorous prosecution of it. Sir, independent of its putting us in possession of the British North American provinces, which will heal the national wound and measurably remunerate us for damages; drive off a dishonest and troublesome neighbor; destroy British influence over the ferocious savages, by which arrest the tomahawk of those barbarians, and preserve the innocent inhabitants on our frontiers from being inhumanly massacred; I say, sir, independent of these considerations, which on my mind are of no inconsiderable magnitude, it will check the spirit of intrigue—put down the pestilence of foreign influence, which is the angel of discord, consequently of destruction, to elective governments.

Mr. Chairman, I object to this bill, because as it now stands, (if I understand it right,) it abridges the right of expatriation, a right inherent in man, and places naturalized citizens on a better footing than native born. I am opposed to making any discrimination. I object to it, sir, because it does in a measure check emigration to this country, by laying the captain or master of a vessel liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars for taking on board passengers, unless they produce a certificate from the proper officer of their own Government. We want citizens, sir, particularly mechanics and manufacturers, to enable us finally to become in reality independent of the conflicting European despots. I object to it because the arrangements contained in it are not reciprocal; it is calculated in some instances to cramp us, while the opposite party is left perfectly free. But, sir, if these objections in detail, should by amendments be obviated, I should object to it on principle, as holding it derogatory to the nation's honor to make any further advances at this time for a pacification, particularly while our arms remain in the degraded situation in which they were placed by last Summer's campaign. I am for letting the advances come from the other side of the water—I am for going on (and not looking back) to a ten or twenty years' war, if it should be at the expense of hundreds of millions of dollars, rather than succumb to tyranny. Sir, we have nothing to fear but wayward or indecisive policy on our part; the people know their rights and will protect them. I have no hesitation in believing, that in a country where power is bottomed on the will of the people, where liberty reigns triumphant, patriotism will, at all times, be made the order of the day.

I regret that I have, on this occasion, to differ from a number of my political friends, with whom it has been my pride to act. I have no doubt (however mistaken gentlemen may be) but they are actuated by the purest of motives; and I flatter myself, from my course of conduct, that I have a right to demand a correspondent liberality. I calculate on being in a small minority; but that shall not deter me from discharging what I believe to be my duty to my country, my constituents, and my own feelings. I shall vote in favor of striking out the first section of the bill.

MR. KING.—It is, Mr. Chairman, with a reluctance almost unconquerable, I now rise to address you. I am conscious, sir, I feel I shall not be able to express my opinions on this subject as I could wish. Impelled, however, by a sense of duty to myself and to my friends, from the course I have heretofore taken, I shall as concisely as possible endeavor to assign some of the reasons by which my vote will be influenced; and trust I shall be enabled to command the attention of the Committee for the few moments I shall detain them. Sir, I was one of those who contributed (by a vote at least) to the declaring of the war in which we are now engaged. I was at that time, after the most mature deliberation which I was competent to give the subject, firmly impressed with the conviction that it was a measure demanded by the safety, the honor, and best interests of the nation. This opinion I have never changed. I look forward to a vigorous prosecution of the war as the only certain mean by which the great objects for which it was commenced can be attained. Sir, America, after long forbearance, having thrown off the mantle of peace, and girded on the sword of battle, must not recede from the ground which she has justly taken, till her every important right is secured to her. But, sir, while I feel thus determined to prosecute this war, I am free to declare, that narrowed as the grounds now are, I should have hesitated to engage in it—I believe I should not have given my vote for its commencement; but, once engaged, the face of affairs are altogether changed; by this abandonment, you yield one of the most important points for which the war was begun—you tacitly acknowledge the right of impressment; we yield the principle; we withdraw our protection from a great and valuable class of our citizens, and bind in shackles our most remote posterity, which the strong arm of the nation will scarcely be able to break. But, sir, while as Representatives of the people, it is our imperious duty to guard their rights, and repel from them every encroachment, it equally behooves us to contend for right alone. Sir, we must not stand on punctilio; we cannot bring disgrace on this nation by an act which justice demands, which true policy requires. The people of our country are a brave, an honorable, and high-minded people; but they are a just and virtuous, not an ambitious and quixotic people; they possess a greater portion of intelligence, and more correct ideas of the principles of their Government, than any other people on earth. I trust there is no disposition, but, were there, you could not conceal from the people the nature of this contest and the true grounds on which we stand. We owe it to them to speak plainly, we owe it to ourselves; on them will the burdens fall. Yes, sir, the blood tax and the money tax, I have no doubt they will bear them. I believe (notwithstanding unwearied and unceasing efforts have been made by men of intelligence, men of high standing, to deceive and mislead the people as to the causes of this war, with a view to self-aggrandizement) there is not a people on whom the sun of Heaven shines, more disposed to support their Government, or who will submit to greater sacrifices to promote its just views, than the great majority of this nation. Why, then, Mr. Chairman, hesitate to speak a plain language to our people? I know and feel we are contending for our just rights and for them only; then, sir, pass this bill, and you drive from the mind of every honest man in the community every prejudice which misrepresentation has fixed there. They will vanish, sir, before the blaze of truth, like the shades of night before the morning beam. The investigation of this subject, Mr. Chairman, has devolved on abler hands; I shall not, therefore, enter into any examination of the details of the bill, but merely confine myself to the principle involved. It is a position uncontested by the history of nations, that no Government willingly relinquishes the services of her citizens. It is true, sir, they have acquiesced in the right of naturalization, and have so far yielded their rights over them; but previous to a legal and authenticated act by which former allegiance is renounced, and the protection of another Government acquired, no Government has a right to withhold their services from the Potentate or Government to which they were originally bound. Sir, Great Britain, at a vast expense, rears her seamen for her service, and they are believed to be essential to her existence as a nation. We have never denied her right to them. The great complaint has been the manner in which they have been taken. Sir, in permitting the employment of a few hundred, to whom we could not properly extend protection, we have jeopardized thousands of our native citizens, who are now dragging out their lives in a slavery which to a free-born mind is the most detestable. For the establishment of these facts, I refer gentlemen to documents which have been laid on their tables. Sir, I am aware that the abandonment of her service by her seamen, is by Great Britain not unfrequently used as a pretext for the seizing on the brave and hardy sailors of this nation, and dragging them into her service. But while I would never abandon these men—while I would fight so long as there was an inch of ground to stand on, rather than sacrifice on the shrine of interest the personal liberty of one man in the nation to whom the Government stands pledged to extend protection, I protest against shedding one drop of American blood, or expending one cent of the money of the nation to protect foreigners who have never entered into the compact, and are aliens to us in every sense of the word. Sir, if the securing the personal rights of our seamen—if the extending protection on the ocean to them, and them alone is what we have in view, I ask what more effectual mode can be devised than the one proposed by this bill? Sir, by its passage, you take away the pretext—you deprive that country of her apologists in this.

What, I would ask, Mr. Chairman, are the objections urged against this bill? In the first place we are told we are receding from the war. This, sir, I must be permitted unequivocally to deny. In a Government like ours, no contest in which we can be engaged, with any nation whatever, can be prosecuted with vigor and effect, unless the people are with the Government. Sir, the passage of this bill will unite our people; every man in the nation will see the grounds on which we are contending; the justice of our cause will be made apparent; they will move as one man; they will be actuated by the same impulse; and the war must be successful; it must terminate in the complete restoration of those rights for which it was commenced. Sir, in this point of view it is one of the strongest war measures. I am not induced, Mr. Chairman, to advocate this bill with a view, as has been intimated by some, to break down Federalism. To me it is indifferent whether they sink or swim—to me it matters not by what name men choose to distinguish themselves, provided they pursue the course demanded by the best interests of this nation; but this I will venture to predict: should ambition get the better of a love of country, should wish for power still stimulate to opposition, the people will desert them. Yes, sir, their eyes will be opened; they will depart from them, and cleave unto their Government—the free government of their choice.

But we are told that this is intended as the basis of a peace. Sir, should peace be the consequence of this measure—a measure right in itself—I should hail it with the most heartfelt pleasure; with a pleasure so much the greater, as I was one of those who contributed to the commencement of this war; and now, by an act just and proper, have restored to my country an honorable peace. I must, however, confess I am not so sanguine as some seem to be as to this result. I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. DESHA,) that the only effectual way to command peace, (which would be honorable and advantageous to this nation,) is to prepare to prosecute the war. Sir, I have gone as far as that gentleman in making the necessary arrangements. It behooves us to be prepared; the war was commenced by us for the attainment of right; that unsecured, it must not be abandoned. But, sir, we are also told that this is a measure altogether unexampled. I ask, is it just? is it right? is it proper? If so, why ask for precedent? Does this country want a precedent in performing a duty to itself, and to others? Shall America, famed for its justice, search the musty records of the tyrannical Governments of Europe, before she determines to do an act of justice to nations? I hope not, sir; I hope we shall not suffer the pride or ambition of kings to influence our determinations: I hope we shall not, with a view to screen ourselves from the charge of inconsistency—from the charge of desertion from that political party to which we are said to belong, draw down incalculable evils on the country. Sir, I hope we shall not permit local feeling or local interest to influence us on this occasion; we are now legislating for a great people, bound together by common ties; let us discard all minor considerations and consult the general good. Sir, I beg leave to enter my decided dissent to the declaration of the gentleman from Kentucky—"that we need these foreigners, and that our interest will be promoted by encouraging their emigration." We want them not; for one. I regret that such a law as this now proposed was not adopted for years past, thereby giving greater encouragement to the native seamen of our country, (than whom there are none superior,) and preventing some of the points of collision which have unhappily arisen between this Government and others. Sir, I view this as a permanent municipal regulation, and in that light conceive most of its excellency to consist; as thereby the grounds of contention will gradually disappear, and not only remedy present evils, but prevent our exposure to them in future. We are also told, Mr. Chairman, that this is an encroachment on the Executive power; that the adopting such regulations properly belongs to the treaty-making power, and to none other. Again, I am under the necessity of differing with the gentleman; but will content myself with calling the attention of the House to the propositions made to the British Government by Mr. Russell, in conformity with instructions given him by Mr. Monroe. Sir, the necessity of a law of Congress is, then, unequivocally admitted. No man who has turned his attention to the provisions of the Constitution, and looked into the various negotiations on the subject of impressment, can entertain a doubt of the necessity of a law to enable the Executive to carry into effect any treaty which might be made, embracing the objects contemplated by this bill. Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Monroe, in their exposition of the treaty made by them with the British Government, (in which this subject was not adjusted,) expressly state "that its arrangement will greatly depend on the regulations which Congress may adopt." Sir, if a law is necessary, and that it is has ever been admitted, why object to its adoption?

But we are told, Mr. Chairman, that this law is unconstitutional. Whatever benefits I might have anticipated as likely to flow from this measure, had this position been established, I should have given it my decided negative. From the requisitions of that sacred instrument (which I have not only sworn to support, but feeling as an American that to preserve it holy and to guard it from violation is the only preservative of the rights and liberties of my country,) I will never depart from it. But, sir, on this occasion no such difficulties present themselves. The shadow of a doubt never rested on my mind. But the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. ARCHER) has so fully refuted the argument of my friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. SEYBERT, for whose learning and ingenuity no man can think more highly) founded on the unconstitutionality of this law, that little I conceive need be said by me on the subject. Sir, the Constitution is nothing more or less than a compact between the several States composing this great Union, by which they bind themselves to submit to a General Government; while they vest in the Legislature, thus established for the government of the whole, the power to prescribe the rule by which persons not entitled to the privileges of the compact are to enter in and become entitled under the stipulation prescribed. Sir, we now propose to exercise that right, so vested in us. I will not dwell on the power of Congress to regulate commerce and navigation, by which the exclusion can be extended even to our native citizens: but will barely remark that I must be permitted to question the competency of my friend from Pennsylvania, when he attempts to become an expounder of constitutions. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has related a conversation between a Marquis of France and Lord Shelburne, the British Minister, in which the latter is represented as saying to the former, "Had France held out, had she not lowered in her demands, she would have obtained everything she asked." And this is the line of conduct the gentleman would prescribe for us. Sir, the only terms we want are those which justice dictates and right demands. I trust our Government will never require more. I trust we shall not engage in a political game of brag, in which I am informed by those who profess to be adepts, that the principal requisites are to keep a serene countenance, hold up your hand, and brag most lustily; and should your adversary happen to have less firmness, you are sure to gain your point. Is this the course gentlemen would advise for this Government—a Government distinguished for its love of justice and determination to do right—unambitious of conquest, unwilling to intrench upon the rights of others, merely anxious to retain her own? I hope, sir, no act of ours will ever work the forfeiture of this character. And now, Mr. Chairman, I should, in compliance with my promise to detain this Committee but a few minutes, be content to take my seat, but for the observations which fell from my colleague (Mr. PEARSON) on yesterday. Sir, in his then commentary on the speech of a former day, I must be allowed to say I could but admire the tenacity with which the gentleman adhered to the pledge by him before given; and I must also be permitted to express the great pleasure I feel at the generosity and magnanimity which my colleague has manifested—for, sir, he tells us, “Go all lengths with me in the course which I have chalked out, and then I will go a great way with you.” Sir, this is vastly generous, and for one I feel disposed to be very thankful to the gentleman for his accommodating spirit. My colleague, Mr. Chairman, appeared to be laboring to impress us with the belief that we did not owe protection even to our naturalized citizens, and with this view questioned the right of expatriation under any circumstances. Sir, the gentleman supposed a case which is directly at variance with the established usages of nations, which can alone fix the law—and from this case attempted to prove his position. “Suppose (says the gentleman) an American should leave his country, become naturalized according to the laws of England, would he be deprived of the right of holding lands in this country?” This, I say, sir, would entirely depend on the municipal regulations which might be enforced by the country which he has thus abandoned. Sir, it has nothing to do with allegiance. Sir, this is a fictitious case, and, applying it as the gentleman would wish, is indeed fiction all—we cannot serve two masters. Mr. Chairman, I request, I entreat gentlemen to give to this subject a moment’s serious reflection; to take a view of the embarrassment its rejection would give to the Executive; to view it dispassionately, and not suffer the warmth of their natures to get the better of their judgments. I hope, sir, the bill will pass: I am firmly impressed with the belief that its advantages will be many and lasting; and, so viewing it, shall give it my decided support.

Mr. RHEA followed Mr. KING in favor of the bill, and opposed the motion for striking out the first section.

Mr. BOYD was in favor of the principle of the bill, though he disliked the delay which prevented its being sooner proposed.

Mr. PICKENS.—Mr. Chairman, with the indulgence of the Committee, I will, in a few words, present you with my views upon this question.

The highest argument with me in favor of the bill, is in the intrinsic justice of the principle it contains, and its consistency with our own professions on the subject of impressment. This will appear evident from a fair view of the point of difference between us and our enemy on this subject. What is that point? It is this: Our Government has ever contended that its flag should protect the seamen employed under it. Great Britain asserts the right of seizing and impressing from on board our vessels her own subjects. Our position is supported by two conclusive reasons: 1. As the flag represents the sovereignty of the nation to which it belongs, any violence on those over whom it waves, is, through it, an act of war on the national sovereignty, and inconsistent with a state of dignified peace; 2. The power of making impressments from our vessels, is, from its very nature, liable to constant and serious abuse, which our experience has too strongly proved in the thousands of our citizens, native as well as naturalized, who have been seized as British subjects, and are now compelled to fight against their country. This reason urges itself more forcibly as respects Britain and America, whose inhabitants have the same language and manners, than it does between any other countries of the world, most of which have striking peculiarities from which their seamen may be distinguished. Whatever propriety, therefore, there might have been in former times in the exercise of the power which England styles “her ancient and accustomed practice of impressment,” as relates to other countries, reason and experience unite in declaring that, as respects America, it cannot be tolerated. If, then, our principle be correct, that the flag is to be viewed as the only criterion between our seamen and those of Britain; if it is to be a sanctuary to all persons employed under it; justice requires that those employed should be rightfully there; otherwise, we should act unjustly and inconsistently with our own principles. If we admit as seamen persons who are the rightful property of another State which may want them, and give them the protection of our flag, our Government becomes directly an instrument of injustice and injury to such other State, and will be bound, in justice and fair dealing, to make remuneration to the injured country, in the usual mode of dealing between nations.

It is a position, not denied, that a State has a right to the service of its citizens or subjects, until they shall have been regularly adopted by another country, and while they are without the jurisdiction of any nation. The only relation between an alien not naturalized and his new State arises from residence merely; and when that ceases, the relation ends. The moment he sets his foot beyond the jurisdictional limits of the State, he is subject to be reclaimed by his former Sovereign; provided it may be done without violating the real or representative sovereignty of an independent nation, its dominion, or its flag. To render just our side of the contest, it is, therefore, our duty to exclude from employment in our vessels, as seamen, the subjects of Great Britain not naturalized, and whom that nation wants. This is the leading object of the bill, and will embrace nine-tenths of the persons proposed by it to be excluded from naval employment. The only remaining class will be those aliens who may in future come into the country, and first become naturalized. Among this class you will find few seamen. Those who become citizens by five years' residence are of a different description. The whole class of persons excluded from the protection of our flag, as proposed by the bill, except such as justice and consistency already require, is merely nominal, and their exclusion is a mere question of policy, without any consideration of duty or obligation.

But, gentlemen have cited, with some emphasis, the conduct of England, whose navigation laws adopt as citizens the seamen of other countries, on their marriage in the Kingdom, or two years' residence. How this applies, I cannot see, unless, indeed, they consider the sanction of British policy too sacred to be departed from. I would, however, ask them, whether it would not be a more dignified policy in our Government to adopt a course which justice and prudence approved—pursue it ourselves, and enforce its observance by others—than to blunder on in the errors of other countries? But, if the terms of naturalization in England were equally favorable in all cases, we would still have the advantage in encouraging emigration, owing to the freedom of our laws, the variety of employment, and the price of labor. Among those who choose a regular residence here, and become entitled to the rights of citizens, seafaring men are rarely to be found. The only question is, whether the exclusion of this nominal class of persons, from employment in our vessels, will afford us advantages equivalent to those which would arise from their service? By the eighth section of the bill, its operation is confined to nations making a similar regulation, and desisting from impressment; yet, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) could see no provision relating to impressment, nor did he believe that such word was mentioned in the bill. The gentleman, however, is excusable, as it seems he never had read the bill until he opposed it.

The advantages from such an arrangement will be, to waive the long and useless disputes about expatriation; it will silence all doubts about the character of persons employed in our vessels. Wherever the American flag waves, we will all know, and surrounding nations will also know that it covers none but our own seamen: all temptation to violate it will cease. Should a man be touched by foreign hands, he will at once be identified as a son of this country; and I hesitate not to believe, that we will all defend him to the last extremity. For the protection of mere aliens, in the abstract, I protest against wasting the blood and property of my countrymen.

Another powerful reason in favor of such a measure is this: that it is incumbent on us so to define the grounds of contest, and present them in such a view, that we may stand justified in our own eyes, and in the eyes of the world. This is a duty every nation at war owes in justice to its own character, and which we can now discharge in no other way.

But, we are asked this common question by every one who has opposed the bill: Why adopt this measure now? The time forms a greater objection with many than the substance of the measure. From this, it has been viewed as a concession to the enemy—a retreat from the bold attitude which our country has assumed. A considerate retrospect of our affairs will prove the present session, of all other times, the most proper for defining by law our grounds of contest on this point.

This is the first session of Congress since our late disputes with England, which has found our principal grounds of difference narrowed down to the single subject of impressment. This has been one among the other very important matters under negotiation for five years past, until all amicable prospects vanished. About the commencement of the last session it was known, as well in England as America, that the spirit of our country was at length roused to a serious height. Then it was that the outrage on the Chesapeake, so long unatoned for, was adjusted. The Orders in Council and the practice of impressment remained, by which our property and our citizens were exposed to unlawful seizure. The former, affecting our interest, had been made the most serious subject of negotiation, for some years before the declaration of war, though the latter was a subject appealing more strongly to our humane interposition. The measures of last session were marked by features which could not be misunderstood by Great Britain, and finally war was declared. Very shortly afterwards, an excuse was mustered up, and the Orders in Council were repealed. Now we have convened, finding for the first time our grounds of the war, as respects the prospective, drawn to a single point, it therefore becomes us as a great and honorable nation to define our claims as regards that point, that we ourselves may understand it clearly; that our enemy may understand it; that the whole world may know, that while we will contend to the last extremity for our own rights, we want no other. This obligation was not so strongly imposed on us at the time of declaring war, as there existed then, exclusive of this, another ample cause of war, clearly defined and universally admitted to be such.

If, then, we are bound to define some claims in regard to impressments, how else can this be done than by a law proposing the terms on which we are willing to meet our enemy in peace? There are but two modes of defining and arranging our connexion with other countries; by treaty, or by municipal laws, regulating the conduct of our own citizens on the subject. As to the former, the door of expectation is shut. Negotiation has been incessantly tried on our part until the declaration of war, which was conclusive evidence that we believed all further essays would have been vain. To have passed a law while the prospect of a treaty was open, would have been impolitic, as it would expose our hand to our adversary. It, therefore, remains clear, that the only mode now left us of defining the grounds on which we contend, is by an act of the Legislature.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Regulation of Seamen.

H. OF R.

Having, then, in the only way in our power, defined the great question of controversy. I trust that, instead of retreating from the contest, all sides of this House, and all parts of this nation, will unite in defending, with their utmost energies, their undoubted rights.

It is strange that gentlemen should style an act of justice which a nation owes its own character, a concession, a retreat from its imposing attitude. The height of true bravery consists in selecting just and noble objects, and in attaining them at all hazards. On the other side, it may be asked, if justice and consistency with our own principles require the exclusion of alien seamen? Have we not acted unjustly in neglecting to make such exclusion heretofore? A sufficient answer will be found in our repeated essays to adjust this point by treaty. Having ever been ready and willing on our part, it lies not in the mouth of the enemy to complain.

My views as to the purpose and effect of this measure are somewhat different from those of my colleague, (MR. PEARSON,) who yesterday addressed you. He advocates the bill for the purpose of being used by the Executive as another advance to the British Government, and as it may have the effect of producing at least as good a treaty as that formerly agreed on by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney with the British Commissioners. Our advances have already gone far enough; a further advance on our part would be worse than vain. Nor do I see how my colleague can reconcile the passage of a law to exclude from our service British seamen, under strict rules and high penalties, while he would accept a treaty, which, if it meant anything on the subject of impressment, sanctioned this right of impressment from our vessels. The treaty alluded to was silent on the subject, yet a note from Lords Auckland and Holland, the British Commissioners, held out as a security from that evil, was merely a promise that caution should be used in exercising the right of impressment on board of our vessels, to make as few mistakes as possible. Now, if this was intended to mean anything, it was, in plain terms, a recognition of their right to seize persons on board of our vessels whom they might believe to be British subjects. If this bill goes into operation, it will answer the alleged purpose of impressment; as, if it excludes British seamen from our ships, it would be absurd to allow of the power of impressing them there; unless, indeed, we are willing to appeal from the judgments of our civil officers charged with this duty, and acting under the highest sanctions, to the caprice of every naval officer that meets our vessels, and who may pass on the character of our crews by inspection.

It is of much importance that, between England and America, this rule should become the invariable law, that the flag should protect the seamen under it; for there can be no other safe criterion by which the persons of the two countries can be identified. As to other nations, they have characteristics of language, of person, and of manners, less liable to mistake. Every argument of reason and humanity protests against leaving the fate of the freeborn sons of the country subject to the will of a British officer, whose mistakes, whether real or pretended, may jeopardize their liberties forever.

All the gentlemen opposed to the bill have treated it rather as if it were a Treaty of Peace than anything else. They charge it as an abandonment of our citizens heretofore impressed, and of other claims yet unsettled. Sir, the bill has nothing more in view than to define prospectively the grounds on which we propose to conduct our maritime intercourse when all causes in dispute shall have been satisfactorily settled. It proposes to sit, in future, foreign chaff from what is purely American. Instead of surrendering any one right, it will the better shield those we are bound to defend. It would form a distinct boundary to our own maritime rights, within which the national energies would forever intrench them from violation. Yes, sir, all within that boundary would be defended, while we had an inch of ground to support us. Purely American rights would be encircled about the American standard, and the national spirit would raise a wall of fire around them.

MR. McKIM spoke in favor of striking out the section; when the question was taken and lost without division.

MR. WRIGHT moved to strike out the eighth section of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"And be it further enacted, That if, after this act shall go into operation, any native or naturalized citizen of the United States shall be impressed from on board any ship or vessel sailing under the flag of the United States, or belonging to any such ship or vessel, on shore, the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized and required to cause to be seized any seaman of such nation, from on board any vessel of such nation, or in any port of the United States, and him place on board some one of the armed vessels of the United States, and there keep as a hand, until the American seamen as aforesaid impressed shall be given up."

MR. WRIGHT supported his proposition at some length, on the ground that if a peace should be the consequence of the passage of the bill, provision ought to be made for the protection of our own seamen, naturalized as well as native.

The proposition was opposed by Messrs. GRUNDY and BACON.

MR. RIDGELY moved that the Committee of the Whole rise, report progress, and have leave to sit again; which was carried, 55 to 40.

MR. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill to remit the claims of the United States to certain goods, wares, and merchandise, captured by private armed vessels; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, presented a bill supplementary to "An act to increase the Navy of the United States;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

[The bill proposes to authorize the building of six sloops of war, and four others for the Lake service, and to put out of commission, after the completion of these vessels, such of the gunboats as the public service may not require.]

Mr. BOYD, from the select committee appointed on the resolutions of the Legislature of the Illinois Territory, reported a bill to encourage the making of salt at the United States' saline, in the Illinois Territory, by the partial introduction of negroes therein; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, of their proceedings subsequent to their report of the 5th of February, 1812; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements of the annual payments on account of the public debt and of the Revolutionary government, prepared in obedience to a resolution of the 22d ultimo; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

An engrossed bill for altering the time for holding the District Court for the District of Maine was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEWTON communicated to the House the following letters:

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1813.

SIR: The object of my petition is to obtain a duty on the importation of all copper which shall have been manufactured into sheets or bolts. It is not with me an object, at present, to have a duty laid on copper wire; but I conceive there is, at least, every reason in favor of a duty on wire, that exists for a duty on sheets or bolts. At the same time that a duty is asked on copper so manufactured, I would suggest the leaving of copper, in a crude state, to be free from duty.

The materials which I have manufactured, have been copper in an unrefined state, which has been imported from the western coast of South America, from Buenos Ayres, from Caraccas, from Mexico, by way of Vera Cruz and Havana, and from the Levant. The quantity to be obtained from these places is ample for every purpose. The mines in this country, so far as they have been explored, have not furnished sufficient assurance that a supply can be obtained from them. But, were the manufacture of copper, from the crude state, more general in practice, the increased facilities would, probably, occasion the known mines to be wrought.

I do not know, with any degree of certainty, what quantity of copper, in all its forms, is consumed in this country; perhaps I am not far from the amount when I say, five hundred tons, annually.

I understand, from Mr. Revere, that he can manufacture, taking the material in a crude state, from one to two hundred tons. I can manufacture, with my works, in their present state, one hundred tons annually; and I can, if I consider the business as affording sufficient encouragement, construct them so as to double that quantity. Mr. Livingston, I suppose, can effect as much as either Mr. Revere or myself.

Considering the progress of these works, and that laying a duty will produce others, probably, I cannot doubt that works in this country will, at no distant period, be constructed to refine and manufacture as much copper as can be consumed in the United States.

With regard to a duty on crude copper, it may be a question whether the object of revenue, or encouragement to the infant manufacture, should preponderate. If, for the sake of revenue, a duty ought to be laid, I would conceive every doubt must be extinguished as to the policy of laying a duty on the material, in a higher state of manufacture. But, considering the uncertainty of an early resource in our own mines, and the assistance which manufactures require, in order to prosper in their first introduction into the country, I trust it will be judged good policy to extend to those now rising the advantage of having the crude material exempt from duty.

When the mines of this country afford an expectation that they will be adequate to our wants, it may then become a question whether the crude copper from Spanish America and the Levant may also be included among articles paying a duty.

I have not here the means of showing, and I cannot state, with absolute assurance of the fact, that a considerable quantity of the copper from South America has been usually manufactured in Great Britain. In former times, the most of that copper went to Cadiz; and, I believe, a considerable portion found its way to England. I have not thought it necessary to inquire particularly into this subject; but I believe from such loose information as I have, that the quantity which has gone usually to England was considerable.

Of late years, considerable quantities have been brought to this country, which, there being but very limited means of working here, have been shipped to Europe and to Canton, and I believe to some other places beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

It may be a question, whether, contemplating a duty, there should be a distinction between brazier's copper and sheathing copper and bolts. Sheathing copper and bolts being used for ship-building, I conceive to stand on the same footing, and I would suppose the same policy which requires a duty on sailcloth, hemp, cordage, and every other imported article necessary in constructing and fitting out a ship, will apply to copper. It need not be feared that this duty will depress, in any degree worthy of consideration, the shipping interest. The tonnage duty, and the duty on the articles mentioned, I consider equally objectionable. And here I would submit to the consideration of the committee, the object of having works which may, by their stock of copper in its various stages, necessarily on hand, together with apparatus and skilful workmen, not less important, afford a supply of this article indispensable in time of war, when we may not have the means of importing it.

The duty on sheathing copper may, in some degree, cause ships to be coppered in England, which, otherwise, would be coppered in this country. But this objection I set down as of little avail; for, if the copper is to be free of duty, whether in the hold or on the bottom of the vessel, the only advantage from bringing it in the vessel is, that our shipwrights will have the employment of fastening it on the vessel when it may arrive.

With regard to the duty on brazier's copper, it is to be considered that but an inconsiderable portion of brazier's copper is used for any other purpose than that of making stills. The duty on that copper amounts to little else than a tax on distillation.

I say, confidently, that the braziers cannot suffer anything of importance by a duty on brazier's copper,

The duty on brazier's copper will not give British braziers such an advantage as to enable them to compete with our braziers in making stills and other vessels, to be used in this country. The increased freight of hollow ware is greatly against the British brazier. The variety in the capacity, form, and weight of stills, and other vessels used here, would oblige the importers of such wares from England to import a great portion of unsaleable vessels.

The fact is, that, in this country, the stills are generally made in the towns adjacent to the respective distilleries, that the vessels may be adapted to the wants, to the circumstances, and to the caprice of the respective distillers; and if a large quantity of stills of any given form, capacity, or weight, or any assortment that could be preconceived, were imported, a great portion would, in general, be without purchasers. From the knowledge I have already acquired on the subject, I consider a tailor as having as much reason to fear that a duty on cloth will cause ready-made clothes to be imported from England, as that the braziers in this country have anything to fear from this duty.

I have stated that, with my present works, I can manufacture one hundred tons annually. I am not here prepared with testimony of this fact, but I will, if required, produce evidence which shall be satisfactory. The quality I state to be excelled by none.

I have now on hand about one hundred and seventy tons of crude copper. Should importations from England be free in a short space of time, and no duty be laid, an inundation of sheet copper may force me to seek a foreign market instead of having it manufactured, as in that case, I might not choose to contest with the British manufactures, which have been centuries in progressive improvement, and which have attained to such great perfection.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

LEVI HOLLINGSWORTH.

HON. THOMAS NEWTON,
Chairman Committee Commerce and Manufactures.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6, 1813.

SIR: The manufactory which I am interested in is capable, on its present establishment, to finish, with one set of workmen, three tons of copper a week, without any extension of works; by employing two sets of workmen, we could nearly double that quantity.

In the year 1800 or 1801, we had a contract with the Navy Department, for a quantity of bolts, sheets, &c., to the best of my recollection about 350,000 lbs., which we delivered in two years, without interfering with our ordinary business. From the best information I have obtained, there was imported, the last year, from England, into the United States, short of five hundred tons of copper; this I consider to be an unusual quantity, as the market had been nearly drained, from the operation of the non-intercourse and non-importation laws, and many persons, who had funds in England, ordered copper to be shipped, who have not heretofore been importers of that article; allowing, then, for argument, for it is impossible to be accurate without recurring to documents, that four hundred tons are wanted annually, Mr. Hollingsworth can manufacture one hundred tons, Mr. Livingston one hundred, and our establishment one hundred and fifty tons. There cannot a doubt exist but each of us could double the quantity, provided the Government should protect us by laying a duty, and, no doubt, other manufactures would be established.

We depend, for the raw material, from abroad, viz: from Smyrna, Sweden, and South America.

Crude copper being an article of export from those places, particularly Smyrna and South America, whenever the merchant can be assured of not sustaining a loss, he makes his remittance in copper, as there being no freight, the copper answering for ballast; therefore, in time of peace, we are sure of a sufficient supply, and should we be engaged in a long war, without doubt some of the mines in our country would be explored.

Notwithstanding the large quantity of copper raised in England, crude copper is always admitted when imported direct from the place of its origin.

When our revenue laws, regulating the duty on copper, were made, copper was not used in this country for building of vessels; in fact, at that time, it was only partially used in Europe. It has since become general, both in Europe and in this country; the law, therefore, could not provide for this article, otherwise it would, without doubt, as almost every article used in building and equipping vessels are subject to duty, say, cordage, duck, sheathing paper, and nails, &c. The law says, "copper in plates, pigs, and bars, free;" but it provides for all copper manufactures paying a duty. Under that section the collectors demanded a duty on bolts and sheathing copper; some importers contended that bolts and sheathing was plates and bars, and, by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, established it so. When our works were erected, bolts, particularly, were subject to duty, and the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made on our petition, showed that, in the year 1808, that committee was of the same opinion. I have not, in our petition, requested a duty on brazier's copper, from the opposition which our former petition met with from those gentlemen; although I have every reason to believe that they (the braziers) would not be injured by a duty, as brazier's copper has always been at an advanced price of sheathing copper, more than the difference of cost; the importer is the only person who can be affected, and he will only be obliged to resign part of his profits to the Government; and, I have reason to believe, the importers were really the persons that remonstrated to our former petition, although signed by the coppersmiths and braziers. Our wish, therefore, is, to have a duty that will protect our manufactories whenever the intercourse shall be restored between this country and England. For, whenever that event takes place, our manufactories will be destroyed, unless the Government protect them by a duty. Which is respectfully submitted, &c.

REGULATION OF SEAMEN.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill regulating the employment of foreign seamen in the armed vessels and in the merchant service of the United States.

Mr. RIDGELY made a speech of some length, explaining his ideas on this subject, and concluded with moving an amendment, the object of which was to provide that no person not a native should be employed in the service of the United States, until the period of probation of five years, required by our laws, should have been completed.

Mr. BIBB having remarked that this amendment only went to explain a provision of the bill not now perhaps sufficiently clear, it was adopted without a division.

Sundry other amendments were proposed by Mr. RIDGELY, and agreed to.

Other amendments were proposed to the bill, like that of Mr. RIDGELY, not affecting the principle, some of which were agreed to and others rejected, on which a desultory debate took place.

The most important amendment made to the bill, was the agreement of the committee to a motion made by Mr. ROBERTSON to strike out the last clause of the eighth section of the bill, which provides that the bill shall not have effect except as to the seamen of such nation as shall have made reciprocal arrangements as to the seamen of the United States.

About 4 o'clock, the Committee rose and reported the bill; and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 8.

Mr. BOND presented a resolution of the Legislature of the Illinois Territory, respecting preemption rights to lands in said Territory.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill regulating the fees of the constables in the county of Alexandria, within the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. POTTER, from the committee appointed on the petition of Daniel Updike, reported a bill authorizing the discharge of Daniel Updike from his imprisonment; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The bill authorizing the appointment of additional officers in the respective Territories of the United States, went through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill granting additional compensation to the Collector of the port and district of Plymouth, in North Carolina. The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

A message from the Senate was announced, of a confidential nature. The House was accordingly cleared of all strangers, and remained in secret session for two or three hours. When the doors were opened, a message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of John Redfield, jr.;" and a bill "to increase the salaries of certain district judges." And that the Senate have also passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election; in which two last-mentioned bills and resolution they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said resolution was read, and concurred in by the House; and Messrs. MACON, BASSETT, and MILNOR, were appointed the committee on the part of the House.

TUESDAY, February 9.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of George Neibinger and others; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported the bill from the Senate "giving further time for registering claims to lands in the eastern district of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana," with amendments; which were read, and, with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

On motion of Mr. BURWELL, the committee appointed on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, praying for a charter for a new bank, were discharged from the consideration of the said petition, and the petitioners had leave to withdraw their petition.

Mr. GOLD, from the committee appointed on the fifth instant, reported a bill to alter the times of holding the district courts in the respective districts of New York and Virginia, and to authorize the district judges to appoint commissioners to take affidavits and bail, in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of John Redfield, junior," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the report of the joint committee appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

Mr. MACON, from the joint committee appointed yesterday to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, made a report, in part; which was read, and concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock: that two persons be appointed tellers, on the part of this House, to make a list of votes as they shall be declared: that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Messrs. MACON and TALLMADGE were appointed tellers on the part of this House.

The bill from the Senate, for increasing the salary of the district judges of the Delaware and North Carolina districts having been read, and opposition being made to the bill by Mr. HARPER, the question was stated on the rejection of the bill; which was advocated by Mr. HARPER and others, and opposed by Messrs. BURWELL, BLACKLEDGE, RIDGELY, and others.

The argument for the rejection was, that it would be partial and unjust to raise the salary of one or two officers of the Government without raising all, and that this was not a proper time for increasing the salaries of our officers generally. On the other hand, it was contended that it was no argument against doing justice in one case, that other cases existed requiring relief or remedy.

The question was then taken on the rejection of the bill, and decided in the affirmative. For rejection 51, against it 44.

The bill authorizing the appointment of additional officers in the Territories of the United States, was read a third time.

The House divided on its passage; but a quorum not having voted, a motion was made to lay the bill on the table, and decided in the affirmative.

REGULATION OF SEAMEN.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill regulating the employment of foreign seamen in the armed vessels and merchant service of the United States.

All the amendments of the Committee were agreed to without objection, with the exception of the decision for striking out the eighth section of the bill, which is in the following words:

"SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall have no effect or operation with respect to the employment as seamen, of the subjects or citizens of any foreign nation, which shall not have prohibited on board her public and private vessels the employment, as seamen or otherwise, of native citizens of the United States; or who shall permit the commanders of her public vessels to impress or take away from on board any vessel, sailing under the flag of the United States, any seaman or any other person, not being a soldier or otherwise in the employment of an enemy of such nation."

A division of the question was required by Mr. GRUNDY on this amendment; and the question was stated on striking out the first member of the above section, ending with the words "United States."

After considerable debate on this proposition, the question on concurring with the committee in striking out the first clause of the eighth section, as above, was decided as follows:

YEAS—John Baker, Abijah Bigelow, Harmanus Bleecker, James Breckenridge, Elijah Brigham, William Butler, Epaphroditus Champion, Langdon Cheves, Martin Chittenden, Thomas B. Cooke, John Davenport, jun., John Dawson, Joseph Desha, Elias Earle, William Ely, James Emott, Asa Fitch, Thos. R. Gold, Charles Goldsborough, Thomas B. Grosvenor, Jacob Hufty, Richard Jackson, jr., Philip B. Key, Abner Lacock, Lyman Law, Joseph Lewis, junior, William Lowndes, Aaron Lyle, Archibald McBryde, Alexander McKim, James Milnor, Samuel L. Mitchell, Jonathan O. Moseley, Thomas Newbold, Stephen Ormsby, Joseph Pearson, Timothy Pitkin, jun., Elisha R. Potter, Josiah Quincy, John Randolph, William Reed, Henry M. Ridgely, Thomas B. Robertson, Thomas Sammons, John Sevier, Samuel Shaw, Richard Stanford, Philip Stuart, Lewis B. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Uri Tracy, Pierre Van Cortlandt, Laban Wheaton, Leonard White, and Thomas Wilson—56.

NAYS—Willis Alston, jr., William Anderson, Stevenson Archer, Daniel Avery, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, William Barnett, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, Adam Boyd, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, John C. Calhoun, Francis Carr, Matthew Clay, Jas. Cochran, John CLOPTON, Lewis Condict, Wm. Crawford, Richard Cutts, Roger Davis, Saml. Dinsmoor, William Findley, James Fisk, Meshack Franklin, Thos. Gholson, Peterson Goodwyn, Edwin Gray, Isaiah L. Green, Felix Grundy, Bolling Hall, Obed Hall, John A. Harper, Aylett Hawes, John M. Hyneman, Richard M. Johnson, Joseph Kent, William Kennedy, William R. Troup, Charles Turner, jun., Robert Whitehill, David R. Williams, William Widgery, Richard Winn, and Robert Wright—69.

So it was resolved that this clause or member of the section be not stricken out.

The question was then taken on striking out the remainder of the section, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, junior, William Anderson, Stevenson Archer, Daniel Avery, Ezekiel Bacon, William Barnett, William W. Bibb, Abijah Bigelow, Harmanus Bleecker, Adam Boyd, James Breckenridge, Elijah Brigham, William Butler, John C. Calhoun, Frs. Carr, Epaphroditus Champion, Langdon Cheves, Martin Chittenden, James Cochran, Thomas B. Cooke, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, Joseph Desha, Samuel Dinsmoor, Elias Earle, William Ely, James Emott, Asa Fitch, Thomas Gholson, Thomas R. Troup, Robert Whitehill, Wm. Widgery, and Robt. Wright—37.

So the latter clause of the eighth section was stricken out. Some other verbal amendments having been made,

Mr. PITKIN moved to strike out all the first section of the bill, except the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That, from and after the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged with the united Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, (which termination is to be ascertained and taken from the date of a proclamation, to be issued by the President of the United States, declaring the same,) all the officers, and three-fourths, at least, of all the persons who shall be employed as seamen or sailors on board any public ship or vessel of the United States, or any ship or vessel owned by citizens of the United States, shall be natural born citizens of the United States, or citizens thereof at the termination of such war, or servants or citizens of the United States, or persons, who, being resident in the United States, shall, at the time of passing this act, have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, according to the provisions of an act, passed on the 14th day of April, 1802, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject,' and shall have been admitted as such, according to the provisions of said act: Provided, however, That, during the continuance of the war now existing between the united Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and France, no persons, being natives of either of said countries, shall be employed, as officers, mariners, seamen, or sailors, on board the public ships or vessels of the United States, or the ships or vessels of citizens of the United States, unless such persons shall be citizens of the United States at the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged as aforesaid, or, being resident in the United States, shall, at the time of passing this act, have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and shall have been admitted as such, according to the provisions of the act herefore mentioned. And none but ships or vessels navigated according to the provisions of this act, and otherwise qualified according to law, and continuing to be wholly owned by citizens of the United States, shall be denominated and deemed ships or vessels of the United States, entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such ships or vessels."

And the House adjourned without deciding the motion.

WEDNESDAY, February 10.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that, owing to the indisposition of Mr. GAILLARD, the Senate have appointed Mr. FRANKLIN the teller, on their part, at the counting of the votes of the Electors for President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Susanna Wiley; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the same committee, reported the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Lewis Clacherie," without amendment. The bill was then committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1813; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. MILNOR presented a petition of John Bioren, W. J. Duane, and R. C. Weightman, praying the aid and patronage of Congress in printing a new and complete edition of the laws of the United States; which was referred to a select committee. Messrs. MILNOR, CHEVES, and GOLD, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, reported a bill extending the time for issuing and locating Virginia military land warrants; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the employment of foreign seamen in the service of the United States. But, after some desultory conversation, the hour having approached for counting out the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The hour of 12 having arrived, the Senate entered the Hall of Representatives, preceded by their President, Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper, and proceeded to seats prepared for them—the members of the House having risen to receive them, and remaining standing until all had entered. The President of the Senate took a seat which had been prepared for him at the Speaker's right hand, and the Secretary of the Senate was placed beside the Clerk of the House. The Tellers—Mr. FRANKLIN of the Senate, and Messrs. MACON and TALLMADGE of the House—were seated at a table in front of the Speaker's chair.

The President of the Senate then proceeded to open and hand to the Tellers the sealed returns from each State, which were severally read aloud by one of the Tellers, and noted down and announced by the Secretaries of each House.

The votes having all been opened and read, the following result was announced from the Chair by the President of the Senate, viz:

The President of the Senate, in pursuance of the joint resolutions of the two Houses, then announced the state of the votes to both Houses of Congress, and declared "That JAMES MADISON, of the State of Virginia, was duly elected President of the United States, for four years, to commence on the fourth day of March next; and that ELBRIDGE GERRY was duly elected Vice President of the United States, for the like term of four years, to commence on the said fourth day of March next."

The two Houses then separated, and the Senate returned to their Chamber.

THURSDAY, February 11.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee, on their part, to join such committee as this House may appoint on their part to wait upon the President of the United States, and to inform him of his re-election, for four years, to commence on the fourth day of March next.

REGULATION OF SEAMEN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill excluding foreign seamen from the service of the United States.

Mr. PITKIN's motion to strike out the first section of the bill, for the purpose of inserting a proposed amendment, being still under consideration, considerable discussion took place on it; but it was eventually withdrawn to give way to the following motion.

Mr. RIDGELY moved to strike out of the first section all the words in brackets, as follows:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the termination, by a treaty of peace, of the war in which the United States are now engaged with Great Britain, it shall not be lawful to employ as seamen, or otherwise, on board of any public vessel of the United States, or of any vessel owned by citizens of the United States, or sailing under their flag, any person or persons, except natural born citizens of the United States, or citizens of the United States at the time of such treaty being made and concluded, [or persons who, being resident within the United States at the time of such treaty, and having previously declared, agreeably to existing laws, their intention to become citizens of the United States, shall be admitted as such within five years thereafter in the manner prescribed by law.]

After some conversation, the motion was negatived by yeas and nays—for it 40, against it 80, as follows:

John Taliaferro, Peleg Tallman, Uri Tracy, Charles Turner, junior, Robert Whitehill, William Widgery, Richard Winn, and Robert Wright.

Mr. PIRKIN then renewed his motion to strike out the first section, for the purpose of inserting his substitute.

Mr. BACON said: that, anxious as he was to render the provisions of the bill acceptable to gentlemen on all sides of the House, and particularly so to those from whom he had generally differed in political sentiment, he had paid the most respectful attention to every suggestion coming from that quarter which seemed to have a tendency either to improve its details, or to render it as little objectionable in principle as possible. He believed that the particular friends of the bill had acted generally under the same dispositions, and they had accordingly very readily adopted almost every proposition coming from the other side of the House which had as yet been suggested—it was in the same spirit that he had paid the most important attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, and to the arguments by which he had endeavored to enforce it. Mr. B. confessed that on the first view, the amendment proposed had impressed him rather favorably, and if he had continued to view it in the same light, he would not have hesitated giving it his support. A little reflection had, however, very fully convinced him, that neither as a fundamental regulation of mercantile policy, or as adapted to suit the difficulties at present existing on the subject of our seamen, was it as judicious a system as that which formed the basis of the original bill. Mr. B. would have remarked, that whatever sentiments might heretofore have been entertained by the gentleman, (Mr. PIRKIN,) he was happy now to hear him acknowledge, that the Government evinced at this time a disposition, in order to meet the existing difficulties with Great Britain, to go much further in the exclusion of foreign seamen from our service than he (Mr. PIRKIN) thought either wise or necessary, and he was glad that an opportunity had arrived by which the majority of the House could evince their sincerity in wishing to do everything in their power to remove every plausible ground of complaint on the subject of harboring or employing British seamen in our public or private vessels; in truth, that we were willing to subject ourselves to greater inconveniences, in order to take away the grounds on which the British claim of impressment rested, than the gentleman himself thought we could justly be required to do. With this remark, Mr. B. said, he would proceed to state the objections which he had to the system which had been proposed by the gentleman in lieu of the one contained in the bill itself.

By the first section of the bill it is proposed, after the termination of the present war, to exclude altogether from our service the seamen of all foreign nations who may make a reciprocal exclusion of our seamen from their service. The effect of such a provision will be, in the first place, to remove all the grounds on which the claim of impressment has heretofore been founded. In the second place, to afford additional safety and encouragement to our own seamen; and though some small inconveniences may at first arise from a scarcity of hands, by throwing the foreign seamen out of our employ, yet the greater demand and higher wages will very soon remedy this deficiency, by drawing a greater number of our own people into the employment, whose services we can at all times command; whatever may be the state of things among the maritime nations of Europe, we shall have a nursery of our seamen always on hand ready for our own use, and which those nations will at no time have a right to claim or withdraw from our service. As the demand for the service will be uniform, steady, and constant, so will be the supply. But, what is the nature of the regulation proposed by the amendment, and what will be its effects? It is proposed by that, to admit into our service during periods of peace in Europe a proportion of foreign seamen to the extent of one-fourth of the whole crew; but it being evident that a regulation to that extent would in no degree remove the grounds on which the British claim to impressment is founded, the gentleman further proposes, that during the existing war between France and Great Britain, all foreign seamen, the subjects of either of those nations, should also be wholly excluded; and a provision of this sort must be equally necessary during all future wars between those nations. Let us now see what must be the inevitable effect of such a policy, as it would affect our own service and seamen. It would be to draw into our service the seamen of those nations, and to find for them wages and employment at a period when they were not wanted at home to man the navies of their own country, and at the same time holding ourselves bound to give them up the first moment that they might be called to enter into the service of their lawful Sovereigns on the breaking out of a European war, and this too at a period when most of all we should need them for our own service; for it was during a state of European war, and while we might be at peace, that the commerce of this country had its greatest expansion and required the greatest number of seamen to carry it on, as it was during periods of European peace that it was the most limited and required the fewest hands in our service. The inevitable effect of a system of this sort must therefore be, to make our own neutral commerce a nursery for the employment of British and French seamen, when their own countries could not afford them employment; to throw our own out of employ at a time when they needed it the most, and to train up a body of skilful mariners to be delivered up to their owners whenever they wanted them the most, and we ourselves could with the least convenience spare them. If either of those nations should be asked to dictate to us that course of policy on that subject, which would be the most promotive of their own views and interests, and at the same time the most prejudicial to our own, it seemed to him that it would be precisely the one which was now recommended to us by the proposition of the gentleman from

H. OF R.

Connecticut; though such, undoubtedly, were not the gentleman's views in offering it. Mr. B. said, that if those nations were either of them disposed to permit the reciprocal employment of ours and their seamen at all times, both when they were at war and in peace, there could on our part probably be not so great objections to it, but it surely could not be expected that we would provide for their employment only when they are not wanted at home, and relinquish them whenever they happen to be so wanted. If they would not let us have them when we most needed them, he was for excluding them altogether, or leaving the subject to be provided for by such mutual arrangement as the interest of both parties might call for, and as might be entered into by the executive authorities of each country, as was contemplated by a subsequent section of the present bill.

A further objection to the amendment under consideration was, that on the face of it, it did not hold out equal and impartial terms to all foreign nations; it proposed a distinction in favor of the two great belligerent nations, which it was neither wise nor prudent to make; and though we have at present no difficulties with other nations in relation to the employment of their seamen, still we ought not by partial propositions to excite their jealousy, or attempt particular regulations which the great principles of impartial justice would not justify: no objections of this sort would apply to the bill itself; it proffered a system of regulations which every other nation might have the benefit of if they pleased to reciprocate them, and if they chose not to do it they had no cause of complaint.

It had been objected to the system proposed by the bill, that a total exclusion of all foreign seamen from our service would be found impracticable; at any rate, would be found, if adopted at once, very inconvenient to the mercantile interest of the country, particularly in cases where, from death, desertion, or other casualties, happening in foreign ports, the crews of American vessels might be so reduced as to induce the necessity of employing a portion of foreign seamen to navigate the vessels home.

To this objection, Mr. B. thought it was a sufficient answer to say, that so far as it affected the employment of British or French seamen, the project of the gentleman from Connecticut was equally objectionable, since he also proposed, during the existing war in Europe, totally to exclude the seamen of those nations from our employment. But, as the bill stood, no such difficulty in practice could reasonably be apprehended. In the first place, there was no probability that any other nation, except Great Britain, would feel an interest or a disposition to make reciprocal exclusions; of course, we should still be left at liberty to employ, as heretofore, the seamen of all other nations, whenever we needed them. But even if every foreign nation, including Great Britain, should be disposed to meet us with a general reciprocal exclusion—it would also be for their interest, as well as ours, to provide by mutual arrangement, which the President was authorized to make, by a subsequent section of the bill, for the mutual employment of each other's seamen at times, under the particular circumstances which had been alluded to; and the mutual interests and conveniences of the respective parties he thought might be safely relied upon, to produce mutual accommodations on a point of this sort. Upon the whole, Mr. B. said, he saw no insurmountable difficulties which time, experience, and the mutual interests of every nation, who should meet the system proposed by the bill generally, would not induce them to remedy; it cut up by the roots the great ground of collision at present existing between this country and Great Britain, and in it he thought he saw a ground which, if suitably and sincerely improved by the Executive authority of each country, might form the basis of an accommodation not dishonorable or prejudicial to the true interests of either; and in that view, principally, the success of the bill had from the first proposition of it commanded his most anxious wishes. Had the amendment under consideration presented nothing objectionable in itself, or repugnant to the general principle and policy of the bill, he would have cheerfully voted for it, on the ground of mutual accommodation, for which he was disposed, on the present occasion, to go very far in giving up his own particular opinions. He hoped the adoption of the amendment was not necessary to conciliate the mover or his friends generally to vote for the bill. If, however, this final opposition to it was to be expected, if this particular amendment should be rejected, however much he should regret the loss of their votes, he must determine to meet it, and was willing to be tested by the intrinsic merit of the different propositions between which they were left to choose.

When Mr. BACON had concluded, after some further discussion, the question was taken and decided in the negative. For the proposed amendment 33, against it 86, as follows:

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. STOW then moved that the further consideration of this bill be indefinitely postponed, assigning, as a reason, the difficulty in which he found himself as to the vote he ought to give on the bill.

Mr. GRUNDY opposed the postponement, alleging that it would be infinitely better for gentlemen to meet the question directly than evade it in the way proposed.

Mr. WRIGHT advocated the indefinite postponement, on the ground of his hostility to the bill, and the time it unnecessarily wasted, which ought to be devoted to the consideration of more essential questions.

Mr. RHEA was opposed to the postponement because he was friendly to the bill.

Mr. LACOCK said he should vote against postponement, although he was opposed to the bill, because it was a respect he owed to his friends, who were in favor of it, to meet the question directly.

The question on indefinite postponement was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 100, as follows:

The question having been required on engrossing the bill—

Mr. BASSETT proposed to amend the bill by inserting after the word "treaty," on the execution of which the law is to have effect, the words "which shall secure the United States against the claim of impressment."

Discussion arising on this amendment, and appearing likely to continue—

Mr. GRUNDY avowed his conviction that the House would agree to no further amendment, and that further consideration and discussion would serve no other purpose than to waste the time of the House, required the previous question. This question, which cannot be debated, if carried in the affirmative, precludes debate or amendment. The question was decided in the affirmative—yeas 55, nays 46.

The question was then put in the following form, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?" and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

The main question was then taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 25, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 12.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from the petition of Dr. Benjamin Waterhouse, and from the letter from John Hills; and the petition and letter were referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, in part, a bill to establish an elementary exercise for the infantry of the Militia and Army of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to each person who shall perform actual service in the militia for the space of — months, in the Territory of Missouri, under the orders of the Executive of said Territory, — acres of land in the said Territory, which shall be in full for the services of such militia for the time aforesaid; and that said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

REGULATION OF SEAMEN.

The bill for excluding foreign seamen from the public vessels and merchant service of the United States, was read a third time, and the question was stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. CLOPTON.—Mr. Speaker, before this question is taken, I beg leave to submit a few observations. It was not my wish to trouble the House with any at all upon this subject; but finding myself to stand in a peculiar situation in voting differently from a very large proportion of those gentlemen, with whom I have generally acted, particularly on important subjects, I feel it to be a sort of duty, which I owe to myself, to state some of the reasons at least which influence me in the vote which I have already given and am about to give on the bill before you. It is not my intention, sir, to enter into a discussion of the merits or policy of the bill taken in the abstract; but merely to declare some of the objections which I have to the bill, in reference to the existing crisis and circumstances of this country, and which to my mind are insurmountable.

This bill, it seems, Mr. Speaker, is to take effect on a future contingency, if it shall ever take effect at all. It looks forward to a state of peace. How, sir, is this state of peace to be brought about? It must, if ever, be brought about through the means of negotiation, commencing either with the enemy or with our own Government.

Is it contemplated by this bill that the Executive of this country is to make further overtures for peace?—that the Government of this much injured, long insulted nation, after having been driven by so unparalleled a series of injuries and insults to vindicate its rights by a solemn appeal to arms—is it contemplated by this bill that, after the sneering, contemptuous, insulting, rejection of the proposition lately made by the Executive branch of this Government, this very Executive is to send out further propositions to that same sneering, insulting Minister, inviting him to condescend to enter into a negotiation upon the subject of peace, or upon any other subject? I trust it is not so contemplated. I say, sir, I trust it is not so contemplated. This I do merely from my own ideas of the evident vast impropriety of such a course—not from anything I discover in the bill itself. I do most sincerely hope, sir, that neither the present Executive nor any future Executive of this country will ever be so unmindful of the dignity of this nation—so unmindful of his own duty—will ever so far humiliate himself or his country as to be the first to make further propositions to the enemy for negotiating a settlement of the existing differences. No, sir, let the war continue—let it rage to the end of time, rather than let any more propositions for that purpose originate with this Government.

Is it contemplated that peace will be brought about in consequence of overtures from the enemy? And is it intended that peace shall be accepted without any arrangement providing against impressment of American seamen? Is it possible that it can be in the contemplation of this bill that such a sort of peace shall be made? Here again I trust so great a disgrace to this country cannot be contemplated. I trust that so signal a disgrace will never be brought upon this country. It is presumable, however, that some object in reference to the enemy must be sought for in the adoption of the regulations (as they are called) of this bill. If so, I conceive of none which can be rationally thought so likely to be aimed at by this bill, as that of inducing the enemy to enter into some arrangements with this Government on the subject of impressments. I apprehend, therefore, I may consider this bill as a lure held out to him for that purpose. As such I cannot but consider it. But, sir, can it be seriously believed that the provisions of this bill will induce that haughty tyrant and despoiler of our seamen's rights to come out with a distinct proposition for arranging this subject as we contend for it, and put a stop to the abominable practice? No, sir; such an event may be as vainly sought for after this bill shall have been passed, as it has been sought for heretofore. This bill will be treated with as much contempt, as much scorn and insult, as the proposition made by the Executive through Mr. Russell was treated with; and the British Ministry will think too that they may indeed pour contempt upon it with a better grace; for the very reason that the proposition so offered had been treated in such a manner by them. They will view this bill as a proposition legislatively offered and aiming at the same object as that made by the Executive aimed at—and they will be as little disposed to accede to this as they were to accede to that. I confess for one, sir, that I am altogether unwilling to put it in their power to gratify themselves again in this way. Never should they, with my consent, humble, obscure or unimportant as I may be—never should they, with my consent, have another opportunity of indulging their contemptuous sentiments upon any act of this Government done in relation to them—never should they have another opportunity of treating with scorn and contumely any overture or proposition of this Government made to them either directly or indirectly, legislatively or executively; because none such ever should be made to them; although I freely acknowledge it would be proper enough for this Government to receive propositions from them and to treat such propositions according to their merits.

Under all the existing circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I cannot look upon this bill as being any way consistent with what truly belongs to the dignity of this nation. Pass this bill, and I fear you will lower, greatly lower the dignity of this nation. You will sink it in the estimation of the world; and, what is worse, you will sink it in its own estimation. What, sir! shall the injured party—a party deeply and vitally injured by innumerable violations of some of its most important rights, and forced to the last solemn, awful resort for redress—shall this very party, thus deeply and vitally injured, come forward with a formal act of legislation to soothe the aggressor, and by this means endeavor to entice him to a negotiation? As one individual of this body I freely declare, sir, that I cannot—I will not consent to such a measure. The wrongs accumulated upon this country from time to time, until they had risen to mountain height, compelled us to draw the sword; and let it be forever drawn rather than endeavor to have it sheathed by this means—even if there were a prospect of its being attended with some degree of success, so as to induce the enemy to listen to the voice of reason and justice—much less when the measure promises no sort of chance for effecting any desirable object, but can only afford scope and opportunity for fresh insult and contempt from the enemy. No, sir; let us march on directly forward in prosecution of this contest, and let it be pursued with all possible vigor and energy until the enemy, convinced of his error or tired of persisting in his unrighteous course, shall come forward himself with propositions for opening negotiation upon such ground as may lead to peace, upon terms just and honorable to this nation. Let this be done, and let arrangements in consequence of it be made between the two nations upon the subject of seamen; when this shall have been done, then will it be time enough to pass such a bill as this, if it shall ever be expedient to do so. I do not mean now to express an opinion as to the expediency of such a measure at any time. My present impressions, however, are, that it is extremely doubtful whether it will ever be expedient to adopt the regulations proposed by this bill. At any rate, until some such arrangements shall be made by treaty, I cannot consent to vote for such a bill as this.

As to the ideas, which seem to have been entertained by some gentlemen, that this bill may have a beneficial tendency in respect to those opposed to the war—that it may propitiate and reconcile many to the measure who are not now willing to support the war, I consider such ideas as altogether chimerical and illusory. They will not, in my opinion, be realized by this bill. Therefore, I entertain no sort of expectation of any benefit to be derived from the bill in this respect. Indeed, sir, in no respect whatever do I calculate on any beneficial result from it; but, on the contrary, I fear it may be of injurious tendency.

Do gentlemen expect that the extreme solicitude and anxiety for peace which this bill indicates, will accelerate the return of it? If such be their expectation I am firmly persuaded, sir, that they will find themselves sadly disappointed. It is a wily, insidious foe that we have to contend with—a foe that watches all the movements of this Government and will take his measures accordingly. If you show a disposition to relax on any point, and by so relaxing to tender to him a ground of conciliation, he will for that reason be the more disposed to hold off and refuse to meet you on that ground. It is, therefore, to my mind another very strong objection to this bill that it manifests too much anxiety for peace. It is better, sir, that your proceedings indicate indifference towards this object than that they indicate much anxiety for it. You will obtain it sooner, and obtain it honorably, by giving the former complexion to your proceedings, than by giving to them the latter complexion.

There is another point of view in which this subject ought to be considered. As the regulations in regard to the employment of seamen, as proposed by this bill, were not adopted previous to the declaration of war, will not the adoption of them at this time be considered as a tacit acknowledgment that we had not done as much as we ought to have done before that step was taken?

After this bill shall have been passed I think, sir, it will be difficult to screen it from this imputation. If this imputation fastens itself to the bill, how shall we stand then? Surely, sir, our ground will be changed very much for the worse. It will then be said, why was not this step taken before war was resorted to? Were I to vote for this bill I confess that I should be much puzzled, much staggered to answer this question in a manner satisfactory to my country or to myself. But I say, sir, and I say it confidently, that not only enough, not only as much as ought to have been done on the part of this Government, but abundantly more than could be reasonably required of it, was done by it to preserve peace and avoid war, before war was resorted to—before it was declared. Hence I am very averse to an act which may be construed into anything like evidence of a contrary conviction; and more especially too when such act promises no manner of benefit whatever, but may, I fear, be productive of injurious consequences.

Mr. WRIGHT followed, at considerable length, in opposition to the bill.

Mr. LITTLE.—Mr. Speaker, I rise, indeed, with diffidence, to address the House upon the novel and important bill now under consideration; sensible how difficult it is to rivet the attention of its members, more especially by one whose powers are so feeble as mine are. It is no pleasant task to address empty seats, or groupes of gentlemen, inattentive listeners, surrounding the fires, whose minds are long since made up, and whom nothing that I can say will influence to change their opinions. I am urged, notwithstanding, from a strong sense of duty, which I owe to that portion of my fellow-citizens whom I have the honor in part to represent, to trespass upon your patience a few minutes, while I assign the reasons which dictate the vote I shall give on this question. My colleagues on both sides of the House have entered the lists of debate, and we presume measurably speak the sentiments of their constituents. As I differ in opinion on this subject with my immediate colleague, who usually sits on my left, (Mr. McKIM,) I shall now proceed to notice the objections urged by him to the passage of the bill on your table. He said, "he believed, if you adopt this measure, you will not have seamen sufficient to man our vessels." If, indeed, this were true, I myself should pause ere it should have my vote. This objection, if well founded, would most probably produce a negative of this House to the passage of the bill. It is easy, sir, to make a declaration. In our zeal of advocating or opposing a measure, we find no difficulty in persuading ourselves, at least, to its adoption or rejection. We but too frequently deceive ourselves. What are the facts from which we are to draw this conclusion? None have been given by my honorable colleague. In his honest zeal—I hope he will pardon me—he must have deceived himself. Permit me to call your attention to a document spread upon your table, which I believe is in the possession of every gentleman on this floor, that will afford us a light from which information may be derived touching this point, and which may direct our judgments. It is a report of the Secretary of State, dated the 6th of January last, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 30th of December preceding. I will not trouble the House by reading it in detail. It contains a statement of the number of persons born in foreign countries, who have been legally naturalized in the United States, and registered annually as American seamen. From the year 1796 to 1812, inclusive, the aggregate number only amounts to 1,530—a period of seventeen years. Thrice that number of American citizens, within the same period of time, have lost their lives in the service of Great Britain, into which they were forced, and retained contrary to their will or wishes, fighting her iniquitous battles.

I beg leave to call your attention to another authentic document connected with this subject. It is the report of the Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution of this House, at the last session of Congress, which I then had the honor to submit, stating the actual number of American seamen forcibly detained in the British service, and who had made application for their release. This list amounted to upwards of 6,000. This number has been attempted to have been shown as greatly exaggerated by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. EMOTT,) on a former day. Sir, I believe it falls far short of the actual number, even at this time, forcibly held in the service of our enemy, inhumanly compelled to raise their hands against the lives of their kindred, and the liberties of their country. I do not make this assertion upon light grounds. I personally know four native Americans whose names are not on that list; and, when we consider the difficulty with which an American can reach his country's ear with his complaints, as will be seen by the communication of the President, made to Congress on the 22d of January last, transmitting copies of correspondence between John Mitchell, agent for American prisoners of war at Halifax, and the British Admiral commanding at that station, to which I refer the House; also a copy of a letter from Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy, which letter I will read:

"U. S. FRIGATE PRESIDENT,
"Boston, January 13, 1814.

"SIR: Herewith you will receive the muster books of His Britannic Majesty's vessels Moselle and Sappho, found on board the British packet Swallow.

"As the British have always denied that they detained on board their ships of war American citizens, knowing them to be such, I send you the enclosed, as a public document of their own, to show how illy such an assertion accords with their practice. It will appear by these two muster books, that, so late as August last, about an eighth of the Moselle and Sappho's crews were Americans; consequently, if there is only a quarter part of that proportion on board their other vessels, they have an infinitely greater number of Americans in their service than any American has yet had an idea of.

"Any further comment of mine on this subject I consider unnecessary, as the enclosed documents speak but too plainly for themselves. I have the honor to be, &c.

"JOHN RODGERS."

From these two circumstances, I think I may with truth say, that there cannot be less than from 15,000 to 20,000 American seamen in the British service—more than twice as many as are now employed in the sea service of the United States, both public and private. The facility given to naturalization—as has been said by some is given, and in seventeen years to receive but 1,530—will allow but few, very few, indeed, of foreigners in our service. The bill does not contemplate giving up those who are naturalized. The few British subjects now in our employ, (if any such there really are,) will not of itself induce England to a peace, thereby obliging herself to give up one-eighth of her present naval force. It is not to be expected until she shall seriously feel the effects of the war.

At the last session of Congress, a resolution was offered by a gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) on this subject. It became my lot to be a member of the committee to whom it was submitted for consideration. An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. REED) was of the number whose opinions and information have been frequently quoted in this House as orthodox in mercantile affairs, for which I confess I have a high respect. He said, if you exclude from our sea service foreign seamen, you will have natives in abundance to navigate our vessels; for, said he, adopt this principle, and you will secure them from impressment, which will render a security that will influence many who are now deterred from risking their freedom in traversing the ocean for subsistence. I was strongly impressed with the force of his remarks, but I could not bring my mind to bear at that time, nor can I at this, nor will, I trust, at any future, to make a distinction between my fellow-citizens, recognised as such by our Constitution and laws.

This hypothesis, if it be true, so far as is conformable to the provisions of this bill, connected with the exchange of seamen, cannot otherwise than increase their number to double what it now is—an influx more than sufficient for all our commercial pursuits, and to man our Navy, and (if it can be adduced as an argument) will lessen seamen's wages—a circumstance frequently complained of by our most wealthy merchants. I have always thought the hardy tar earned his wages, while enriching his employers.

The second objection urged by my immediate colleague is drawn from the conclusion of his first, to wit:—"That privateering has been discouraged for want of seamen at this time."

I will not pretend to say that this is not partially true; that it is to any extent which, in itself, can operate against the war on our side, I am too much of a sceptic to believe. Had my friend permitted his fertile imagination to have sought out the prominent cause, he would have told you the double duties and the heavy expenses incurred with their prizes going through the formal condemnation of courts of law, with the manner of their disposal under the direction of courts, leave so small a profit as will not justify the risk of life or loss of property in this hazardous system of warfare.

To these circumstances must we attribute the want of enterprise. Render privateering profitable by your statutes; let Government encourage them by suitable bounties—I do not mean such as you give to your soldiers on land, who get paid whether they fight or not, whether successful in battle or unsuccessful—but when seamen are thus employed, let them have what they do conquer, who, from the nature of their engagements, get no reward other than that which chance may afford them an opportunity to acquire by their valor and intrepidity, which is nearly swallowed by your statutes. Remove this evil, and you will not want seamen to man your privateers, nor capitalists of enterprise to fit them out. From this cause alone have some of our private armed vessels been dismantled or their characters changed. I might say more on this subject, but it would not be strictly adhering to the question before the House.

Again, says my immediate colleague—"The principle contained in the bill has been offered twenty years ago;" and emphatically asks, "is there no end to insult? for it has been rejected."

He must allude to the propositions made to the Court of London, through Mr. Russell, on the subject of impressment, and those of his predecessors, who, from time to time, represented the United States of America in that country.

If I am right in my conjectures, which I cannot doubt, I have not heard any objections made to that proposition, either as to the manner of its being made, or the principle contained in it, by him, or any other gentleman on this side of the House. Does that proposition, let me ask my honorable colleague, or any other gentleman who has opposed this bill, contain that which goes to relinquish a single right of America, or impair our interest? We would have been told so if it did. No, sir, it gives up no right; it impairs no interest. Whence, then, the insult offered? If the nation would have been satisfied with the cessation of hostilities, and a treaty of peace, bottomed on those principles, I would again ask my friend, and the honorable members of this House, would they not have been acceptable to all? No doubt of it. Whence, then, the insult? I will not dwell upon this part of his remarks, but hasten to his last ground of objection, on which he stands singly prominent. I do not recollect of its having been urged by any other gentleman.

"If this bill passes," said he, "it will have a pernicious effect on those who support the war. It will paralyze your loans, and every other measure which has been adopted in its support."

Thus, by one fell swoop, has my colleague not only paralyzed, but attempted to cut up by the roots the bill in its infant state. It has, however, fortunately withstood the shock, and, as it increases in age, so does it acquire strength.

This was but an assertion—it will paralyze the war—and unsupported by any argument. Not a solitary reason has been assigned upon which this declaration is grounded. In answer thereto, I might satisfy myself by simply denying that it is calculated to produce any such effect.

This bill, instead of the fatal events predicted by my immediate colleague, must produce one of two effects: either union at home and vigorous prosecution of the war, or peace. Are not they desirable? I do not anticipate the latter to flow from it at this day. No, sir, a Government so forgetful of the rights of others, and possessing the almost entire command of the seas and oceans of the world, I cannot flatter myself will admit a principle of perfect reciprocity in a commercial point of view with any nation, much less this, which has always been considered by her as a rival in commerce. It is by the former, that is, a vigorous prosecution of the war, alone, that I can anticipate acquiring an honorable, and I fondly hope, a lasting peace for my injured and hitherto much insulted country. From this, my conscientious view of the bill, in relation to the declaration of my honorable colleague, as paralyzing the war, I cannot be considered as adding a pang to the poignant feelings and lacerated honor of my native land. Sir, I am wedded to its soil for life; its natural productions are inviting. I will never prevail on myself to leave them for that of any other; its Government maintaining to all its citizens rational liberty. To be compelled to change its form for that of the corrupt and towering monarchies of the ancient world, to me, would be death. Yes, sir, a combination of love, honor, and gratitude, binds every American heart to be faithful to its interests, and hold inviolate its sacred Constitution; and I humbly trust, that so long as it shall please Him who gave me being, to permit reason to direct my mind, I shall not, by any act of mine, infringe either. I repeat, I will not paralyze the war; I will not succumb to the enemy. This bill will operate reciprocally if it becomes a law. We retain from foreign nations the use of our seamen, and they retain from us their seamen. This agreement will be much in our favor if it ever shall be acceded to.

Where, let me ask you, Mr. Speaker, is the honest American, then, who feels indignant at the violation of honor; who feels for the injuries heaped upon his country? All such must take their stands, fight, and conquer. Thus far have I gone; I go no further. This will, I think, be their language, and he who will not hold it, illy indeed deserves the name of an American.

My honorable colleague (Mr. WRIGHT) has opposed this bill in all its stages with his usual zeal and eloquence. His philanthropy has carried him so far, if I understood him, as to fight the cause of the oppressed of the whole world. To prevent them from enjoying all the privileges of native born citizens, would in fact be a violation of their rights after they had come into this country. Thus far, with him, I would afford them protection under our forms of law. Their personal liberty should not be invaded; and, when naturalized, they ought to participate in directing the affairs of this nation so long as they remained with us.

Beyond our territorial limits I am not willing to extend my obligation to follow those to whom, as yet, I am not united as fellow-citizens. For protection against the Government of the country which gave them birth, or any other, I perhaps would not be justifiable in hazarding my own peace, much less that of my country, were I to attempt it at this or any future day.

We owe much to ourselves. It is a maxim inculcated to us in early life—protect yourself, and your own household. So in public; the safety and tranquillity of the State should be the chief care of every one in authority. This being the Government of the people, it equally becomes their duty to avoid everything they can consistent with honor and justice which could impair either in the most remote degree.

Mr. Speaker, compacts are seldom entered into on any other principle than reciprocal benefits. Our naturalization system and regulations should be bottomed on the same principle, both in relation to the Government as well as the people, in their individual character. It is a fact, which will not be denied, that many foreigners come to this country, remain sufficiently long among us to avail themselves of the rights of citizenship, and then depart to the land of their nativity, sit down in business as the interest of trade directs; they are either, as conscience dictates, American citizens or not. Among those, to use the words of an Irish gentleman of my acquaintance, there are Englishmen, Scotchmen, and some Irishmen, who sit themselves down in business under the protection of either England or America, giving them a manifest advantage over the citizen, who is a merchant in this country. They ought not to be considered as Americans if they take up their residence in foreign countries, or act this double character.

You cannot put off from you a native born citizen, it is said; nor can you, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. LACOCK,) prohibit a citizen expatriating himself. I feel no mind to enter into a train of reasoning upon these topics. If they be true, they appear to me to be irreconcilable. The Government shall afford protection to one of its citizens, who has renounced to it all fealty and allegiance, and solemnly promise it to another. Sir, a man cannot serve two masters; he must hate the one and love the other. He that will come, let him come; and he that will go, let him go. This is in part my political catechism.

We have, Mr. Speaker, the right to legislate upon this subject whenever the interest of the nation may require it, and that right can only be exercised by Congress to render it obligatory—see the Constitution. The question is, is it politic to legislate at this time upon this subject?

It has been repeatedly said, that Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and the present Chief Magistrate, all have made similar propositions to those contained in this bill to the British Government, of which alone we have to complain for exercising the right, or rather practising upon our citizens that diabolical system of impressment.

It is said by a large portion of this House, that peace would be restored if a system like this were adopted; the Executive of the United States was insincere in his propositions; that we were waging a destructive and unnecessary war; that protecting foreigners in our sea-service was the only pretext, and so soon as you exclude them from the service, peace will be restored and impressments cease forever; under these circumstances they could not support a war. Manifest a disposition, say they, to the adoption of a system which will exclude from our sea-service this description of people, and we will maintain the essential rights of America, the persons of citizens shall be held sacred. To acquire, sir, and test the sincerity and truth of these remarks, I am willing to legislate upon the subject at this time.

The bill, if ever it goes into operation, as has been repeatedly said, will be reciprocally so. It does not withhold its protection from native or naturalized citizens, nor those who have, under the existing laws of the United States, intimated their intention of becoming citizens; the faith of our laws and the honor of the nation are preserved: none can complain. Union at home, and a vigorous prosecution of the war, are my motives, having given my vote in favor of the war, and all the measures hitherto adopted in its support. If gentlemen will have this as a peace measure, I can, with equal justice to myself and to those whom I have the honor in part to represent, declare what will in part go to restore peace, should that prove the immediate result. But, sir, however desirable that object is to us all, this bill will not, I fear, effect it so suddenly. I support it as one of the strongest war measures submitted to the consideration of this House, upon which ground it shall have my cordial vote—I mean union at home, and a vigorous prosecution of the war, as the only and best peace measure.

Mr. QUINCY said that he should submit a very few remarks in illustration of the grounds of his vote—that it was his original intention not to have made any, and he should not have deviated from that purpose were it not that the charge of inconsistency had been carefully and repeatedly insinuated as lying against those on his side of the House who should vote in opposition to the proposed bill. It had been said that this was our policy, that it was what we had recommended, that we were pledged to support the bill, that it was what we had previously stated as the cause of national duty on this subject. He said he was induced to rise on another account. He was about to differ in vote, from very many, perhaps from a majority, of those with whom it was his happiness on other occasions to coincide. He thought, therefore, he owed it in some degree to himself to show that the grounds of his vote were neither light nor trivial; that they were such as he was both willing to explain and able to defend.

Mr. Q. said that the provisions contained in the bill, so far from constituting a project which those on his side of the House had ever advocated, and on that account were pledged, under the terrors of a charge of inconsistency to support; that it was a project which no man on any side of any House—which no man in this nation had ever advocated, nor even conceived as a serious scheme of practical policy until it burst upon the astonished vision from the gentleman of Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY.) For his own part, he had never heard it, until that day, he would not say, even proposed as a serious purpose, but not even suggested as one of the dreams of the imagination.

Mr. Q. said that he had heard of the wisdom of giving preferences to native over foreign seamen; that he had heard of excluding British seamen; that he had heard of virtually excluding foreign seamen in general from our service by certain gradual and temperate regulations which should give the merchant an opportunity to supply the deficiency such exclusion would produce by an increased stock of native seamen, which such encouragement would create. Of all this he had heard. For the wisdom of such a system of regulations, he and his friends had contended; but never did he hear of such a proposition as that contained in this bill. Never had he heard of the total and absolute exclusion of the seamen of all foreign nations at a blow; never that such exclusion was to be proffered by way of temptation to the caprice or the interest of other Governments, and to take place or not, according to the cool calculations they might make at their leisure concerning their policy or interest; never that the number of American citizens employed abroad was so great, and their absence so injurious to us, that it was the part of national policy to bribe foreign nations to drive them back again to the American shores, by proffering to every foreign Government, in case they would do it, to reciprocate the same favor towards such foreign Governments by driving their subjects out of our employ. Such are the provisions of this bill. In their nature they are novel, unanticipated, and never imagined. Whatever may be their merit or demerit, there is not a man in this nation who is not free to accept, or free to reject them. No man can be pledged to support a system which he had never advocated, never contemplated, nor, as a practical measure, ever conceived. Thus much, Mr. Q. said, he thought it necessary to say with respect to the charge of inconsistency which had been insinuated against those who might oppose this bill on his side of the House.

Mr. Q. said that it was very likely that in a general argument having relation to a modification of the employment of seamen, with reference to the particular state of things existing between us and Great Britain, or having in view a gradual reduction of the number of foreign seamen in our service by establishing certain wise preferences in favor of native seamen, that some general expression may have been used which might give a color to the opinion that an ultimate exclusion of foreigners from our employment was contemplated. I doubt, said he, if this is the case. But, certainly, it was never proposed or conceived that this should be done by an instantaneous regulation, on a ground of reciprocating with foreign nations the driving away their citizens on condition of their driving away ours. Whatever argument on this subject has ever been urged by myself, or by any of those gentlemen with whom I have the happiness to be associated in political opinion, has always had in view one or other of two objects, and were regulated by one or other of two principles. The extreme importance to Great Britain of her seamen, and the great temptation which the comparatively great rate of wages in this country, aided by the similarity of our habits and character, held out to her seamen, seemed to constitute a state of things out of which resulted an obligation upon the United States to limit the injury thus incidentally done to her by some regulation, either directly excluding her subjects, or, at least, diminishing the temptation which the condition of things in this country offered to the cupidity of her seamen. Thus, doing her less injury, she would have less reason to complain, and less justification for a resort to the exercise of her claim of impressment. This, it was contended, would be a precursor of relief from that suffering. At least, that it was our duty to make a trial of this policy previous to a war on that account. Such was the principle and policy of the gentlemen on his side of the House, in this aspect of the question. There was another principle of policy which this embarrassment of our relations with Great Britain suggested. The thoughts of reflecting men were drawn to consider the basis on which the interests of navigation rested, and it began to be seen, and was contended that, by a gradual and systematic exclusion of foreign seamen, the condition of our maritime affairs would be improved by a service exclusively, or in a great measure, composed of native citizens. Beyond the limitation resulting from these two principles, and having relation to these two objects, no proposition was ever seriously suggested. It never was heard nor thought that the United States were losers by the employment of foreign seamen. It was never heard that we could be gainers by a system of reciprocal provisions, which, adopted on some sudden suggestion, should force home the few native citizens of ours which were in the employ of foreign nations, and force away the multitudes of foreign subjects, which were confessedly and notoriously in our employ.

There is a something, said Mr. Q., singularly strange and mysterious in the manner in which this bill is made to pass through this House. Never did any bill meet with so many counter-currents and repugnant eddies in its course; yet, it holds its way notwithstanding, and seems to be facilitated rather than obstructed by circumstances apparently so inauspicious. On the other side of the House, it is advocated as a measure of permanent policy; on this side, as a temporary expedient. There, it is carefully and systematically denied to have any pacific intention; here, it is as carefully and systematically inculcated as a measure of a certain pacific result. At one moment it is asserted to be an independent regulation, yielding nothing to Great Britain; at the next, it is said to be proffering her so much that if she fail to accept the proposition all hearts and hands must without fail unite in the war. By this sort of vacillating, accommodating argument, every species of political party seems to be fascinated, and made to concur in the immediate object. We for peace; they for war. We pulling one way; they another. We looking North; they South. We East; they West. All give the machine the same direction. By the exertions of all, the passage of the bill is facilitated.

Considering the character of the political fathers of this bill, and their known interests and connexions, its principle is not less suspicious than its parliamentary course is mysterious. During the whole extent of their political lives, the friends of this proposition, for a total exclusion of foreign seamen, have maintained the right and the interest of the United States to employ them in the fullest and most unlimited extent. And now, in a breath, at a thought, without any previous warning, they turn round and propose to exclude them altogether. Can any man have faith in the sincerity of those who advocate so extravagant a proposition, in face of all their previous theories and professions? Can any man, who knows the nature of this country and the composition of its population, believe in its practicability? Sir, what are the people of the United States in respect to their composite character? Are they a simple homogeneous race of men? Did we all spring out of mushroom soil? Does each of us carry about him the marks of the grit and clay of his mother earth? Sir, the fact is altogether the reverse. The column of our American State is neither composed of flint nor of granite, but rather of a sort of pudding-stone; of a casual collection of distinct individuals, aggregated together, with no selection in the particulars, and little strength in the cement. In a nation thus constituted, it is now seriously proposed, as it is pretended, to turn all foreigners from its sea service, and to form, by a sort of parliamentary magic, in a moment, a new marine of pure and exclusive native citizens. Let who will believe in this project, I do not. Considering the quarter from which it comes, I believe as little in its sincerity as I do in its practicability.

Sir, if I wished to press far into the discussion of this bill, which I do not, I would ask, what has become of that great doctrine of the right of expatriation, so obtrusively and clamorously maintained, from the first establishment of our national Government down to the present day, by the patrons and authors of this bill, their friends and supporters? Are all those choice topics of declamation to be abandoned? Are they forgotten by gentlemen on the other side of the House? If they are, will they be forgotten by this people? This bill proceeds upon the principle, that the right of expatriation does not exist in the subjects of foreign Governments. For, if it does exist, then such foreign Government has no right to reclaim them, and we have no right to drive them home. The bill abjures this right of expatriation; and, in doing this, cuts up by the roots not only the claim of the individuals whom it contemplates to force back to the service of their respective sovereigns, but also your whole right to protect, beyond the limits of your local jurisdiction, even your naturalized citizens. For, if the right of expatriation do not exist, then every foreigner, in taking upon himself the obligations of allegiance to this country, does it subject to the inalienable principle of native allegiance which this bill admits to exist. So that it recognises the justice of the claim of foreign Sovereigns to their original subjects, as well those who are naturalized, as those who are not. I wish to be understood as making no objection on this account; I ask, only, where is the consistency of it? I see the effects of this bill too plainly, not to be satisfied that it does not abandon the projects for which the clamor about the right of expatriation was originally raised. It varies the means, without losing sight of the end. It is, however, most extraordinary, that men, who have been all their lives long, perfect knight errants, in favor of distressed foreigners, who have set their spears in their rests, and gone tilting all over the world in defence of oppressed humanity; who have been inviting it to our shores with both hands, should turn round at once, and pretend to be about to send them all home again, and leave them to the mercy of ancient systems and of their former masters.

But this is not all. This great right of expatriation, which the advocates of this bill and their political friends have been maintaining these twenty years, in favor of all the world, is now denied by the bill to exist, even in our own citizens. The reciprocity of the bill consists in this, that these, our citizens, should be forced home, according to the obligations of their natural allegiance. For, on this principle alone, have we a right to claim their return. Thus strange and mysterious is both the character and parliamentary course of this bill.

Mr. Q. said that his first objection to the bill, considered in the light in which it had been placed by its advocates, as a measure of permanent policy, was, that its provisions were unnatural. By which he meant, that they were irreconcilable with the known nature, and habits, and prejudices, of the great majority of the people of this country. These had always been accustomed to the employment of foreigners in their sea service, and been taught to view it in a favorable light. Now, although it might be wise to counteract these prejudices, and to change these habits, yet this could not be done suddenly, nor by virtue of mere law. It must be done gradually, and, as it were, insensibly, by such systematic, temperate regulations, from which no great temporary embarrassments should result, and which would make the community more ready to co-operate with the general policy. Nothing violent could be permanent. And considering the previous practice and prejudices of the community, nothing was ever more violently repugnant to both than the provisions of the bill.

Mr. Q. said, another objection was, that the bill proceeded upon the assumption of a state of things as a fact, which was notoriously false. The only possible ground upon which a proposition, such as that contained in this bill, could be made to all the nations of the world, must be that of interest. We would offer to drive their subjects out of our employ, on the proposed condition, that they should drive our citizens out of theirs, only on the principle that, in the present existing reciprocation of service, we were losers and they gainers. Now, who believes that this is the case? Who ever heard that their employment of our citizens was an injury? The particular circumstances of the British nation, and the temptation which employment in our marine and merchant service offered to her seamen, was a cause of embarrassment with her, which, in relation to that nation, it was important to obviate. But Great Britain out of the question, and the employment of the mariners of other nations is highly useful and important to us; and particularly is it important, if we are about to set ourselves seriously to drive from our employ British seamen.

Mr. Q. said that the nature of the arguments which had been urged in support of the bill, and the particular character of the support it had received, was another objection. The particular argument in favor of the bill had been vacillating from one principle to another. It was uncertain as to its tendency, and plainly a game of expedients, and not the foundation of any enlarged system of policy. Plain good intention is easily discerned. It is direct and steady in all its movements: its object is distinct, and its course towards it certain. In this way confidence is inspired. But who can have confidence in a measure which, in its nature, contravenes all the previously declared maxims of its advocates, relative to the subject; and which, on one hand, is supported as a measure of war, and on the other as a measure of peace; in the House, as yielding nothing to Great Britain, and out of it, as yielding everything? It is impossible—good never did proceed from a contrivance of this motley, nondescript character.

Had the proposition contained in this bill been adopted in a time of peace, had it been temperate in its character, had it reference to any distinct interest, by which it was modelled, its effects must have been in the highest degree salutary. In such a course, adopted under such auspices, Great Britain would have seen a wise intelligence operating, on which she might have calculated. But what calculation can be made on the provisions of this bill? Will that nation, or any other, credit that the United States are seriously intending to drive all but native and naturalized seamen out of their employ? Or, if such be our intention, will it not be viewed, as it is, a temporary expedient, having reference to particular exigencies; and which will be abandoned as soon as the present end is answered?

I know it is said, that the generalization of this bill is a mere cover to conceal its true nature, which it is pretended, out of doors, is that of a proffer to Great Britain, and that foreign nations will not reciprocate. For my part, I shall wonder, indeed, if they do not. For, Great Britain excepted, there is not an European nation, as I believe, which would not be gainers, and in the same proportion would the United States be losers, by the reciprocity.

As a system of general policy, then, the provisions of the bill are illusive. It remains to be considered what efficacy the bill will have in the attainment of peace, so anxiously and so justly desired by the people of the United States. It is said to be an instrument of peace. It is, in my apprehension, altogether the reverse. It has not that tendency; nor do I believe it introduced with that intention. I give entire credit to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) when he says, it is not a measure of peace. It has not that intention. I ask this question, Mr. Speaker: Suppose an agent of yours has full powers to negotiate upon any subject; and that he should come to you and ask a limitation of those powers—what reason can he have? Plainly, but one, he means to have a justification, in his hand, in case he refuses certain terms of settlement which may be offered. Having full powers to do his best, if he reject any offers, the responsibility rests upon himself. But if he have terms and conditions specified by which he is to govern himself, then he is justified in refusing any proposition, not fairly included within the terms of limitation.

FEBRUARY,, 1813.

Regulation of Seamen.

H. OF R.

This is precisely the situation of the President of the United States, and this, as I conceive, is the exact bearing of this project.

It is foreseen that negotiation of some kind will soon be inevitable. The President of the United States has full power to negotiate upon this subject, under the provisions of the Constitution. His business and his duty are to exercise his entire powers, free and full, as that instrument has granted them, and make the best arrangement he can. His duty then, is to come to the Senate, and, if necessary to the House—and say, "These are the best terms I can make; ratify, or reject them, according to your sense of public duty. I have done my duty. It remains for you to do yours."

This is the plain and the only Constitutional course. The provisions of the bill reverse the whole order of proceedings. It causes the Legislature to present an ultimatum to Great Britain; to which, if she does not accede, the President throws the responsibility of continuing the war upon Congress, who have thus limited the general authority of the Constitution. It is in vain to say that the provisions of this bill are not, in effect, a limitation of the treaty-making power of the Executive. In the nature of things it must be so. It is so undeniably upon the grounds, on which rest the very argument, on which it is maintained that this bill is necessary. The reason for passing this bill is, that as the subject must require Legislative interposition, it is necessary that the President of the United States should know to what point the Legislature will advance, in such settlement; and that without such previous declaration of the Legislature, that foreign nations can have no confidence in any treaties which may be made, since the Legislature are not bound to enact the requisite provisions. It is, then, apparent that if this bill be necessary to give confidence in any treaty which shall go thus far, that a treaty can be entitled to no confidence, which would go farther. In other words, beyond the limits of our law, the treaty-making power cannot advance.

One of two things is inevitable. Either the terms of the bill are more than Great Britain will require from us, or they are less. If they are more, we have shown our whole hand, and cannot hope for anything better than our own voluntary terms. If they are less, negotiation is hopeless. The President of the United States will never dare go beyond what this bill authorizes, when it is said that, to go as far as this, it is necessary that such a bill should pass. In this lies the mischief of this bill. It offers in effect, as our ultimatum, terms which Great Britain has rejected, over and over again. It proffers terms, apparently, but not really, reciprocal. When rejected by her, as they will be, the Executive has obtained an apology for continuing the war, and the opportunity to cast the responsibility of its continuance upon Congress.

Mr. Q. said; that to show how utterly destitute of all reciprocity, even in terms, its provisions were, he would only refer to a single circumstance. By the first section, we require Great Britain to permit us to retain, in our own employment, all her native citizens, whom we have naturalized, or who have declared, or shall declare before a treaty is made, their intention to become naturalized. In the eighth section, which contains the pretended reciprocating proposition, we require Great Britain to prohibit from her employment all naturalized citizens of the United States, without exception of those naturalized, or those voluntarily resident. The very class of her citizens which we claim the right of keeping, is the very class of our citizens which we demand of her to restore. And this is called reciprocal! These are the terms, to which if Great Britain do not accede, all Americans are forever after bound to unite heart and hand in the war! For my part, I consider it, said Mr. Q., as no pacific measure. Its true purpose is to give a peace aspect to the time—to clear the atmosphere, for a moment, so that the money-gudgeons may be made to bite sharp at the Treasury hook. He said that he viewed it as a scheme calculated to deceive the people—to buoy them up with false hopes, when the real intention was to continue the war. Under this belief, it should have no support from him.

Mr. Q. concluded by apologizing for the desultory manner in which he had treated the project—that he had gone farther into its examination than he had at first intended; his chief motive in rising having been to repel the charge of inconsistency; and to make such an explanation of his vote, when he was about to differ from many of his political friends, as might show the true principles upon which it proceeded.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH said, that late as it was in the day, and anxious as the House appeared to be for the question upon the bill under consideration, he was under the necessity of asking their indulgence, and of soliciting their attention for a few moments. It was not his intention to engage fully in this debate, or to detain them by an extended argument on the merits of the bill before them; he had no anxiety to make proselytes to it; for he had no hesitation candidly to own, that to its fate he felt almost an entire indifference; he cared very little whether it should be passed or rejected. But as he had made up his mind to vote for the bill, it became necessary, in consequence of observations that had fallen from its particular advocates and patrons, to offer some explanation, for the purpose of obviating improper constructions, and of preventing the erroneous inferences and implications, with which they seemed disposed to entangle and embarrass the course he had determined to pursue. He wished also to state his view of the true character and nature of this bill, and to assign the reasons that had influenced his determination to vote in favor of it, although he felt very little interest about it, and therefore did not profess to be one of its advocates.

This bill, Mr. G. said, had been advocated on the ground of its intrinsic wisdom and excellence, as a permanent navigation system for the United States; and, also, of the peculiar fitness of its provisions to the present state of our foreign relations, in reference to the war in which we are involved. As to its merits, when viewed in the first of these characters, he had little to say. Without pretending to that extent of information, or possessing any of that experience in commercial affairs, which would qualify him to decide on the policy and wisdom of any system of that sort that might be presented to his notice, he would only observe, that he had always supposed it would be beneficial in a national view, gradually to exclude foreign seamen from our vessels, as soon and as extensively as could be consistent with the practical convenience of our merchants. Such a regulation, by excluding foreigners from coming into competition with native American seamen, and thus giving to the latter the encouragement to which they seemed justly entitled, he believed would be attended with the obvious and great national advantage of raising up, in a few years, a numerous and hardy race of real American sailors, adequate both to the commerce and the defence of the country. If the provisions of this bill were calculated to produce that effect, of which he did not pretend to be a competent judge, they would, so far, receive his approbation.

It was, Mr. G. said, in the second character assigned to it, that the object he had in view made it necessary for him to consider it, and the observations upon it, to which he had before alluded. It has been represented, as intended to hold out to the nation with which we are at war, and to our own citizens, the ultimatum on the subject of seamen, on which the American Congress deem it necessary to take a final stand, and from which they are determined never to recede; and as thus containing a pledge to the world never to sheath the sword now drawn until this ground shall be conceded to us by our enemy. Giving to the bill this aspect, much pains have been taken to inculcate, and to impress the opinion, that all those who vote for it, become thereby committed to join, heart and hand, in supporting and continuing the war, at all hazards and to any extent of time, until Great Britain shall accede to the terms it holds out. This doctrine is advanced by the Committee of Foreign Relations in their elaborate report or manifesto, which he was sorry he could not get committed with the bill, in order that an opportunity might be afforded for an attempt to correct the fallacy of some of its statements, and has been urged and much dwelt upon by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) who acts on this occasion as chairman of that committee, and has been the principal, indeed almost the only zealous patron of this bill in all its stages. His principal inducement, Mr. G. said, to rise on this occasion, was to obviate any such false conclusion, and to protect himself, and such of his political friends as might adopt the same course with him in relation to this bill, from having any such improper construction given to their vote. For himself he deemed it his duty to declare, in the most explicit manner, that he did not intend thus to commit himself, and to protest against any such false and injurious inference. No, sir, said Mr. G., we are not to be entrapped in this manner, either by the logic of the Committee of Foreign Relations, or the ingenuity of the gentleman from Tennessee, into an engagement or pledge to give countenance to the continuance of this precipitate, ill-advised and disastrous war, this curse to the nation, this poison of its prosperity and happiness, on such grounds and for such objects as are held out in this bill; grounds on which we could not, consistently with the duty of fidelity to our country, have originally concurred in the declaration of war, and on which we cannot now advocate its continuance, because they are not truly and purely American. Permit me, sir, said he, in order to show this, to call the attention of the House to the particular provisions of that part of the bill, in which the ground is taken in relation to the controversy about seamen.

The first section of the bill, after a general prohibition to employ on board of public or private vessels of the United States, any persons whatever, goes on, by way of exception, to state the several descriptions of seamen, for the privilege of employing whom in our vessels and for the personal protection of whom by the mantle of our flag, we are, according to the manifesto of the Committee of Foreign Relations, and the doctrine of the gentleman from Tennessee, to wage eternal war, until this point is conceded to us. They are embraced in three classes: 1. Native American seamen; 2. Foreigners by birth, who are now, or shall become citizens by naturalization before the termination of the present war by a treaty of peace; 3. Foreigners who shall, pending the war, notify, in the manner prescribed by existing laws, their intention to become naturalized; to which may be added a fourth class, resulting from the necessary construction, and manifest import of the 2d section, viz: 4. All those foreigners who shall come to this country after the termination of the present war, and become naturalized in the manner prescribed by this bill, that is, after five years' continued residence within the limits of our country. Taking this bill, then, as having particular relation to the present controversy with Great Britain, and the term, seamen, as used in reference to the same controversy, we are called upon to commit ourselves to wage an endless war, for the protection by our flag, of—1. Native Americans; 2. British born subjects, who now are, or shall be naturalized before the end of the war; 3. British born subjects, who shall, at any time during the war, declare their intention to become naturalized; 4. British born subjects, who shall come here after the war, and become naturalized after five years' continued residence in the country. On the subject thus presented to view, he availed himself of this opportunity, candidly and explicitly to express his sentiments, and to state his views of the true policy of this nation, and the duty of the American statesman. For the protection of the first of those classes of men, the native Americans, whom alone, Mr. G. said, of the whole enumeration, he could consider as being fully and completely of the same political family with himself, he would go as far as any rational man in that House, or in this nation. Such of that class of seamen as had not abandoned their native land, and voluntarily transferred their allegiance or services to some other country, he would secure, in all their rights, both of person and property, against the violence and outrage of any foreign nation, whether at home or abroad, whether at sea or on land, by every practicable means afforded by the resources and strength of our country. He would protect them from impressment by the British; from compulsion by the French, by means of chains, imprisonment, and starvation, to enter on board their privateers, or serve in their vessels of war, and also from the wanton burning of their vessels on the ocean. For the protection, however, of native American seamen from British impressment, no war was necessary to be made, or is required to be continued. Great Britain has never asserted a right to impress native Americans. On the contrary, she has always disclaimed any such pretension; and, therefore, their protection affords no pretext for the continuance of the war. They constitute no part of the controversy between the two nations. It was the claim insisted on by Great Britain, and objected to by our Government, to the seamen born within her own dominions, and who owe to her, as she contends, a perpetual and inalienable allegiance, that form the real ground of the dispute. And it ought to be distinctly known, to the American people, that it was not for the protection of native Americans, but of those who were originally British subjects, and who had become, or should declare their intention to become naturalized citizens of this country, that we are called upon to carry on an interminable war. With respect to those he could not admit that we were under obligations of protection, equally extensive, and equally sacred with those that were due to our natural born seafaring brethren. As to those already really naturalized, he should wish to protect them in any arrangement that might be made upon the subject of seamen; and he believed there would be no difficulty in doing so. They were too few in number to form an inducement to either nation for the continuance of a war so distressing and injurious to both. It appears from the official document, that has been furnished from the Department of State, that the whole number of those, of all nations, who have registered themselves as naturalized seamen for the last seventeen years is but one thousand five hundred and thirty. What number of these were natives of the British dominions, or how many yet remain in American employment, it was impossible to ascertain. But, making a reasonable allowance for deaths and removals, he thought it probable, that not a sixth part of the individuals thus registered were now in our service; and of these he did not believe that one in twenty had been duly naturalized, according to the spirit and intention of our laws, by five years' actual residence in our country. It is evident, indeed, that such residence could have been had but very rarely by seafaring men, from the nature of their employment; and in most, perhaps, almost every instance where they have been naturalized, it must have been on constructive residences, calculating the required five years from their first emigration to this country, and not deducting their intermediate absences from it on foreign voyages; or upon false testimony as to the fact of residence. We know, too, the loose manner in which the business of granting protections has been done in our custom-houses, and must, of course, admit the probability, that many in the account transmitted, have been registered as naturalized seamen, on parole evidence, certificates, or other than the only certain and proper evidence; the authenticated act of the court, by which the individual was naturalized. This description of foreigners, then, the naturalized British seamen, now in our service, were too inconsiderable an object to either nation to form an insurmountable, or even considerable obstacle, to the restoration of peace. With regard to the two remaining classes of British seamen, to which a claim is asserted in the first and second sections of the bill, that is, those not yet naturalized; there was still less reason in continuing the war on their account, because the tie, such as it was, that was to unite them with us in political connexion, had not yet been formed, and notwithstanding a notification of their intention, never might be formed, and, therefore, no obligations had been incurred to them by our Government.

Mr. G. said that with regard to the effects of naturalization, and the extent of the obligations incurred by our Government to those acquired citizens, he could not concur in the doctrine advanced by some gentlemen. He could not consider those obligations to be altogether as absolute and unlimited, in the case of naturalized, as in that of native citizens; but that with regard to the former, they were, from the very circumstances under which they were incurred, necessarily to be understood with some qualifications. He considered naturalization as a conferring of American rights upon persons not entitled to them by birth, but not as a dissolution by the American Government of the ties by which those thus favored were originally connected with the Government under which they were born, and to which they had probably taken the most solemn oaths of perpetual fidelity. To dissolve these original ties is what the American Government certainly has no right to do, and therefore cannot fairly be considered as undertaking to perform. It is an affair between the alien and his natural sovereign or country, with which it is neither our right nor our policy to interfere, unless it be wisdom to enter into hostilities with the great mass of a nation in order to secure to ourselves a few of the individuals belonging to it; to make ten thousand enemies in order to obtain one professed friend. If the two parties to the original political compact, or connexion, choose, by mutual consent, to annul the bond of union between them, be it so; if one of those parties, viz: the citizen or subject, has power completely to sever the tie by his own act of abjuration, let him do so; let him swear away, if he can, his former obligation or his former oaths; we admit him into the American family only in such quality and such condition as he can come; and naturalization cannot be rationally construed to mean anything more. Mr. G., therefore, considered naturalized citizens as entitled, while they remained within our land, to all the immunities, the privileges, and protection of person and property, afforded by our Constitution and laws to our own native citizens. But when they should choose to leave the territorial limits of our country, and migrate again to other countries, or go upon the great highway of nations, he could not consider our Government as bound to protect them any further than was consistent with the general policy and real interest of our country; much less could he admit that there was any real obligation to hazard the prosperity, the welfare, and the happiness of our own people by engaging in quixotic wars to absolve and shield them from the allegiance or obligations they may owe to the Government or Sovereign of the country of their nativity. So long as they remain within our territorial limits, the mantle of the Constitution and the laws will protect them. When they choose to abandon those limits upon any speculations or enterprises of their own, and not in the national service, our Government is justifiable, if a regard to the general welfare of our country so dictates, in considering them as going at their own risk, and as their own insurers. This view of the subject, Mr. G. considered particularly applicable to the seafaring class of foreigners who seek employment in our vessels, and sometimes take oaths of allegiance to our Government. This description of wandering foreigners may literally be said to be of no nation. Whatever oaths they may swallow, they imbibe no attachment with the allegiance they may so profess; they feel the sacredness of its obligations to no country. Interest is their impelling motive. When their nation is engaged in war, they fly to some neutral flag, under which they may obtain better wages, and greater personal safety. If abjuring their former allegiance, and taking new oaths of fidelity, be necessary to their obtaining these advantages, they hesitate not to do it, and they shift their service, their allegiance, and their oaths, as often as those inducements may require. They were Englishmen yesterday, they are Americans to-day; they are Swedes or Danes to-morrow. And is it, said Mr. G., for this description of seamen that we are to be entrapped by this bill into a pledge to support and continue the war? Is it for such an object that the administrators of our Government wish to keep us involved in our present calamitous situation? He again positively denied that a vote in favor of this bill could be fairly considered as so committing those who should give such a vote, and for himself protested against any such construction being put upon the vote he should give. That vote notwithstanding, he reserved himself at large, on all future measures growing out of this war, to act in such manner as the convictions of his own mind might induce him to believe best for the interest and honor of his country.

Mr. G. said he would now ask leave to state in a few words his view of the character of this bill, and to assign the reasons that would influence him to vote in favor of it. He could not help here observing that its principal advocate and patron, (he would not say its author, as he believed it to be of higher origin,) the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) had resorted to an extraordinary course of argument in support of a measure which he showed so much anxiety to carry. Commencing his observations with representing it as a peace measure, he had yet, in the course of his speech, been very explicit in declaring his entire disbelief that it would produce that desirable result, and had dwelt, with much consolation, on the expectation that, if it should not result in peace, it would certainly have the effect to take the ground from under the feet of the opponents of the war, to destroy their political standing and influence, and to unite public sentiment in support of the Administration, and the present majority in Congress, and in favor of their war. If the gentleman wished the aid of the minority, or friends of peace in that House, in passing his favorite bill, it was a singular argument to address to them, that he was sure it would not produce the effect he knew they so much desired; but that, at any rate, it would destroy their popularity, and deprive them of the political confidence and support of their fellow-citizens. Perhaps, however, there was more address in the gentleman's course than at first view was obvious. To secure the passage of his bill he had to conciliate the good will towards it of very opposite political feelings and sentiments in that House; he had to seek support for it among the friends of peace, and the advocates of war. Probably he calculated so much on the anxiety of the minority to see the blessings of peace restored to their distressed and suffering country; as to believe that they would be willing to receive almost any measure that professed to be intended to effect that desirable object, with whatever hazards to themselves the attempt might be attended. He certainly did them only justice, if he supposed them willing to submit to any personal privations for the public good, and to sacrifice any personal advantages, even their popularity, to the chance of promoting the prosperity, peace, and welfare of their country. As to the war men in that House, he, perhaps, expected to conciliate a portion of them, by declaring that his peace bill would not produce the professed effect, but would certainly have the sweeter effect to sustain the Administration, and the party now in power, and to put down their political opponents. However these arguments might operate with the different sides of the House, Mr. G. believed with the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) that this bill, which nobody fully understood, and few cared about, would, like the famous non-intercourse law, which was equally unintelligible, and equally the object of indifference, with very few friends, obtain a very strong vote. As that law, contrary to general calculation at the time of its passage, at last involved us in the war, possibly the present bill might, though he had little hopes that it would in the hands to which it was to be committed, as unexpectedly extricate us from the war. To state candidly his view of the bill, Mr. G. said he considered it, with the manifesto that accompanied it, as a Cabinet measure, the act of the Administration; professing to be adopted for the purpose of bringing about peace, but, in truth, aiming with much more anxiety at a different object. It seemed to him to be a sort of political adventurer, sent out to catch what it may; peace, if it may so happen; if not, what is perhaps more desired—popularity to the war and its authors. As to its producing peace, he had very little expectation of its having that effect. The restoration of that blessing is to be looked for only from the people themselves. Whether it was sincerely intended for that object, he would not pretend to say. It was, however, this character that it had assumed, of being a peace measure, that would induce him to vote for it. He considered the Administration as saying, substantially, to the Representatives of the people, by the proposal of this measure, we wish the instrumentality of such a bill as this, to enable us to extricate the country from the war in which it was involved. If they were sincere in this intimation, and his vote would afford them any facility in the accomplishment of so desirable an object, they were welcome to it for that purpose. Such, he said, was the result of the first consideration he had given to this bill. Further and maturer reflection had confirmed him in the propriety of this course. Mr. G. said it was not from the parts of the bill which had hitherto been noticed, that is from the first and second sections only, that the true character and import of it were to be collected. He would call the attention of the House to another section, which had not been noticed by any gentleman in the debate upon it, and which, in his views, materially altered the character and effect of it. He here read the 9th section of the bill, which is in these words: "and be it further enacted that nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent any arrangement between the United States and any foreign nation which may take place under any treaty or convention, made and ratified in the manner prescribed by the Constitution of the United States." By this clause it will at once be perceived that the President, in any negotiation, is released from a restriction to the terms of the first and second sections of the bill. Congress, so far as an expression of their opinion goes, gives him an unrestrained authority—a carte blanche—in relation to regulations about seamen, and the controversy about impressment, notwithstanding the particular provisions of the former part of the bill. And taking the whole bill together, upon a fair construction, if there is any commitment at all resulting from an affirmative vote upon it, it is a commitment, not to continue the war, at all events, until the terms of the first and second section shall be agreed to by our enemy, but to sanction any arrangements the President may make about seamen, which shall produce a peace, however it may deviate from those terms. For if it was the absolute and unconditional determination of Congressmen to recede from those terms, to make them the sine qua non of a termination of the war, why give to the President and Senate the express power by treaty to deviate from them? It was such a power, Mr. G. said, as he ought to have; and it fixed upon the President, where it ought to rest, the responsibility of putting an end to the war on terms compatible with the real interest and honor of the nation. Let him look to it, that he discharges his duty to the nation with honorable and disinterested fidelity; that he does not sacrifice the interest and happiness of the native members of our political community, to a blind devotion to the views of imported brethren; and that he does not lose sight of an opportunity to restore to his country the blessings of peace and prosperity in endeavors to apply this bill, this instrument of his asking, to the purpose of obtaining popularity to his favorite war. Mr. G. said that the plain import and effect of this section, taken in connexion with the other parts of the bill, reconciled him to it, and he should give it his vote for the purpose of affording to the Government all the aid in his power to bring about a peace, which he had no doubt might be done on terms of adequate and satisfactory security to the rights of native American seamen. For wandering foreigners, he repeated, he would not, by any act of his, continue the calamities of this war upon the natives, the possessors, and the cultivators of the soil of this country.

Ordered, That the title be "An act for the regulation of seamen on board the public ships, and in the merchant service of the United States."

SATURDAY, February 13.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Richard Dale; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting statements of moneys transferred during the late recess of Congress from one branch of expenditure to another branch of expenditure in the Navy Department; which were referred to the Committee on the Naval Establishment.

The resolution from the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him of his re-election to the Presidency of the United States, was read, and concurred in by the House; and Mr. MAON, Mr. TALLMADGE, and Mr. SEVIER, were appointed the said committee.

An engrossed bill to extend the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Military Committee, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to raise ten additional companies of rangers.—[The object of the bill is not in fact to raise an additional force, but to convert one of the twenty regiments of infantry recently authorized to be raised into rangers.]

The bill was twice read.

Mr. WILLIAMS then rose and enforced the necessity, under present emergencies, of the immediate authorization of this force, as of a description particularly appropriate to the circumstances of the frontier, as well for the purposes of offence as defence.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day; and was subsequently read a third time and passed unanimously.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit certain fines, penalties, and forfeitures, therein mentioned. [For the relief of merchants having imported goods recently from the dependencies of Great Britain.] The bill was amended, reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting a statement of the militia of the United States, according to the latest returns received by the Department of War.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF PRIVATEERING.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, made a report relative to the expediency of affording greater encouragement to privateering. The report is as follows:

That, in relation to the first inquiry, they find that, by the British statutes of the 13th and 27th of George the Second, the whole prize of each and every public armed vessel is given to the officers and crews making the capture; and they find this principle published by British proclamation, in relation to the present war with the United States. The laws of the United States vol. 3, page 360, direct that, if a capture be made by an American public armed vessel, of equal or superior force, the capturing vessel shall have the whole; in all other cases of capture, one half is distributed to the officers and the other half is paid to the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund, pledged, first, for the payment of pensions, and the surplus to be disbursed for the comfort and benefit of seamen. This fund for Navy pensions amounts to something more than two hundred thousand dollars, yielding an annual interest of fifteen thousand dollars; and the amount of pensions is from seven to eight thousand dollars; leaving a yearly balance of seventeen thousand dollars in favor of the fund, and this without the addition of the prizes made this war, which are known to exceed one hundred thousand dollars, and will probably amount to two hundred thousand dollars, so as to double the fund;

while only four persons have been added to the list by the war, to receive twenty-one dollars. From the above it appears, that, from the old pension list, the amount of pensions is little more than three per centum on the amount of prizes. Were five per cent. from the future prizes, to be added to this fund, on past experience it would promise an adequate sum for the payment of pensions. Your committee, however, concluded that it would not do to rely conclusively on past experience, and, on the ground of certainty, deemed it best for the fund to remain as established for another year, when more experience would give more confidence to the decision. As this report is intended to bring the subject under the view of the House, with the hope that it will not be lost sight of at the next session, it will be proper here to add, that, with some of the committee, the idea was entertained that ten per cent. should be withheld from distribution, viz: five per cent. for the pension, and five for the navy hospital fund; in which not only the imbecility of decrepitude, but the imbecility of infamy should also find an asylum. On the other branch of the inquiry, your committee give their fullest attestation to the utility and importance of privateers. If, at other times and in other countries, the effect of individual exertion has been distrusted, the unexampled gallantry of our citizens, in that way, since the declaration of war, assures us that, with Americans, even the individual arm can make an efficient impression on the foe. The mode, however, of giving encouragement, they found not free from difficulty. As least liable to objection, they recommend that a bounty be paid for every prisoner brought in; and, that this proposition may be regularly before the House, they report a bill.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Naval Committee, then reported a bill allowing a bounty to privateers.—[Allowing a bounty of — dollars for each person they bring in.] Twice read and committed.

ADDITIONAL GENERAL OFFICERS.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the appointment of additional general officers in the Army of the United States.

[The bill provides for the appointment of — additional Major Generals, and — Brigadier Generals.]

The following letters from the Secretary of War were read:

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 23, 1812.

SIR: Before I reply to your question, "how many major generals and brigadiers are necessary for an army of thirty-five thousand men?" it may not be amiss to state what is believed to have been the proportion of officers of these grades in the Revolutionary army, and what is understood to be the proportion, at this time, in European armies.

In the first army of the Revolution, raised in 1775, we had a commander-in-chief, four major generals, and eight brigadiers. In 1776, five brigadiers were promoted to the rank of major generals, and twenty-three brigadiers appointed. In 1777, six brigadiers were promoted to the rank of major generals, and three major generals and eighteen brigadiers appointed.

The loss of papers in the War Office, by fire, in 1800, renders it impossible to say, with precision, at what particular periods many of these general officers left the service, but it is within my recollection that, on the 28th of June, 1778, fourteen major generals, and sixteen brigadiers, were actually in service of the United States. Yet, by referring to the official letters of General Washington, in 1778 and 1779, it will be seen that a further increase of general officers was often and warmly recommended.

The main army, under the immediate command of General Washington, it is believed, never amounted to thirty-five thousand men, and it is by no means certain that this number was ever in service at one and the same time, in the whole of what was designated "the continental army." Yet, at no period, between the first of May, 1777, and the close of the war, had we less than thirty general officers in service.

It was deemed necessary, in the Revolution, and it is understood to be the general practice in Europe, at this time, to have at least one brigadier general for every two thousand men, and one major general for every four thousand.

In this country we have never had a grade between the commander-in-chief and that of major general; hence it was found necessary, in the "continental army," to give to the senior major general the command of the right wing, and, to the next in rank, that of the left, which, from the limited number of general officers, often left a division to a brigadier, a brigade to a colonel, and a regiment to a subordinate field officer; but, in Europe, this difficulty is obviated by the appointment of general officers of higher grades.

From the best information I have been able to obtain on this subject, I have no hesitation in saying that eight major generals, and sixteen brigadiers, to command the divisions and brigades of an army of thirty-five thousand men, is the lowest estimate which the uniform practice of France, Russia, and England, will warrant, and that this is much below the proportion of officers of these grades actually employed in the army of the Revolution.

As you have not required my opinion whether it be necessary to have a higher grade than that of major general, I have not deemed it proper to touch this subject, and have confined myself to the number of major generals, and brigadiers, deemed necessary to command the divisions and brigades of an army of thirty-five thousand men. It may not, however, be improper to remark that, if it is intended to have no higher grade than that of major general, their number should be increased to eleven; so as to give one for the chief command, one for each wing, and one for each division of four thousand men.

I am, sir, very respectfully, yours, &c.

T. H. CUSHING, Adj't Gen.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 10, 1813.

SIR: In reply to the letter you did me the honor to write to me, on the 5th instant, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I respectfully submit the following opinions:

1st. That an increased number of general officers is essential to the public service. The number of regiments provided for by law, is, two of light dragoons, three of heavy artillery, one of light artillery, one of riflemen, and forty-five of infantry, making, together, fifty-two regiments.

The simplest organization is ever the best. Hence it is, that, as a regiment consists of two battalions, so a brigade should consist of two regiments, and a division of two brigades.

H. OF R.

Further Increase of the Navy.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

This sphere of command will be found, in practice, sufficiently large. The management of two thousand men in the field, will be ample duty for a brigadier, and the direction of double that number will give full occupation to a major general. To enlarge the sphere of command in either grade would not be a mean of best promoting the public good.

Taking these ideas as the basis of the rule, and taking for granted, also, that our ranks are filled, the present establishment would require twenty-five brigadiers and twelve major generals. But the latter admission requires qualification, and, under existing circumstances, it may be sufficient that the higher staff should consist of eight major generals, and sixteen brigadiers.

The general argument, on this head, might be fortified by our own practice during the war of the Revolution, and by that of European nations at all times. Believing, however, that this view of the subject has been already taken by the adjutant general, in a late communication to you, I forbear to do more than suggest it.

2d. The recruiting service would be much promoted, were the bounty in land commutable into money, at the option of the soldier, and at the end of his service. This modification would be addressed to both descriptions of men—those who would prefer money, and such as would prefer land.

I need hardly remark that bounties, at the close of service, have many advantages over those given before service begins. The former tie men down to their duty; the latter furnish, if not the motive, at least the means of debauch and desertion.

Another, and a public reason, for the preference, may be found in the greater convenience with which money may be paid at the end, than at the commencement of a war.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Hon. D. R. WILLIAMS,

Chairman Com. on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS explained the progress of this bill, &c. He took occasion to advert to a declaration recently made in debate by Mr. QUINCY, that it was intended to appoint a Lieutenant General to command the armies of the United States, to which Mr. W. said he was precluded by illness from replying to at the time. He now declared that no such intention had ever existed in the minds of Administration; that the late Secretary of War (Mr. EUSTIS) had declared to him (Mr. W.) that he had endeavored to impress on his colleagues in office the necessity of appointing a Commander-in-Chief; but that, to use the Secretary's own words, he could not get the people in the white house (the President's house) to assent to it; that, by the gentleman who temporarily succeeded Mr. EUSTIS in the War Office, he had been informed that no such thing was in contemplation, or would be suggested in any manner to Congress. And all this Mr. W. said he had heard long before the declaration made by Mr. QUINCY, and should then have stated, had not severe and sudden indisposition prevented him from replying, as he had intended, to that gentleman's speech.

Mr. QUINCY expressed his gratification at this information; observing that he had been by no means alone in the impressions he had entertained on that subject, which prevailed pretty generally on both sides of the House.

After some further consideration, the blanks in the bill were filled with six Major Generals and six Brigadier Generals.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day.

The bill authorizing the appointment of additional general officers in the Army of the United States, was then read a third time, and passed by yeas and nays: For the bill 95, against it 30, as follows:

YEAS—William Anderson, Stevenson Archer, Daniel Avery, David Bard, William Barnett, Burwell Bassett, William W. #### FURTHER INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act for the increase of the Navy; and the bill was discussed, amended, and reported to the House, where the amendments were agreed to.

An amendment was also added, on motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, authorizing the sale of such of the gunboats as may not be necessary to the public service.

Mr. STOW moved to strike out so much of the bill as authorizes the purchase of private vessels for equipment; which was negatived.

And the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

And on motion, the House adjourned until Monday.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Suspension of Non-Importation.

H. OF R.

MONDAY, February 15.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that the lands in said Territory, which have been set apart for the use of schools, may be vested in them for the purposes for which they were originally designed; and that a tract of public land, therein described, may be granted to the Washington Academy.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill allowing further time for delivering the evidence in support of claims to land in the Territory of Missouri, and for regulating the donation grants therein; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the discharge of Daniel Updike from his imprisonment. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "giving further time for registering claims to lands in the eastern district of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana." The bill was reported with amendments, which were concurred in by the House; and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, made on the petition of Rebecca Hodgson. The Committee rose, and reported their disagreement to the resolution contained in the said report. The House proceeded to consider the report; when it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MACON, from the joint committee appointed on the part of this House, to join the committee on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him of his re-election to the office of President of the United States, reported that the committee did, this day, perform the service assigned to them.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Samuel Ellis. The bill was reported with an amendment, which was concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. LITTLE, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the act extending the right of suffrage to the Illinois Territory requires no amendments.

Ordered to lie on the table.

The engrossed bill supplementary to the act for increasing the Navy of the United States, was read the third time, and passed without a division.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

The engrossed bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, forfeitures, and penalties, in certain cases, was read the third time, and rejected by yeas and nays—yeas 56, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, junior, Stevenson Archer, Ezekiel Bacon, John Baker, Abijah Bigelow, William Blackledge, Harmanus Bleecker, James Breckenridge, Elijah Brigham, John C. #### SUSPENSION OF NON-IMPORTATION.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made the following report:

The Committee of Ways and Means report: That they have deemed it to be their duty, that the public service may not suffer and that the public credit may be duly supported, to look beyond the ways and means of the present year, and to take into consideration the revenue which may be wanted for the year 1814. That an estimate of the probable amount of the revenue which will accrue under existing laws, and be receivable within that year, has been submitted to Congress in the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury made during the present session. That, comparing the amount thereof with the sums which will probably be required by a prudent regard to the public credit, it appears to the Committee indispensably necessary to make a further provision; that this may be done by a partial suspension of the non-importation acts, which will not greatly lessen their injurious effects upon the enemy, by an additional duty on foreign tonnage, and by the imposition of internal taxes and duties: That, in their opinion, all these means will be necessary to supply the revenue which will be wanted: That it is impracticable, during the present session, consistently with a due attention to the other business of the nation, to enact the laws necessary to embrace the last mentioned object; but that this may be done, without difficulty and without a delay which will be injurious either to the public credit or the public service, by an earlier meeting of Congress than the Constitutional period, which it will be the duty of Congress, or the Executive branch of the Government, to fix at such time as shall be deemed most proper and expedient: That it is, however, necessary that the suspension of the non-importation acts which is contemplated should be enacted at the present session of Congress: and for this purpose and the imposition of additional duties on foreign tonnage, they beg leave to report a bill. They also report herewith a correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and this Committee on the subject of this report.

Letter from the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to the Secretary of the Treasury:

COMMITTEE-ROOM, Feb. 3, 1813.

SIR: I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to request from you the favor of a reply to the following questions:

1. What, in your opinion, would be the probable amount of revenue applicable to the service of the year 1814, which would result from a modification or partial repeal of the non-importation acts, such as is suggested in your letter, of the 10th of June, 1812, addressed to the Committee of Ways and Means?

2. Is the modification suggested by that letter the best in your opinion that can be devised to obtain a given revenue, with the least possible diminution of the effects of the non-importation acts? If not, be pleased to suggest such alterations and improvements as occur to your mind.

3. Are there, in your opinion, any further legal provisions necessary, or will any be expedient, more effectually to enforce the non-importation acts, or to insure the more effectual collection of the revenue?

4. Would it, in your opinion, be advisable to increase the duty on foreign tonnage? If it would, to what amount? and what would be the probable addition to the revenue applicable to the year 1814 by such increase? I am, &c.

LANGDON CHEVES.

HON. ALBERT GALLATIN, &c.

Answer of the Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 9, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following answers to the questions proposed in your letter of the 3d instant:

1. It is believed, from the reasons stated in my letter of the 10th June last to the Committee of Ways and Means, that the amount of revenue applicable to the service of the year 1814, which would result from a modification of the non-importation acts suggested in the said letter, may be estimated at about five millions of dollars, provided that modification takes place during the present session of Congress.

2. No better modification, for the purposes therein intended, has suggested itself than that proposed in the letter aforesaid. But it would seem requisite, for the same object, that no drawback should be allowed on the re-exportation of the merchandise which may be thus imported.

3. The most important legal provision, which appears necessary to enforce the non-importation acts, is a positive prohibition of a restoration by order of court of merchandise, the importation of which is prohibited by law. It is also believed that it will be necessary to order all the cargoes of salt, particularly from Lisbon, to be discharged under the inspection of proper officers; and it appears reasonable that the expense should be defrayed by the importers.

4. It appears, in every point of view, highly desirable, that the duty on foreign tonnage should be increased. A duty of ten dollars per ton does not seem greater than what is required for the protection of American vessels. But I cannot form any correct estimate of the probable addition resulting to the revenue from such increase. Much would depend on the suppression of the trade carried on by American vessels with enemies' licenses.

With respect to the necessity of providing an additional revenue for the year 1814, I beg leave to refer to the statements made and opinions expressed, when I had the honor several weeks ago to wait on the Committee of Ways and Means. And I beg leave to add that this necessity has been considerably increased by the subsequent expenditures authorized by law; amongst which must be particularly mentioned the act for the increase of the navy, and that for raising twenty thousand men for one year. Indeed, considering the general rate of expenditure resulting from the war measures which have been adopted, I am of opinion, it will be necessary to recur both to a modification or repeal of the non-importation acts and to the proposed internal taxes, in order to provide a revenue commensurate with those expenses. When an additional revenue of five millions was believed sufficient, that opinion was predicated on the supposition made by the Committee, that annual loans of only ten or eleven millions of dollars would be wanted. With a revenue of twelve millions of dollars for this year, it is ascertained that a loan of at least sixteen millions is necessary.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

HON. LANGDON CHEVES, Chairman, &c.

The report and documents were read.

Mr. CHEVES then introduced the bill above-mentioned, which was read the first time, and ordered to be read a second time by a vote of 44 to 36.

The report and bill were referred to a Committee of the Whole and made the order of the day for Wednesday next. The bill is as follows:

A Bill partially to suspend, for a limited time, the several acts prohibiting importations from Great Britain and her dependencies, and of the produce and manufactures thereof; to lay additional duties, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the operation of so much of any act or acts as prohibit the importation into the United States of goods, wares, and merchandise, of the growth, produce, and manufacture of, or imported from, Great Britain or Ireland, or any of the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain, or ports or places in the actual possession of Great Britain, be and the same is hereby suspended, with the exceptions and under the restrictions hereinafter provided by this act: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the recovery of any fines, forfeitures, or penalties, incurred by reason of any infraction of the act or acts first above mentioned.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to permit the importation into the United States of any articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions colonies, and dependencies, of Great Britain, owned at the time of such importation, in whole or in part, by a subject of Great Britain, or by whomsoever owned, if of the following description, viz: hats, shoes, millinery, ready-made clothing; articles of which silk, leather, hemp, or flax, is the principal material, Irish linens excepted; cloths, of which wool is the principal material, and the prime cost of which shall exceed six shillings sterling per square yard thereof; and cloths of which cotton is the principal material, and the prime cost of which shall be less than fifteen pence sterling, or shall exceed three shillings sterling per square yard thereof: the importation of which several articles shall continue to be prohibited, according to the tenor and meaning of the acts first above mentioned, and in the same manner as if this act had not passed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no drawback of the duties payable on the goods, wares, and merchandise, which may legally be imported into the United States, by virtue of the provisions of this act, shall be allowed or paid on the re-exportation of such goods, wares, and merchandise, any act to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, which may be legally imported into the United States by virtue of this act, and on the importation of which no duty has heretofore been payable by law, the same duty on the value thereof, as by law is levied and collected on the importation of goods, wares, and merchandise, not otherwise enumerated; which duty shall be levied and collected in the same manner and under the same regulations, mode of security, and time of payment, respectively, as are prescribed by law, in relation to the duties now in force, on the importation of goods, wares, and merchandise.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any judge or court of the United States to order the restoration and delivery of any goods, wares, and merchandise, the importation of which is or may be prohibited by law, and which shall, accordingly thereto, have been seized or libelled on account of such importation, to any person or persons claiming the same. But such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall remain in the custody of the proper officer until final condemnation or acquittal, unless they be directed to be sold by order of the proper court.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all vessels laden, in whole or in part, with salt, or with plaster of Paris, and arriving in the United States, from any foreign port or place, shall be unladen under the inspection of a proper officer of the customs. And the compensation allowed by law to the inspectors shall, whilst they may be thus employed, be paid by the importers or consignees of such cargoes, in the same manner as is now provided by law for the payment of inspectors employed on board of vessels remaining more than fourteen days unladen.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, on all ships or vessels belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of foreign Powers, which shall be entered in the United States after the passing of this act, there shall be paid an additional duty of six dollars per ton; which duty shall be levied and collected in the same manner as is prescribed by law in relation to the duties now in force on the tonnage of ships or vessels.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be and continue in force from the passage thereof until the first day of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and no longer.

YAZOO CLAIMS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, on the bill from the Senate relative to the compromise of the Yazoo purchases, and the amendments proposed by the Committee of Public Lands to the same.

MR. HARPER.—Mr. Chairman: The amendments proposed to be made to the bill by the Committee on the Public Lands, are of a nature so essentially different in principle from its original provisions, that it will be impossible to give them a fair discussion without dwelling principally and particularly upon the salutary provisions contemplated by the bill as it has passed the Senate. I possess neither the disposition nor ability to animadvert upon the sentiments or propositions of any honorable member of this House, more especially upon the recommendations of a respectable and highly meritorious committee. I will content myself by observing that, as on the one hand I cannot conscientiously vote for the proposed amendments; so on the other, I will not speak lightly or disrespectfully of them. I am fully convinced that they emanated from a pure and patriotic source, and that love of country was the inducement of the committee to submit them for consideration. And although I cannot bring my mind to subscribe to the propositions, yet I trust I shall be pardoned, when I attempt to assign my reasons for voting in favor of the original bill, and for preferring the provisions contained in that bill to the propositions and alterations made by the committee, and now under consideration.

From the most mature reflection and deliberation I have been able to bestow upon the subject, I am led conclusively to the opinion that the compromise recommended by your agents and recognised by the bill ought to be adopted. By the passage of this bill, I do not perceive that the United States will be in the least degree injured; on the contrary, I think that every guard necessary for the national interest is introduced.

Two great principles have produced the opinion I have just given:

1st. A sense of the justice due to innocent and suffering individuals.

2d. That sound national policy which renders certain, and advances improvements, arts, and everything calculated to promote the interests of an enlightened and virtuous community.

In support of my first proposition, "that justice is due to the innocent sufferers," allow me to present to you, succinctly, a just statement of the case.

In January, 1795, the Legislature of Georgia, (being the sovereign power of that State,) who owned the lands in controversy, for the consideration of about half a million of dollars, granted the same to four companies. The grant bore every evidence of authenticity and formality that is known to the United States, or any part of them. These companies soon after, and principally as early as September, in the same year, and none, I believe, later than February, in the year following, conveyed and contracted away these lands to many individuals and companies. One of these companies was in South Carolina; all the rest were in Pennsylvania and to the east of it. Here it is to be remarked, that, in all the States east of the Delaware, the grants of a State are considered as sure and certain; and whenever, from any cause, a title so derived has failed, the State governments refund the consideration paid, and interest, together with all the improvements. The sub-purchasers, who are innocent citizens, and never heard of any fraud which might have been practised on, or by the Legislature of Georgia, or any member of it, paid for this property more than four millions of dollars, seventeen years since.

It has since been said that a great number of the members of the Legislature of Georgia were interested in the grants, which interest is to be considered as a bribe; and, as a man cannot avail himself of his own wrong, so no advantage can be derived to him from his own impure or improper act. To this doctrine I fully subscribe. But it is said further, that, as the grants originated in fraud, so that fraud contaminated the act and destroyed its legal effect, as well to the destruction of the innocent, who knew not of the fraud, as of the guilty partners of the iniquity. To this latter doctrine I can never subscribe, in the present state of society. It is applying, under the mild precepts of Christ, that severe doctrine of the Jewish dispensation, that the children's teeth are set on edge by the fathers' eating sour grapes. Let the guilty suffer, but let the innocent go free, is alike the doctrine of our holy religion, of morality, and of common sense. This doctrine is supported by the common, and even by the statute laws of the land.

It is well known that a general agent may do whatever his principal may; that the principal is bound, however the agent may abuse his trust; and that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third person, he who enabled the third person to occasion the loss must sustain it.

An absolute conveyance by a trustee, whose trust does not appear of record, gives a full title to an innocent purchaser; nor is it material how far the trust may be misapplied.

If a man gives a voluntary deed to one, and the grants for a valuable consideration to another, the land is forever bound; so, if a man obtain a negotiable bill by fraud, and pass it for a good consideration, the assignee shall hold. Again, if a man comes in without notice, under a fraudulent conveyance, he shall hold; for a deed, though fraudulent in its creation, may, by after acts, be made good; as, where A fraudulently grants to B to the injury of C, and C afterwards, for consideration, grants to D, who knows nothing of the previous fraud, D shall hold the property.

The true doctrine is, that fraudulent acts may be set aside as between either of the guilty parties and an innocent person, but never to the injury of the innocent person.

The Constitution and law ordain that full faith and credit shall be given to the acts of a State; and will you punish an innocent man by the loss of all his property for giving that faith and credit which by law you require?

It was on these principles that our President, our Secretary of the Treasury, and our late Attorney General, recommended the very principles of compromise which the bill now before you proposes to carry into effect, and which these unfortunate complainants are now willing to meet, to accept, and thereon to release to you their titles, bottomed in equity, and rendered valid by law.

It was upon these principles that, in the important case of Fletcher vs. Peck, (VI Cranch's Reports, 87,) before the Supreme Court of the United States, that final tribunal decided, and unanimously, (where a majority of the judges on the bench were Republicans, appointed by Jefferson, "the Father of Democracy,") that the title to all these lands was, by law, in the innocent purchasers, who now offer to receive one-eighth of the value in stock, bottomed on the lands alone, without in the least interfering with or entangling any other fund of the nation.

Sir, I am no advocate for the parties concerned in any fraud; I advocate solely the cause of the innocent, that cause which will always receive the sanction of your tribunals of justice, and, at a period not remote, the approbation of all the thoughtful and patriotic men of the nation.

I proceed to consider the policy of the United States; and I do not hesitate to say that, independent of the justice of the case, the true and sound policy of this nation requires the adoption of this bill.

The first object in the policy of a Republic is, to inspire confidence, and to cherish the belief that the Government entertains a peculiar regard for the happiness and rights of every citizen.

In proportion as this confidence is confirmed, is both the safety and practical energy of the nation. Now, when a section considers any portion of its citizens oppressed or treated with severity, that section will lose a part of its confidence. From this want of confidence will arise actual distrust and jealousy, and from these feelings an indisposition to the public service, with some chances of eventual resistance.

These natural operations of the mind furnish, in some part, an explanation of the causes of irritation, which exist in the North. Remove the cause, by allowing to injured and virtuous citizens those rights to which they are entitled, as well by the rule of morality and equity as by your laws, and you lay a foundation for the restoration of confidence, and a consequent unity of action. To be sure, there are other causes of irritation, in their opinion; and, by this measure, full confidence might not be regained, but certainly one of the great obstacles to national harmony would be destroyed.

The value of property depends as well on the certainty and simplicity of title, as upon advantageous location or fertility of soil. While these claims remain without compromise, that certainty and simplicity of title cannot be given; for the Supreme Court have unanimously decided, that these claimants have good right to the country by law.

It does not comport with the Constitution of this nation for the Legislative or Executive power to annul the decisions of the Supreme Judiciary, and, if it was Constitutional, there would be a want of wisdom in hazarding the conflict.

I will remark that, hitherto, neither the national nor any State Legislature have opposed the judicial interpretation of the law; that under the State governments many cases have occurred, in which the judiciary have annulled the acts of the legislative power; that, during Washington's Administration, the judiciary set aside an act of Congress, and the act was afterwards moulded by that Administration to the judicial interpretation of the Constitution; and that no State authority can control the national judiciary, is apparent from the Constitution, and the case of Olmstead, in Pennsylvania, when, under a statute of that Commonwealth, her Governor called for the military of the State to resist the decision of the national judiciary; he likewise appealed to President Madison, who, instead of complying with that appeal, called forth the military of the nation to execute the determination and judgment of the court. Indeed, it is a part of the business of your President to aid in carrying the judgments of your courts into effect; and, by opposing those judgments, he would violate his oath of office, and become liable to impeachment; from which must follow conviction, or your Constitution would be annihilated.

It can require no argument or logic to show that a violation of your Constitution would be opposed to all the dictates of wisdom. You cannot be ignorant, that when the rights of a portion of people, belonging to any section, are withheld, they are absolved from the obligations resulting from the social compact; nor, with me, can you fail to deplore those evils which must arise in case the national ligaments are dissolved: Let the curtain drop, and this question remain undiscussed forever.

The compromise, as proposed by the bill, will not cost this nation the value of one cent in cash or land. In the convention between the United States and Georgia, five millions of acres of the lands in dispute were appropriated to settle these and other claims; and when the same were, by special act of Congress, appropriated for these purposes, it was known that all the other claims did not embrace half a million of acres. The consequence is inevitable and irresistible, that, by the act of Congress, the five millions were appropriated to make provision for these innocent and unfortunate after-purchasers; who now, under their multiplied misfortunes, after a decision of the Supreme Court, in which the judges unanimously have decided that, by law, they own the whole country, feeling alike an indisposition and an inability to contend with the Legislature of their country, offer to take less than one-eighth of what your own courts have declared to be their rights.

Now this fund of five millions of acres may, by the State of Georgia, justly be considered to have been held in trust for this object. Georgia may say, and it is not improbable that hereafter she will say: "These five millions of acres were conveyed to the United States to enable them to settle all these disputes; we had no other consideration for it; you gave us nothing else than an implied promise to remove these difficulties. For our other lands you engaged to give us, from their avails, at first twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars; by refusing this compromise you have withheld from us our money; hazarded the final payment, and the whole title; and, as you have not applied this land to its destined object, give it back to us, and we will act for ourselves."

Supposing Georgia said this, what could Congress, regarding moral honesty, say for itself without making the compromise? And God forbid that I should suppose a time should, which certainly does not now, exist, in which moral honesty is not regarded. She could not open her mouth. She is bound by every tie either to make the compromise, or to cease to make claim to these lands under the convention with Georgia. But, sir, some have supposed it was better, among whom appear to be the Committee on the Public Lands, to grant the five millions of acres than the choice and alternatives proposed in the bill. They have imagined that, under this bill, your moneys derived from your imposts, your taxes, or other funds, might be drawn from your Treasury. This is not so. I do not pretend to know whether the claimants will accept the lands; but I understand they offer to choose, out of the propositions offered to them by your President, your Secretary of the Treasury, and your great law officer. I think this offer on their part fair and honorable; and when they surrender more than seven-eighths of what your judges have decided to be their rights, I cannot conceive it unreasonable to leave them to take the alternatives offered by your own agents.

Sir, I can easily conceive of reasons which, while they do not injure the nation, will induce the claimants to prefer the stock resting on the land to the land itself. 1st. It is seventeen years since they purchased; many of the former holders are dead, and their widows and orphans look to this property as the means of support. Yes, sir, widows and orphans, who, in consequence of these contracts, innocently entered into on the part of their deceased husbands and parents, have been driven from a state of ease and affluence to that of wretchedness and misery. 2d. The land which is proposed to be conveyed to them is subject to Indian claim, which cannot be removed till it suits the policy of Government. 3d. These people, who want the avails to uphold life, if allowed by the President to buy of the Indians, instead of gaining the means of a support, will be compelled to sacrifice the property; or, if they possess it, to put forth more money to place it in a state of activity.

On the other hand, the Government has hitherto kept the monopoly of Western lands, and it cannot be for their interests to have five millions of acres to compete with her in the market.

There is not the least sacrifice on the part of Government. The five millions of acres Georgia conveyed to effect the compromise. By law these five millions cannot be sold short of ten millions of dollars. And what is it the bill offers at most? In lieu of the five millions of acres, a fund of two and a half millions of dollars, payable with interest, out of the avails of these lands, and out of nothing else; and after the previous debt of twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall have been paid to Georgia—which, instead of two dollars, is only half a dollar per acre, and interest on that half dollar till sale—or five millions of dollars without interest, payable after Georgia is thus paid, and out of no other fund than the lands themselves. So that five millions of dollars from the sales of the very lands appropriated is reserved by Government for Indian title and other expense, which is equal to one-half of the value.

The plain amount of the bill is this: Congress, to gain a clear title to forty millions of acres of lands, which the Supreme Court have decided belong to individuals, are to keep at the Treasury a separate account of the avails of the sales of these lands; and out of these avails, in the first place, they are to pay to Georgia twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and then to the honest purchasers two and a half millions of dollars, with interest, or five millions of dollars without interest; and, after these payments are made, they are to put into the national Treasury all the avails of the residue of the forty millions of acres, which, at the public price for lands, will be seventy-three millions of dollars clear profit; or they are to hazard the whole, as well as Georgia her one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, upon the doubtful chance of a future change in the opinion of the Supreme Court. Can it be a dictate of prudence to incur this hazard?

The interests of the people of the Mississippi Territory loudly demand this compromise. It is necessary for their prosperity that the wilderness should be cultivated; that their population should be increased, and every facility should be given to new settlers. But we must remember, and here I beg gentlemen to remember, that when they are formed into a State the Yazoo claimants can bring ejectment, and force the honest planter to come here, to vindicate his title before the Supreme Court; and the whole country will be in dispute. From hence will arise scenes of confusion, expense, and every evil which attends a state of uncertainty.

I beg pardon of the gentleman from Georgia for venturing the assertion; but, sir, to my mind, it is apparent that the interest of the people of Georgia requires this compromise. We are at war, and none of our treasuries are overflowing. Pass this bill, and it gives to Georgia a prompt payment of above twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars, by enabling her now to make use of that amount in her treasury, arising from these lands, under such circumstances that she cannot now use it, without a breach of the public faith.

By passing the bill, all doubts as to our title will be removed. The sales will become more active, and, not to mention the present hazard, she will sooner receive her million and a fourth of dollars. She is anxious about her Southern frontier, and does she overlook entirely her Western? Is it of no moment to her to have the country opened between her capital and Mobile? To make her interior the thoroughfare for all the Atlantic people visiting Louisiana? Does she prefer the savage to the planter and farmer for neighbor? And, sir, who is there that does not know that while these claims remain uncompromised the Indian title will remain, and consequently these lands be kept from market?

Once more, sir; these claimants are considered by the Eastern Legislatures as fully entitled to relief. They have more than once expressed this opinion, unitedly, and not by party or for party purposes. And would it not be consoling to the honorable feelings of the people of Georgia, to know that these innocent persons are relieved from evils, which arose from their own misplaced confidence, and to give this evidence of their regard for the opinions of the sister States?

Sir, the passage of this bill will materially advance the prosperity of the whole people west of the Alleghany. It is well known that New Orleans is their market: that they descend by water, and return by land; that in returning they have to pass through these disputed lands, for four hundred miles, which are and will be a wilderness until this dispute is settled; and the hardships, expense, and risks of life and property, from thence resulting, is apparent to every person of reflection. It really increases the expense of freight upon the whole products of the West.

Sir, in addition to the reasons I have assigned in favor of this compromise, allow me to remark, that the inhabitants of the Mississippi are much exposed to the aggressions of foreign Powers, feeble from want of numbers, and hemmed in by powerful savages; that the importance of that section of the country to this nation is incalculable, while its means of self-defence are weak indeed: and from hence I infer, and I think justly, that in a national view it is a matter of the first importance to compromise these disputes, to purchase the Indian title, and to open the country under such circumstances as are best calculated to produce a numerous and hardy population.

Had this dispute been compromised under Mr. Adams's Administration, and the lands offered in market, there would have been no more need of an army to protect the Mississippi than there is of an army to protect the Potomac; and the moneys already expended in supporting our troops in that quarter, vastly exceed the sum that ever would have been necessary to effect a compromise. Yet most of this money might have been saved, and been now in your Treasury; for the compromise might have been, as it now can be effected, without costing the nation one cent either in money or in land.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Duane's Hand-Book.

The protection of the Mississippi, from this day to the end of next September, will cost us more than the amount proposed to be paid from the lands for a compromise. The same evil will and must exist, as long as the same policy is pursued. A country exposed to a foreign enemy, weak in its population, rich and inviting in its character, commanding the outlet of more than a million of persons, half surrounded by powerful savages, and distant more than four hundred miles from a vigorous yeomanry, must be protected by regular troops, and at a great expense.

Believing, sir, as I most religiously do, that these injured and suffering claimants have a right to demand this act of justice at our hands—believing that the faith of the nation is in a degree pledged to settle these disputed claims; and, believing also, that the true, sound policy of the nation, requires that we should do it—I should be criminal to myself—I should be criminal to those by whose partiality I am now permitted to address you—I should be criminal to the American people, were I to withhold my support from the passage of the bill.

Mr. CLAY moved that the Committee rise and report progress, with a view to lay the subject over for the session; which he supported on the ground that there was not time to discuss the subject fully during the present limited session, without neglecting business of immediate and pressing importance.

Mr. CLAY's motion was opposed by Messrs. POINDEXTER, WRIGHT, and WIDGERY, and supported by Mr. BIBB; when the question was taken and carried—yeas 63, nays 48.

The Committee then rose and reported progress; and the question arose whether the Committee should have leave to sit again; which, (after some observations from Mr. STOW, in favor of leave,) was decided by yeas and nays—for granting leave 53, against it 65, as follows.

YEAS—Daniel Avery, Ezekiel Bacon, John Baker, Abijah Bigelow, Harmanus Bleeker, Adam Boyd, James Breckenridge, Elijah Brigham, Francis Carr, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, jun., Samuel Dinsmoor, William Ely, James Emott, James Fisk, Asa Fitch, Thos. On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the bill and report on the subject, made by the Committee of Public Lands, was ordered to lie on the table. Motion carried—yeas 60, nays 50.

TUESDAY, February 16.

Mr. MILNOR presented a memorial of the Pennsylvania Society for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, complaining that American vessels, navigated by American citizens, are engaged in the African slave trade, under the flags of foreign nations, and praying that Congress will take this subject into consideration, and pass such laws as will remedy the evil of which they complain.—Referred to a select committee; and Mr. MILNOR, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. WHEATON, and Mr. EARLE, were appointed the committee.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, praying that an act may be passed authorizing them to make a turnpike road from Georgetown, in the direction of Leesburg, in the State of Virginia, to the boundary of the said District.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The engrossed bill authorizing the appointment of additional officers in the Territories of the United States, was read a third time, and passed; and also the bill authorizing the discharge of Daniel Updike from his imprisonment; the bill for the relief of Samuel Ellis; and the bill giving further time for registering claims to land in the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for releasing to the owners of privateers all claims of the United States, under the non-importation law, to British property taken on board of American vessels.

After some minutes spent in Committee of the Whole, the Committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

DUANE'S HAND-BOOK.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill "establishing an elementary exercise for the infantry of the militia and Army of the United States."

[The bill proposes the adoption of the system entitled "A Hand-book for Infantry," the author of which is William Duane, as the system of elementary exercise for the infantry of the militia and Army of the United States.]

A letter from the present Secretary of War to the Military Committee recommends the adoption of this system.

Mr. TURNER opposed the bill, on account of defects which he alleged in the proposed system.

Mr. WILLIAMS warmly defended it, and at some length advocated its adoption.

Mr. WRIGHT said a few words in its favor; and the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

On the question of engrossing the bill for a third reading, considerable debate took place, Mr. TALLMADGE and Mr. QUINCY opposing, and Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. JOHNSON supporting it.

A motion was made by Mr. TURNER to amend the bill, so as to confine its effects to the Army of the United States, and not to extend it to the militia; which motion was negatived; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

On motion of Mr. LACOCK, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the naturalization laws of the United States; which, having been amended in Committee, was reported to the House.

Mr. LACOCK moved to amend the bill by extending the naturalization of aliens to all those "who have heretofore or may within nine months hereafter, declare their intention agreeably to law to become citizens of the United States," and declaring that they may be admitted as such.

This motion was negatived.—For the amendment 45, against it 48.

On the question of concurrence with the committee in striking out the second section of the bill, which deprives of his right to the privileges of citizenship any citizen who shall depart from and remain without the limits of the United States for a term of two years—the yeas and nays were, for striking out the section 71, against it 43, as follows:

The bill having been thus amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, February 17.

The engrossed bill supplementary to the several acts on the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization, was read a third time.

Mr. BACON opposed its passage on the ground of the impolicy of encouraging the emigration of alien enemies during the existence of war; and concluded a short speech against the bill by moving its commitment to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRUNDY supported the motion, on the ground of defects in the detail of the bill, which he wished to amend.

The motion, for recommitment, was carried by a large majority, and the bill made the order of the day for Monday.

The engrossed bill establishing an Elementary Exercise for the infantry of the army and militia of the United States, was read a third time, and passed.—For the bill 56, against it 28.

The House then resolved into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriation for the support of Government for the year 1813; and the blanks in the bill having been filled with the several sums moved by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, the Committee rose and reported the bill; and the amendments having been agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WAR TAXES.

Mr. LITTLE introduced the following resolution, with some remarks in favor of the policy of the non-importation act, to which he avowed himself to be very friendly, and to the suspension of which he was opposed:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and hereby are, instructed to report to this House a bill or bills laying taxes for the support of the war."

The question of consideration of this resolution was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—for consideration 66, against it 38, as follows:

Troup, Laban Wheaton, and Thomas Wilson—38.

The resolution being thus presented to the House for its adoption—

A desultory debate of two hours took place on it, in the course of which a motion was made by Mr. GRUNDY to lay the resolution on the table, and negatived—60 to 45.

The following was the course of the debate, which was of too irregular a nature to be reported entire.

Mr. GRUNDY opposed the motion, because it had already been declared impracticable, by the Committee of Ways and Means, to act properly on the subject at the present session.

Mr. LITTLE supported it, on the ground of his opposition to a suspension of the non-importation act, a measure which he reprobated as injurious to the manufactures of our country and weakening our measures against Great Britain, of which he considered the non-importation act to be as powerful as any.

Mr. Stow advocated the motion, because he wished the House to redeem the pledge given at the last session that taxes would be laid at this, and to observe something like consistency in their proceedings.

Mr. WRIGHT was also warmly in favor of the measure, and rather imputed blame to the Committee of Ways and Means for not having before acted on this subject, without waiting for instructions from the House.

Mr. BIBB replied to the remarks which had been made in favor of the resolution. At the last session it was presumed that it would be necessary to lay taxes at this session; but the revenue accruing in the intermediate time had swelled so far beyond its anticipated amount as to render it unnecessary to levy taxes for the service of the ensuing year.

Mr. WRIGHT again spoke in favor of the motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON was decidedly in favor of a repeal or modification of the non-importation act, though he believed both that measure and the imposition of taxes would be necessary to supply the revenue.

Mr. McKIM was in favor of the motion, because he was opposed to the suspension or weakening of the non-importation act.

Mr. CHEVES spoke at length in defence of the Committee of Ways and Means, and in demonstration of the impracticability of acting on the subject properly at the present session. Sitting day and night, and passing by all other business, a proper system of taxation could not be digested and put into the form of law before the end of the session. Two only, out of fourteen of the bills it would be necessary to pass to carry the system proposed at the last session into effect, would require the whole of the present session to perfect them. The passage of a system of taxation, besides, would not obviate the necessity of the passage of the law for suspending partially the non-importation act. It would require both. The taxes, he agreed, must be laid, but could not at the present session.

Mr. WRIGHT replied.

Mr. Stow again spoke. He would, if all the tax bills could not be passed, at least pass one, and break the charm which seemed to withhold the House from touching the subject.

Mr. ARCHER moved to strike out the whole of the resolution, for the purpose of inserting an instruction to the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill or bills, pursuant to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject, which passed the House on the 4th day of March, 1812.

This modification of the motion was accepted by Mr. LITTLE.

Mr. CHEVES then withdrew his objection to the motion, as it contained a definite instruction, and he felt a delicacy as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means in opposing it, though he was convinced it would be impracticable to pass the bills at the present session.

Mr. ROBERTS opposed the motion, and expressed his regret that the discussion, which was fixed for to-morrow, should be forestalled by this resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON warmly opposed the motion, as going to cast censure on a committee which had labored day and night in its vocation, and requiring them to originate measures which they had already declared it impracticable to act on at the present session, &c.

Mr. WIDGERY also spoke against the motion, decidedly.

The question on the adoption of the resolution, as modified by Mr. ARCHER, was decided as follows:

A communication of a confidential nature was announced from the Senate: On which, the House was cleared of all persons, except the Members and officers of the House, and the doors were closed, and after remaining so for some time, they were again opened; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 18.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide new certificates of registry; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, reported the bill from the Senate "for the relief of John Redfield, junior," without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. TALLMAN,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs inquire into the expediency of placing on the pension list of the United States all officers and seamen that may be wounded on board of any of the revenue cutters of the United States, in the line of their duty, and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1813, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "vesting in the United States the power of retaliation in the cases therein specified."

The bill was read twice and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Susanna Wiley. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate for the relief of Reuben Attwater. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a "joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the mode of electing Electors of President and Vice President;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment.

The Committee rose and reported the bill to the House, without amendment, when it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day. The bill was subsequently read a third time and passed.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill allowing further time for delivering the evidence in support of claims to land in the Territory of Missouri, and for regulating the donation grants therein. The bill was reported to the House with sundry amendments, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the House went into a Committee of the whole House, on the bill regulating foreign coins.

[The bill provides that all foreign gold and silver coins shall be legal tender, and fixes the value thereof, and limits the operation of the act to five years.]

The bill passed through the Committee of the Whole, was reported to the House and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill for the encouragement of Vaccination passed through a Committee of the Whole, without amendment, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The bill to alter the times of holding the district courts of New York and Virginia, passed through a Committee of the whole House, and on motion it was ordered to lie on the table.

CAPTURED PROPERTY.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill remitting the claim of the United States to certain goods, wares, &c., captured by the private armed vessels of the United States.

Captured Property—Extra Session.

H. OF R.

Mr. McKIM, under the belief that the bill as it now stands does not place privateers on a better footing than before, and does not answer the object intended by the resolution which produced it, proposed the following substitute by way of amendment:

"That all right and claim of the United States to British property, which may have been captured by American privateers, arising from forfeiture under any provision of the act entitled 'An act to prohibit commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' and an act entitled 'An act concerning the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and France and their dependencies and for other purposes,' and an act supplementary to the last mentioned act, be, and the same is hereby, relinquished for the benefit of the owners, officers, and crews of the privateers respectively that may have captured the same."

This amendment produced some discussion, in which Messrs. McKIM and WRIGHT advocated the motion, and Messrs. ROBERTS and FISK opposed it; when the question was taken and lost, without a division.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to amend the bill, so as to include captures made of goods which were shipped anterior to as well as since the declaration of war was known in England. This amendment was adopted, 46 to 32.

The Committee then rose, reported the bill to the House, as amended; the amendments were concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow, 47 to 39.

FRIDAY, February 19.

Another member, to wit: from New Hampshire, GEORGE SULLIVAN, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. McKIM presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, remonstrating against a repeal of the non-importation acts, and suggesting the necessity of further legal provisions more effectually to enforce the said acts.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TALLMAN, from the committee appointed on the seventeenth instant, reported a bill authorizing the discharge of John McMaster from confinement; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Susannah Wiley was read the third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill regulating the currency of foreign coins, was read a third time, and passed without opposition.

The engrossed bill to encourage vaccination, by allowing all letters to and from an agent, to be appointed to preserve the true and genuine vaccine matter, to be free of postage, was read a third time; and, after the rejection of a motion to recommit it for amendment, made by Mr. WILLIAMS, and of a motion to postpone indefinitely, by Mr. STANFORD, it was amended by general consent, and passed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of John Redfield, junior, was read a third time; the bill for the relief of Reuben Attwater, and the bill allowing further time for delivering evidence in support of claims to land in the Territory of Missouri, were read a third time, and passed.

The joint resolution from the Senate "proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the mode of electing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CAPTURED PROPERTY.

The engrossed bill to release the claims of the United States on certain goods, wares, and merchandise, captured by private armed vessels, was read a third time, and debated.

The bill was passed by the following vote, by yeas and nays—for the bill 38, against it 52:

Mr. GRUNDY, after a few observations on the impracticability of laying the taxes necessary to produce a revenue for 1814, at the present session, and the difficulty of passing the bill now before the House for suspending the non-importation, if indeed it passed at all, and the consequent necessity for an earlier meeting of Congress than usual, offered the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That it is expedient that the Thirteenth

Congress should assemble on the last Monday in May next, and that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill providing therefor."

Mr. G. also observed that the fate of this resolution would test the propriety of proceeding at this time in the discussion of the bill for the modification of the non-importation act.

Mr. BIBB said he was pleased at the introduction of this resolution, with the object avowed, of testing the expediency of discussing the late report of the Committee of Ways and Means, in which he had in part concurred. The ungracious manner in which that report had been received by the House, and the debate which took place yesterday, had satisfied Mr. B.'s mind that there was no probability of passing the bill at the present session. The question then arose, whether any public good could arise from a discussion without a probability of obtaining a decision on it. He was satisfied that no good would result. He was convinced the bill reported by the committee ought to pass; but, perceiving so many of a different opinion, he was disposed to concur in the resolution, in order to postpone the subject to the next session.

Mr. ROBERTS expressed his regret that the resolution had been brought forward, because he thought it misjudged and ill timed. The Committee of Ways and Means, after attending to their duty with some sort of diligence, had reported, as the result of their inquiries, that it would be necessary to pass a bill for partially suspending the non-importation act, as well as to lay the taxes. It was true the bill had been brought forward late; but it had better be discussed now than postponed to an extra session, when the House would not be as well organized, and considerable time must elapse before much business could be done. It was important that the suspension law at least should pass at the present session, if not the taxes also. If the project for a modification of the non-importation was not acceptable to the House, there were other items in that bill which might be; for instance, the increased duty on foreign tonnage, &c. Mr. R. concluded his observations by moving that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. GRUNDY said he hoped that if it was not the inclination of the House to adopt the resolution, they would reject it at once. He was of opinion it would be placing the public credit on firmer ground to show that Congress would come here in May for the express purpose of providing the ways and means, than to proceed hastily to suspend, even partially, the non-importation law. It was important that the public mind should receive no shock at this time; and, although he should vote for the bill, if a vote should be taken on it, he yet knew that many well-informed men were warmly opposed to it, and thought it a dangerous measure. He was willing to postpone it until the public mind should be more settled on this subject; and therefore he wished his motion now to pass.

Mr. BIBB said delaying a decision on the motion would defeat its object; for he should in that case feel himself under the necessity of calling up the suspension bill immediately.

Mr. ROBERTS observed that a postponement of the question of modifying the non-importation act, with an eye to the state of the public mind on that subject, could answer no end, unless the public should be in possession of the facts which had influenced the committee to report the bill. It would be merely putting off the evil day, without producing any beneficial effect. Discussion need not produce irritation; it had become more necessary now, from the memorial on the table from Baltimore. The memorial contained allegations, no doubt proceeding from the impressions on the minds of these memorialists, which must have a prejudicial effect on the public mind, as it was evident that the subject was not correctly understood in all its bearings by those who had draughted that memorial.

Mr. RANDOLPH admired the candor of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Tennessee, whatever he might think of their arguments. What was the amount of the observations of the gentleman from Tennessee, if he understood them? At this time the elections in three of the Southern States—Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee—the result of which would unquestionably determine the political complexion of the next Congress—had not yet taken place. The election in one of them, and that considerably the largest, would come on in April next. In order to avoid giving offence to the orthodox believers in the non-importation act, it was now proposed to avoid touching it during the present session of Congress, and to postpone it until the elections were over. This was what the gentleman from Pennsylvania called putting off the evil day; while the gentleman from Tennessee seemed to think "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." Again: as the imposition of taxes at the present session might not have the happiest effect on the elections in these States, this great question, to meet which we had screwed our courage to the sticking place at the last session of Congress, was also to be put off. On the other hand, the gentleman from Pennsylvania said that the next Congress might be composed of men not quite so well organized (not drilled!) as the present Congress, and therefore it would be better to act, now that we have the power, because it is not so very certain, if we postpone it, that we shall have the power to act, if we have the will. These sentiments are openly avowed by gentlemen who are in fact leaders of the majority of the House. Is it possible that the American people can be imposed upon by so barefaced a fetch as this? I, for one, said Mr. R., have no objections to an early meeting of Congress, if the public service require it. But I will not consent to lay aside that responsibility which I owe to those I represent on this floor, in order to lay up a little fund of popularity against the next elections. I shall, therefore, vote for the resolution's lying on the table. Mr. R. said the resolution in fact looked one way and rowed another. It looked to an earlier convention of the next Congress for matters of great public concern; it was in fact, and avowedly, putting off the suspending law and the laying of taxes, until another Congress should be elected. To this he was decidedly opposed.

H. OF R.

Mr. GRUNDY disclaimed the motive imputed to him by the gentleman from Virginia; he had before declared his intention to vote for the suspending bill, and that declaration ought to have shielded him from the gentleman's remark. Such an idea as he had suggested would not have entered the mind of any one disposed to view the subject fairly. The non-importation law must be suspended or a double portion of taxes must be laid. Ten millions or more must be levied of internal taxes, or the non-importation act must be repealed or modified. The only question was, which was the most eligible mode of raising a revenue; to modify the non-importation act, and lay five millions of taxes; or leave it as it is, and have five or ten millions more of taxes. There was an additional consideration, Mr. G. said, which he had omitted to urge. What change three or four months might produce in the relations of this country with other countries was extremely uncertain; no man could foretell; a change might take place to make one or the other of these measures more or less eligible, &c. The insinuations which had been made by the gentleman from Virginia in relation to the pending elections, were unfounded as to himself, and entitled to no weight.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he had made no insinuation or suggestion whatever in relation to the gentleman from Tennessee or from Pennsylvania. He had put the gentlemen literally on their own ground. There was no occasion or room for explanation. With regard, however, to the declaration by the gentleman from Tennessee of his willingness to vote for a suspension of the non-importation act, while his motion, if it prevailed, would virtually operate to postpone that question, his declaration would not operate that perfect effect in relation to his motion which the gentleman seemed to think it ought to have. The gentleman had only to recur to the journals of the last session, and he would find his own vote, with that of other gentlemen in favor of laying taxes—a pledge much stronger than a declaration of a disposition to vote for anything—and yet the taxes were not, and, probably, would not be laid, even at this session.

Mr. FISK said he was in favor of the resolution, because he was opposed to the present suspension of the non-importation act. It was no imposition on the nation, nor was he able to understand how or why it could be so construed, unless the gentleman supposed the repeal might have some effect on the elections in Virginia. But was it true that it would affect them? Did that gentleman depend on the effect of any such measure to secure his own re-election? Mr. F. said he should not have mentioned this surmise if the gentleman himself had not introduced the subject. But he had heard it said that what men most think about, they most talk about.

Why, then, did the gentleman talk about elections, or why did he suppose this motion intended merely to operate upon elections? The gentleman may reasonably be supposed to wish the taxes to be laid, &c., in order to aid his election, more especially as he intends to vote against them. The inference is as fair on one side as on the other. Such arguments can have no effect.

Mr. WRIGHT opposed the resolution, because he was clearly of opinion there was ample time to lay the taxes at the present session, without putting the nation to the expense, and the members to the inconvenience of an extra session. The public credit required they should now be acted on, and he was ready to vote for them. He was decidedly opposed to a modification of the non-importation act.

Mr. ROBERTS disclaimed the meaning Mr. RANDOLPH had imputed to him. He had merely meant to say, what every one knew, that it was some time after the first convention of every new Congress, before they were in a state to proceed effectually and regularly with public business.

The question on the motion for laying the resolution on the table, was decided in the negative. For laying it on the table 45, against it 81, as follows:

Robert Whitehill, David R. Williams, and Richard Winn.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. Stow was opposed to it. He dwelt on the expense of an extra session, its inconvenience, and the injury which might result to the public credit from a postponement of the consideration of the ways and means for the next year. He was astonished at the aversion to the taxes. The subject of taxation came on by paroxysms; at one moment they could not be dispensed with, at the next they were postponed, &c. He was very anxious that they should now be discussed.

Mr. CHEVES said, in reply to an allusion of Mr. Stow, that from the earliest period of the last session of Congress, he had seen the necessity of adopting a fixed revenue. He had voted against a postponement of the subject at the last session, had done everything he could to bring it on, and given all the assistance in his power in preparing the necessary bills. True it was, as he had before stated, that the late importations had obviated the necessity of laying taxes for the present year. And he said now, that if the bill just reported by the Committee of Ways and Means were to pass at the present session, Congress might at an early session pass the laws for laying taxes for the service of the next year; though it was indispensable in his opinion that some system of revenue should be provided at the present session. He should under this impression vote against the resolution; although, if the resolution prevailed and put by the suspension bill, he must of necessity vote for a session in May.

Mr. GROSVENOR also was opposed to the resolution, and dwelt on the expense and inconvenience of an extra session. These considerations, however, would yield to stronger arguments in favor of the measure; but none such had been urged. In every point of view the bill for modifying or repealing the non-importation act ought to pass. If we remained at war, the want of revenue rendered its modification necessary: if our situation is likely to be changed, it was a still stronger reason for the repeal. There could therefore be no adequate reason for postponing it. If a decision on this subject be postponed, what will be the situation of the merchants whilst such a measure is hanging over them, and keeping them in perfect uncertainty as to your future measures? Already had they suffered enough from our fluctuating policy. It was due to them that the question should be decided at the present session.

Mr. FINDLEY was much opposed to the idea of an extra session, but if the bill now before the House did not pass, or the taxes were not laid, at the present session, he must of necessity vote for it; because every consideration of private convenience must yield to the public exigency. If an extra session must take place, however, he thought it had better be at an earlier day. He suggested the propriety of leaving the resolution blank as to the day in May at which Congress should assemble.

Mr. GRUNDY yielded to this suggestion of Mr. FINDLEY, and modified his motion accordingly.

Mr. NELSON was opposed to the resolution, not because he was unwilling that Congress should convene at an earlier day than that fixed by the Constitution, if the Executive should think it necessary; but because he was unwilling to shift from himself the responsibility for this awful measure, as gentlemen seemed to think it, which he had pledged himself, from the commencement of the last session of Congress, to take upon him. He had been among those who voted at the commencement of the last session of Congress for certain resolutions, giving to the nation a public pledge that they would supply to the lenders to the Government a fund, to be derived from taxes, for the redemption of the public debt, or for the payment of interest. Having given this pledge, I will not give my vote to retire from it. No, sir, said Mr. N., I wish to see the tax bills immediately laid on the table; that the House should embark in the discussion; and if it should be found that we cannot get through them before the Constitutional period of our labors, I shall then be willing to pass a law for an extra session; for such a bill might be passed in three hours. Let us avoid, said he, the scoffs and revilings of the opposition, and of all parties in the Government, who have said we are unwilling to meet this question. It might be the pleasure of his constituents, he said, to send some other person in his place. He would go with those bills in his hand, and tell them how he had acted. If they were unwilling to support the contest with Great Britain, they would discard him. But he had a better opinion of them. The House, he said, had better labor day and night to perfect the tax bills, and bring into existence the funds they had pledged themselves to provide, than that the public credit should suffer. What assurance had gentlemen that the Government could procure a single dollar of the proposed loan, if they did not provide ways and means for the payment of the interest? Are not the reports of your public officers and committees before the nation, stating that taxes are necessary? And yet do you propose to retire, and "lay the flattering unction to your souls" that they may not be necessary, or that the aspect of your foreign relations may be changed? He considered himself pledged to provide the ways and means, and therefore could not vote for the motion.

Mr. RHEA said he should vote for the motion, without referring to the sentiments of his constituents. As he had no wish to avoid that responsibility which attached to him, he should vote as he thought correct, without considering what might be the construction put on his vote by others.

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke against the motion. He denied the want of time, which had been alleged as a reason for not acting on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. There was always time to do what the House had a disposition to do. With respect to the operation of the postponement of the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means until the elections are over, it would have no effect to render its passage questionable abroad; for, regarding the quarter whence it came, and the sanction it had received, the passage of the bill would be considered as certain. If, on the other hand, there was an indisposition to repeal it, it could not be too soon determined.

The aspect which the House presented to the nation and to the world, Mr. R. said, was one on which he could not by any means delight to dwell. He believed, if we go on for another term of two years as we have for the last two, there will be danger that the Government will dissolve, from its own imbecility. What was the fact? The twelfth Congress had placed the nation in a state of war, and authorized vast military and not small naval preparations. They had sanctioned expenditures to an extent heretofore unknown in the history of this Government. Although in a state of war, and having authorized vast expenses for armies and navies, and loans to an immense amount, unlimited as to interest, and as to sacrifice of principle—to say nothing of the Treasury notes—the same Congress utterly refused to provide the means for supporting the credit of the Government. Is it upon a Parliamentary record like this that you propose to entertain a proposition for peace? It will be spinning out to an infinite extent an already disastrous, disgraceful, and imbecile war. It is throwing from the shoulders of this House and of the Executive branch of the Legislature the awful responsibility fairly attaching to both branches. Averse as he had been to this war from the beginning; sensible as he was of the imbecile, infatuated manner in which it had been conducted; he trusted he should be, if not the last, indisputably among the last men in the House, or in the nation, to approve a disgraceful or even dishonorable peace. And yet, if, at the next session, the President should tender the compact ratifying such a peace—a peace incompatible with the high claims you have set up to the world—what would be the consequence? The President could say, and truly too, that the Congress, by declaring war, voted immense expenditures, and, refusing to provide the ways and means, had driven him to the necessity of making a peace on any terms. Mr. R. said he could not, therefore, lend his agency to produce such a state of things.

But another consideration weighed in some degree—and it was not strange that it should—on his mind. He was unwilling this House should meet, in May next, to gratify the rapacity of the claimants under the Yazoo act of Georgia, of 1795, the cravings of whose appetite had been stayed by the implied promise, in the Committee of the Whole, that when Congress assemble in May next, they shall be gratified to the fullest extent of their wishes. How far this consideration might operate in accelerating the meeting of Congress, it was not for him to say. He had, however, been astonished that the subject had been permitted to slumber on the table of this House as it had been, that, at the next session of Congress, the inchoate act of this House might be permitted to be brought up as one additional motive for gratifying the cupidity of the claimants.

Mr. GRUNDY barely rose to remark, that the consideration last alluded to had certainly no operation on the mind of the mover of the resolution. He had as strong objections to the Yazoo claim as any one in the House, and, when taken up, he would heartily co-operate with that gentleman in its destruction.

The question on the resolution was then decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 70, as follows:

SATURDAY, February 20.

Mr. MILNOR, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Bioren, Duane, and Weightman, reported a bill authorizing a subscription for the laws of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. MILNOR, from the select committee appointed on the memorial of the Abolition Society of Philadelphia, made a report favorable to the memorial, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Suspension of Non-Importation.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

SUSPENSION OF NON-IMPORTATION.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill partially to suspend the non-importation acts, and to lay additional duties on foreign tonnage.

Mr. CHEVES explained the views of the committee in reporting the bill; entered into an exposition of our finances, and of the object and effects of a suspension or modification of the non-importation law.

Mr. BIBB followed Mr. CHEVES in support of the repeal. Though he felt much confidence in the restrictive system, still he thought it expedient now to suspend the non-importation act; it would be a mere change of warfare; and, instead of relying upon its operation upon our enemy, we should now rely solely on the strength and valor of our arms; and this course was the more necessary, as the requisite revenue cannot, at this time, be derived from taxes. Mr. B. went through the bill, explaining and discussing its various provisions, and concluded, by hoping the measure would be adopted.

Mr. WRIGHT spoke some time in opposition to the bill. He believed that the non-importation was the most powerful and efficient weapon which we could wield against Great Britain, and avowed his willingness to raise a revenue by taxes, in preference to deriving it from the importation of British productions.

Mr. BOYD offered the reasons why he should vote against the bill; declaring his confidence in the pressure produced in England by the non-importation, and declared his intention to vote, not only against this bill, but every other which would authorize the introduction of goods from a nation which had treated us with so much injustice.

Mr. POTTER declared himself opposed to the bill, although, as the friends of the restrictive system were about to abandon it, and deliver it over to the mercy of its enemies, he believed it would pass. He could not say respecting this bill, as he did of the bill about seamen, which having peace for its object, if it had any, he thought it would be hardly made so exceptionable that he would not vote for it. It was possible it might do good, it could certainly do no harm; we could but be in war, overwhelmed with debt, and disgrace. This bill, the object of which is acknowledged to be that of revenue, for the purpose of continuing the war, at the expense if not at the price of the total destruction of the commercial, shipping, and manufacturing interest of the United States, he said could not be made or amended in any manner, so as to obtain his vote.

Mr. P. said, a few years since he heard so much in Congress about encouraging manufactories, that he began to be apprehensive that the interest of the merchant and landholder was to be sacrificed to them, but he was now induced to believe that it was intended more to amuse than to benefit them, and to make the people generally better satisfied under their very severe sufferings, in time of peace, with the restrictive system; but he said he could not but be astonished, when this system had driven many respectable merchants from their usual business, to employ an immense capital in manufacturing establishments, that they were still to be pursued even in this business again, to their ruin; and that for the purpose of revenue, to be obtained for the use of the war, in the year 1814, the non-importation system was partially to be suspended, when, owing to the war, they cannot return again to commercial pursuits, if they had capital and were so disposed, but, must be left to suffer very much in their present business.

Mr. P. said, when he considered that his constituents had a capital of between four and five millions of dollars thus employed, and examined the bill under consideration, and saw that the goods permitted to be imported were about the same price and quality as those manufactured in this country, he thought if the manufacturers in England would have been permitted to have made a selection for the purpose of putting down their rivals in this country, they could not have done it with more art and address. The second section of this bill "excludes cloths, of which cotton is the principal material, and the prime cost of which shall not be less than fifteen pence sterling, and shall not exceed three shillings sterling per square yard thereof." It therefore, by admitting goods between those prices, admits those of the quality and price almost exclusively manufactured in this country, such as plaids, gingham, stripes, checks, shirting, sheeting, &c. which sell from thirty to forty cents per yard, and bed-ticks from fifty to seventy-five cents per yard. This bill is farther calculated to take from those manufactories the encouragement given under former laws, by laying heavy duties on articles that have been heretofore admitted duty free, such as card wires, hides, and many other articles which are much wanted, and are of great importance to those concerned in this business, particularly leather and wire.

Mr. P. said, upon examining the 4th section of this bill, one would suppose we were about to make laws, as the good book says good men should give alms, by not letting the left hand know what the right hand does. Very few people by reading this bill, would suppose that a heavy salt tax was intended by it, but so it is. Why not call things by their right names, and let the people see what they pay their money for? This tax bears hard on the poor, inasmuch as they consume as much salt as the rich. A short statement would show the taxing quality of this law. In the first place the extra tonnage duty imposed by it, would operate to increase the price of articles imported to that amount, as it would be paid by the consumer; and salt must, during the war at least, come in foreign vessels exclusively unless our ships sail under British licenses. So that the double duty, the Mediterranean fund, so called, with the additional duty on goods imported in foreign vessels, will make thirty-three per cent. duty on salt, exclusive of foreign tonnage. The last session, the salt tax appeared to be more unpopular than any proposed, and among all the resolutions for laying taxes, it was the only one that failed, although it was brought up again by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GHOLSON,) who very honorably to himself, upon being informed by his friends that the taxes embraced by the resolutions were considered as comprising one system, and that they ought all to pass together, moved for a reconsideration, and, upon reconsidering the vote, the resolution to tax salt was adopted. Now it seems that this tax has become so popular, that salt is to be taxed singly, and this notwithstanding, by a vote a few days past, the House determined that they would not go into the consideration of the taxes this session, but must have one on purpose to lay them.

Mr. P. said the bill under consideration was well calculated to amuse and gratify both the friends and enemies of the restrictive system. To its friends it holds up the idea that, by a very nice discrimination in the goods permitted to be imported, the British manufacturing interest will not at all be relieved, and that the system will be left to operate upon the enemy with all its severity, while we shall derive immense advantages from such importations. To its enemies is held out the great advantage of making another breach in this system, the discrimination is declared to be of very little importance, as nearly as many goods will be imported as if the act was repealed —[see extract of a letter of June 10th, 1812, when this same subject was pending from the Treasury Department.] It is not believed that the result would be materially affected by a modification, or partial instead of an absolute suspension of the non-importation. Stating as a reason that it would very much depend upon funds then in England. Why then keep up this discrimination, when we have no funds in that country, but for the purpose of amusing the friends with the shadow of their favorite system, while its enemies are to be highly gratified by having offered to them the substance? If, therefore, the enemies on this side of the House should continue the same hostility in time of war as they have done in time of peace, and its friends on the other side are now willing to give up the substance for the shadow, the system thus abandoned must now expire. But, Mr. P. said, he hoped the covering was too thin to deceive either side, and that this very plausible bill at this time would meet its merited fate.

Mr. P. said, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CHEVES) who reported this bill has told us that this was for the express purpose of aiding the revenue in 1814, and has demonstrated that we shall want, for the service of that year, between eight and nine millions of dollars, yet to be provided for. If this bill passes, the direct and internal taxes, he says, must likewise be resorted to, but he thinks it will not do to begin taxation with a land tax of nine millions of dollars, and a shop license, and other taxes of three times the sum reported the last year; and that the system of direct taxation ought to be approached with great caution, beginning with small sums and gradually rising, or the people would not bear it.

Mr. P. asked if it was not as well known when we declared war as it is now, that, if we had war, we must have money, and that, to have money, we must have taxes. A system of taxes was reported early the last session, but as a majority could not be obtained to lay them, war was declared without providing the ways and means to carry it on, under a pretence that there was not time to mature the system, and under a pretended belief that the taxes would better follow than precede the war; time was, however, found to double the duties, and it was understood that the rest of the taxes were to be laid early this session. What has taken place? Almost four months are gone by, little business has been done, and now, at the close of the session, this project again makes its appearance, and want of time is again the excuse for passing this bill, and passing over the general system of taxes. How can gentlemen, who have voted for the war, answer to themselves, their constituents, and to the nation for this neglect; the want of time is but a miserable excuse. They cannot say that they have had from the minority an unreasonable opposition to any of their measures. To suspect that their constituents would not pay taxes to support the war would be doing them injustice, it would even be a libel upon them, after they have justified the war by continuing the men in power that made it.

Mr. P. said, after being in session about twelve months out of sixteen, if any disasters should happen for the want of a timely provision to carry on the war, and to support public credit, on the majority must rest the responsibility. The fault is not with the people; if the majority could have agreed among themselves the whole of the tax bills which have been prepared in the Treasury Department could have passed in a few days. But gentlemen, after incurring enormous expenses, appear to have just found out that the subject of direct taxes ought to be approached with great care and circumspection. Have they so soon forgot that a direct tax of only two millions, when the nation was prosperous, displaced a former Administration, and put the present in power; and are they not a little apprehensive that a tax of nine millions of dollars to begin with will have much the same operation on them? The evil is not to be diminished by postponement, as it is now said the taxes, to answer the wants of the Treasury, must be nearly, or quite three times as much as was contemplated the last year, notwithstanding the revenue derived by British importations the present year.

Mr. P. said that the people in this country, when the present Constitution was adopted, were taught to believe, if they would agree to the Constitution, that we should have neither war, armies, or direct and internal taxes; that the revenue to be derived from commerce would support the Government, and in a few years pay the interest and principal of this debt. But they were told otherwise by the opposers of the Federal Government and Constitution, and as soon as the direct and internal taxes were laid by the Federal Government those people made a great clamor, and said their predictions were verified, and it was soon found that the people in this respect were like spoiled children, and would not endure the taxes, and turned the people out of power that imposed them; and whenever a majority should be found to lay the present contemplated taxes, Mr. P. said it would, in his opinion, be with them as it had been with their predecessors, they would not remain in office to be benefited by the money collected from them.

The gentleman from South Carolina has also said, that this was a good time to borrow money for the use of the present year. Not so; Mr. P. said, if this bill passes, the report of it has already enhanced the value of bills on England, and the passage of it will farther increase the value of them, and depress the value of the stocks of the United States. What are the objects of this law, and what its immediate operation? We are to pay Great Britain this year twenty millions of dollars, to purchase her goods, to relieve her manufactories, to enable her to carry on the war, with a view of collecting from our own people, in the year 1814, about five millions of dollars, in an indirect way, by making them pay it in a higher price, in articles of the first necessity, rather than collect it from them in a direct manner—incomprehensive policy to be sure! If this law does not pass, the money will be retained in the country, and a part of it loaned to our Government to carry on the war. Mr. P. said, it was too humiliating, after we had lost so many millions in time of peace, by this system, that we should in time of war relinquish it, and pay twenty millions of dollars to relieve the British manufacturers, to the destruction of our own, and derive no other earthly advantage from it, but the pitiful consideration of affording Congress the political advantage of taxing the people five millions of dollars, in an indirect way, in the year 1814. This must be a miserable consolation indeed, to the friends of this system, to see it relinquished under so many advantages to the English, and so many disadvantages to ourselves, more especially as it will so completely verify all the predictions of those opposed to this system from its commencement.

The gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. BIBB,) who has been one of the first and firmest friends of this system, seems willing to abandon it, and has assigned for reason, that as the Middle States will not bear a non-exportation, and have been enriching themselves by war prices for their produce, he therefore thinks it very unreasonable, that the more Southern States, South Carolina and Georgia, should any longer suffer, by the operation of this system upon them, and is now willing to give it up for the more honorable mode of warfare, that of valorous fighting. Thus, by the suspension of this system, the Middle and Southern States, owning but little shipping, as to all the purposes of selling their produce, and obtaining, in return, such articles as they wished from abroad, for their own consumption, will be neutral in this war. It is of but little consequence to them whose ships their business is transacted in, in such a state of things. The more Southern and Eastern States, if the declaration of war had not been against Great Britain, by its effects on them, would suppose it was intended to destroy the commercial and manufacturing interests of those States. The same gentleman, in order it is presumed, to make this bill tolerable, with some who have objections to it, has dwelt on the advantage of this discrimination, as it respects the two nations, that we are not to admit woollen cloths, charged at more than six shillings sterling the square yard, and tells us that, to prevent impositions, inspectors will be appointed to break the packages and examine them. This, Mr. P. said, he supposed would be managed with the same kind of vigilance, and much to the same effect, as the law was, prohibiting the importation of British rum. It was well known that nearly as much rum, made at the English West India islands, had been imported since the law as before, all the Treasury tasters to the contrary notwithstanding. He could not say that the breach of the law was connived at by the Treasury Department, for the purpose of revenue; but it was certain that this rum was never made where it was purported to be made, and this is a thing that any person that could distinguish between good old spirits and poor new whiskey could not doubt; but as long as the Treasury wants money, and everything is to bend to the expediency of getting money from the people, in this indirect way, Mr. P. said, he believed the inspectors of dry goods would be as accommodating to the wants of the Government, as the rum tasters had been, and we should, under this law, have fine cloths as well as good rum.

Mr. P. said, if this bill passes, the pride of the nation must be humbled, the interest of the commercial and manufacturing States sacrificed and destroyed, and we shall have taught Great Britain a lesson she never ought to have known, and which she will take advantage of, and practise upon in future. She will have found out that the people in this country will neither bear restrictions or taxes; that when we try non-exportation, the Middle States cry out, and when non-importation, we hear bitter lamentations from the Treasury Department; so that, between the wants of the Treasury and the avarice of the Middle States, the commercial and manufacturing interests are to be ruined, and the interest and ambition of Great Britain gratified. Mr. P. wished the Committee to look back a few years, and see the high and honorable standing of this nation, compared with its present situation. We had a very extensive and lucrative commerce, our canvass whitened every sea, and we enjoyed all the carrying trade from the French colonies to the mother country. But when this last species of commerce was interrupted by the British, our merchants, being not willing to lose so valuable a branch of their business, imprudently made application to Congress to protect them, as far as they could, and seemed to vie with each other who should present them with the best memorial on the subject. Instead of affording any kind of protection to the merchants for that branch of their business, thus interrupted, even by remonstrances, Congress put a stop to their whole business by an embargo. Thus the protection of Government, in time of peace, by restrictions, has been destruction to their interest. Their relief, by suspending the non-importation act in time of war, is death to them; and if you will forgive them for their imprudence in asking your protection in this instance, they will at least be more prudent in future.

Mr. P. said, that after the trade was at an end by the British taking the French colonies, we would have been satisfied with carrying our own produce to France &c.; but this the English would not permit without a license. But, our Government were then so much alive to the appearance of insult and indignity that they would not permit this, and have attempted to prevent our vessels when abroad from taking clearances to go from one foreign port to another, under heavy penalties and disabilities. This was called tribute, and could not be submitted to, and, to our resentment in time of peace, all trade was interdicted with the English, and at length the nation undertook to vindicate their honor and interest by war. Since the time we have declared war, we have continued our export trade to feed British armies, while our own people have been suffering for want of bread; and now, to complete our humiliation, we are to suspend our non-importation system.

Mr. P. said, although he had been always opposed to this system in peace, he would not now agree to suspend it for financial considerations. He was unwilling to say to the British that we had mistaken their wealth and strength for the purposes of war, and to acknowledge to them our inability and weakness. The gentlemen who have made this war might as well say, at once, if the English would forgive us the past, we would do better in future; and we might all say of the war, that it was ill-timed, unfortunate, and ill-fated; that nine months of such war has so far humbled our pride and reduced our resources as to make the friends of this system, in time of war, (the only time that it can operate with any effect,) willing to surrender it for nothing.

Mr. P. said this suspension gives at once to Great Britain almost all the advantages of our commerce that she derived in time of peace, with the additional advantages of employing her own capital, and her own ships, under the flags of her friends, while we cannot move an additional ship, unless by her permission. They must decay in our docks. When in time of peace our merchants have been restrained from trading with them in their own ships, after declaring war, we are now about to humble ourselves to them, and agree, in a very submissive manner, to take their merchandise from them in any manner, and in any vessel that they will please to license for that purpose; and, for this sacrifice, we get an additional duty on tonnage, which only serves to increase the price of goods imported, and is paid by the consumer, and not by the foreigner.

Mr. P. had heard a great deal of the virtue and efficacy of the restrictive system, of its operating upon the British Government through their manufacturers, and now, he was sorry to find, by some strange operation of our Treasury Department, over our own Government, in time of war, the British manufacturers were to be relieved, and our own destroyed. What a melancholy picture of national humiliation and degradation! Who can bear it?

Mr. P. thought that gentlemen ought to have a little regard to consistency in respect to their measures. He said a bill had been rejected the day this was reported, calculated to relieve our citizens who were in the British North American colonies about the time our war was commenced, and who could not bear the idea of remaining and taking the oath of allegiance to the enemy, but fled for refuge to the United States, and brought their effects with them, relying upon the clemency of their own Government, believing them more merciful than an enemy. You have refused them relief. The consequence is, their goods are forfeited, and you are now about to give privileges and advantages to English, Spaniards, and Portuguese, to import goods into this country to great profit, when you confiscate the remnant of the property of your own citizens, who have escaped with their lives.

Mr. P. said he wished the Committee would, for a moment, consider what would be the situation of the different sections of the United States if this law is suspended and the war continued. It increases the value of the produce of the Middle States, and the Southern States will be relieved. The commerce of the more Northern and Eastern States will be annihilated, as they cannot move another ship without a license; their manufactories will be almost destroyed by importations of British goods, and the increased price of breadstuffs, from the same cause. You give to Great Britain more than she ever would have thought of; you completely prostrate our commerce and manufactures to her; you give her a trading war, and a monopoly of the commerce of the world. Mr. P. said if our territory was invaded by a neighboring and powerful enemy, and we were to be divided and conquered, and our Government destroyed, that, for the purpose of supporting the Government, preserving the integrity of the States, and saving the nation in such a conflict, he would be willing to give up the commerce of the country without a murmur. But, said Mr. P., when the war was professedly for the protection of commerce, he could not, nor would not agree to sacrifice it for the purpose of humbling ourselves before Great Britain, in asking them generously to permit us to import a few of their coarse goods, to enable us, eighteen months hence, to devise the means, in an indirect manner from our own citizens, to continue the war, to conquer a cold, barren country that we did not want, and shall never get, and have no business with. Mr. P. declared that he believed if we suspended the non-importation law, we would have a trading war, and Great Britain would have no inducement to make peace; and for such a state of things, for fifteen years, he had no doubt Great Britain would give us her possessions in this country, and make a good bargain. She would then furnish us with what we wanted, and take what we had to sell, in her own ships, and at her own prices. Mr. P. said he was not only against a partial suspension of the non-importation law, but against a total repeal of it, as long as the war lasted. In peace, he was for commerce; in war, for restrictions. As we were one nation, he hoped we might prosper or suffer together.

Mr. P. said he did not wish to defeat the bill under consideration, to compel Congress to lay those taxes; for, we had been informed; and it was very evident, that they must be laid, let the fate of this bill be what it may; or, the war must not only cease, but the credit of the Government was at an end. He had voted against the war, and every species of expense; and he never would vote for a ship, a man, or a cent to carry it on. Those that made the war, might provide the ways and means to carry it on; and those that had incurred those enormous expenses, might devise means to obtain money to pay them. Mr. P. said the majority must govern, and, as they had made the war, they must take their own measures to prosecute it, or to terminate it by peace, as they were responsible to the people for the war and its consequences. Yet, he said, he hoped he should ever be found to do his duty as a good citizen in paying his proportion of the expenses, in such manner as the Government should see fit to require them, until a majority should be found to retrieve this once happy country from all the horrors of war, and restore it again to peace and prosperity.

Mr. ROBERTS replied to Mr. POTTER and others, who spoke in opposition to the bill, and supported the bill at considerable length.

Mr. McKIM moved that the Committee rise, and ask leave to sit again. He believed the subject under discussion to be the most important he was ever called to act on in his present capacity, and desired a little time to deliberate.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. BIBB, CHEVES, and ROBERTS.—Motion lost.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to strike out the first section of the bill, which contains the principle of the bill.

The question was taken on Mr. WRIGHT's motion, and carried. For striking out 63, against it 23.

A motion was then made that the Committee rise and report progress.—Carried.

The bill was reported to the House as amended, and the question of concurring with the committee in striking out the first section, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 24, as follows:

Mr. WRIGHT moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.—Motion lost.

The second, third, and fourth sections of the bill, being connected with, and depending upon, the first section, of course fell with it.

Mr. BIBB moved that the 8th section, which limits the operation of the bill to the first day of January next, be stricken out.

Mr. KEY spoke against the motion, on the ground that, as the bill now stands, goods hereafter brought into the country are ordered not to be surrendered to the parties on their giving bond; he did not wish such a regulation to become a permanent law, but wished it to be limited, as originally contemplated by the bill.

The motion produced some discussion, in which it was argued for striking out the limiting clause, that, under the practice of allowing the importers to dispose of their goods, on giving bond for the value of the same, immense frauds had been practised on the Government by the unfair valuations which had been made.

Before the question on Mr. BIBB's motion was decided, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

MONDAY, February 22.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment and of the Militia in the actual service of the United States, (and of the Militia in their actual service,) for the year 1813; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

Mr. CHEVES, from the same committee, also reported a bill to continue in force, for a limited time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, presented a bill to incorporate a company for making a certain turnpike road in the County of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. TALLMAN moved the following resolution: Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to bring in a bill for the benefit of the officers of the frigate Constitution, granting to them a sum not less than one hundred thousand dollars, as a reward for their gallantry in their late naval victory.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table. The bill to alter the time of holding the district courts of New York and Virginia, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to amend the naturalization laws passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill reported by Mr. CHEVES to-day, to continue in force for one year longer the duty usually called the Mediterranean Fund, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to prohibit any vessel of the United States from trading under any pass or license from a foreign Power.

The bill received several amendments in Committee; but the Committee rose without having gone through the same, and obtained leave to sit again.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes for the year 1813," with amendments. The Senate have also passed a bill "concerning seamen and shipping of the United States;" in which amendments and bill they desire the concurrence of this House.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes for the year 1813" were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate "concerning seamen and shipping of the United States" was read twice and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. GRUNDY offered a resolution to the following effect, which, after the rejection of a motion to lay it on the table, was agreed to by a large majority:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an earlier day for the next meeting of Congress than that fixed by the Constitution.

CAPTURE OF THE JAVA.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a letter, with accompanying documents, from Captain Bainbridge, now commanding the United States' frigate "the Constitution," reporting his capture and destruction of the British frigate "the Java." The circumstances and the issue of this combat afford another example of the professional skill and heroic spirit which prevail in our naval service. The signal display of both by Captain Bainbridge, his officers, and crew, command the highest praise.

This being a second instance in which the condition of the captured ship, by rendering it impossible to get her into port, has barred a contemplated reward of successful valor, I recommend to the consideration of Congress the equity and propriety of a general provision, allowing, in such cases, both past and future, a fair proportion of the value which would accrue to the captors on the safe arrival and sale of the prize.

FEB. 22, 1813.

JAMES MADISON.

U. S. FRIGATE CONSTITUTION,
St. Salvatore, 3d January, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, on the 29th ultimo, at 2 P. M., in south latitude  $13^{\circ} 6'$ , and west longitude  $38^{\circ}$ , about ten leagues distant from the coast of Brazil, I fell in with, and captured, His Britannic Majesty's frigate Java, of 49 guns, and upwards of four hundred men, commanded by Captain Lambert, a very distinguished officer. The action lasted one hour and fifty-five minutes, in which time the enemy was completely dismantled, not having a spar of any kind standing. The loss on board the Constitution was nine killed and twenty-five wounded, as per enclosed list. The enemy had sixty killed and one hundred and one wounded, certainly; (among the latter, Captain Lambert, mortally) but by the enclosed letter, written on board this ship, by one of the officers of the Java, and accidentally found, it is evident that the enemy's wounded must have been much greater than as above stated, and who must have died of their wounds previously to their being removed. The letter states sixty killed and one hundred and seventy wounded.

For further details of the action, I beg leave to refer you to the enclosed extracts from my journal. The Java had, in addition to her own crew, upwards of one hundred supernumerary officers and seamen, to join the British ships of war in the East Indies; also, Lieutenant General Hislop, appointed to the command of Bombay, Major Walker, and Captain Wood, of his staff, and Captain Marshall, master and commander in the British navy, going to the East Indies to take command of a sloop of war there.

Should I attempt to do justice, by representation, to the great and good conduct of all my officers and crew, during the action, I should fail in the attempt; therefore, suffice it to say, that the whole of their conduct was such as to merit my highest encomiums. I beg leave to recommend the officers particularly to the notice of Government, and also the unfortunate seamen who were wounded, and the families of those brave men who fell in the action.

The great distance from our own coast, and the perfect wreck we made of the enemy's frigate, forbade every idea of attempting to take her to the United States. I had, therefore, no alternative but burning her, which I did on the 31st ultimo after receiving all the prisoners and their baggage, which was very tedious work, only having one boat left out of eight, and not one boat left on board the Java.

On blowing up the frigate Java, I proceeded to this place, where I have landed all the prisoners, on their parole, to return to England, and there remain until regularly exchanged, and not to serve in their professional capacities, in any place, or in any manner whatever, against the United States of America, until said exchange is effected. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM BAINBRIDGE.

Hon. PAUL HAMILTON, Secretary Navy.

List of killed and wounded on board the United States frigate Constitution, under the command of Commodore William Bainbridge, in an action with His Britannic Majesty's frigate Java, Henry Lambert, Esq., commander, December 29th, 1812.

Killed.—Seamen: Jonas Ongrain, Joseph Adams, Patrick Conner, Barney Hart, John Cheeves, Mark Snow, John D. Allen, William Cooper, Thomas Hanson, private marine.

Wounded.—William Bainbridge, Esq. commander, severely; John C. Aylwin, lieutenant, severely; Charles F. Waldo, master's mate, severely; Peter Woodbury, quartermaster, severely.—Seamen: John Clements, severely; Joseph P. Cheeves, severely; Nicholas Vixtram, slightly; William Long, dangerously; Stephen Webb, dangerously; Reuben Landers, dangerously; Joseph Ward, severely; William Weaden, slightly; Enos Bateman, dangerously; Jas. D. Hammond, slightly; Peter Venus, severely; Stephen Sheppard, slightly; Abijah Eddy, slightly, Philip Cook, severely; Philip Brimblecom, severely; Samuel Brown, severely; Daniel Hogan, severely; Thomas Williams, 3d, slightly; John Voyle, severely; Anthony Reaver, private marine, slightly; John Etwell, slightly.

AMOS A. EVANS, Surgeon.

R. C. LUDLOW, Purser.

WM. BAINBRIDGE.

The following is a list of His Britannic Majesty's military and naval officers, &c., paroled at St. Salvatore, (Brazils) by Commodore William Bainbridge, 3d January, 1813.

Military Officers: 1 Lieutenant General, 1 Major, 1 Captain.

Naval Officers: 1 Post Captain, 1 Master and Commander, 5 Lieutenants, 3 Lieutenants of Marines, 1 Surgeon, 2 Assistant Surgeons, 1 Purser, 15 Midshipmen, 1 Gunner, 1 Boatswain, 1 Master, 1 Carpenter, 2 Captain's Clerks.—38 Officers.

Three hundred and twenty-three petty officers, seamen, marines, and boys, exclusive of nine Portuguese seamen liberated and given up to the Governor of St. Salvatore, and three passengers, private characters, whom the Commodore did not consider prisoners of war, and permitted them to land, without any restraint.

Referred to the Committee on the Naval Establishment.

DUTY ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. McKIM said that the House had been told that, in consequence of the rejection of the bill for suspending the non-importation act, it would be absolutely necessary, in the course of the remainder of this short session, to devise a system of internal taxation for the support of the Government. Under this view of the subject, he had turned his attention to the best subjects for taxation. At the last session, a system had been introduced into the House, calculated to produce a revenue of something less than six millions of dollars. He had drawn up a resolution, the object of which was to lay a tax on distilled spirits. From the returns of the quantity distilled in the United States, it appeared that a duty of twenty-five cents per gallon could produce a larger revenue than the whole of the thirteen tax bills last session reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. The advantage of a tax of this description over a direct tax, or other taxes, would be obvious; and he was persuaded that there was time enough to introduce and mature a bill for that purpose. To bring this subject before the House, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill to impose a duty on all spirituous liquors distilled in the United States, not to exceed an average of twenty-five cents per gallon, according to the degree of proof thereof.

The House having agreed to consider the resolution—

Mr. WRIGHT made a long speech in support of the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON opposed this motion as founded on untenable ground, partial, ill-timed, and altogether, under the circumstances, as a monstrous proposition. It was so obviously unjust as to render it unworthy of inquiry.

Mr. BIBB remarked, en passant, that the debate to which this motion had given rise was a happy illustration of an assertion the other day, that it would be practicable, during the present session, to discuss, mature, and pass the bills for laying taxes. Mr. B. proposed that the resolution should be amended by referring the subject to a select committee, as the Committee of Ways and Means were known to be opposed to it.

Mr. CHEVES spoke to the same effect.

Mr. McKIM accepted the modification proposed by Mr. BIBB.

Mr. GRUNDY and Mr. FINDLEY spoke warmly against the resolution, as partial in its nature and inexpedient.

Mr. McKIM defended it.

Mr. McKEE spoke warmly and argumentatively against it. He could not, for a moment, conceive that such a proposition would be entertained by any respectable portion of the House. He alluded also to the peculiar situation of that country which this proposed tax would affect—the people of the West, who now had to bear the brunt of the battle, and over whom was gathering a most portentous cloud—alluding to the congregation of hostile Indians on the frontier.

Mr. CHEVES spoke against the resolution, because he was opposed to exclusive taxation on any particular portion of the country. He was willing that such a tax should compose a part of the system of taxation, the burden of which, however, he wished to see equally distributed.

Mr. QUINCY remarked, that the reason assigned by Mr. CHEVES against the motion was the very reason he should vote for it. At the last session a part only of a report of a whole system by the Committee of Ways and Means had been adopted. That part of it was the double duties, a tax affecting one portion of the people exclusively. Now, a proposition was made for a tax to operate on another portion of the people; and he should vote for it, because, in his opinion, the only way in which a general system could be organized, was to agree to the partial propositions thus offered.

Mr. Stow spoke nearly to the same effect as the last speaker.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on this proposition, and decided in the negative; yeas 46, nays 75, as follows:

So the motion was negatived.

ENFORCEMENT OF NON-IMPORTATION.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, viz: the remnant of the bill lately referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion pending on the last adjournment was, to strike out the fifth section, which prohibits the Judges of the United States from giving up property under judicature: on the owner's giving bonds for refunding its value.

After considerable desultory debate, the motion to strike out the section was negatived—yeas 44, nays 73, as follows:

Mr. MILNOR then moved to strike out the section of the bill which provides for laying an additional duty on foreign tonnage.

Mr. MILNOR observed that as the sense of the House had been expressed on the section of the bill, which prohibits the restoration of property labelled under the non-importation law on bond to the claimant, he would add but an observation or two to those already advanced by gentlemen opposed to the measure. He believed its authors were mistaken in the advantage expected to arise to the Government from this severe and oppressive provision. If, in a few instances, sworn appraisers had been guilty of improper conduct, had violated their oaths, in order to reduce the appraisement of property of this description below its actual value, while he would offer no apology for acts that all must condemn, yet gentlemen might rest assured that the same hostility to the restrictive system that led to such improprieties will alike deprive you in the same places of any benefit from the remedy proposed. The feelings of the appraisers, where such things have been done, is the feeling of the public; your forced sales will be frowned on; and the property sold by your officers will be sacrificed at a lower price than the undervalued appraisements of which you complain. It will be odious to bid against the owners. They will be the purchasers of their own goods, at their own prices. But, Mr. M. said, that he did not believe the evil of unfair valuations was by any means general. In the city he represented, and in most of the ports of the United States, he had understood them to have been fairly and honestly made. The few exceptions that had occurred furnished no just ground for a proceeding of universal operation, so oppressive as the one proposed, which unnecessarily deprived the merchant of his property, subjected the Government to a heavy expense for storage and custody fees, as well as a risk of loss, and gave them no advantage which they did not now possess, if their officers did their duty, under the provisions of the existing laws, and the present practice of our courts.

But, Mr. M. said, he principally rose to state his objections to another section of the bill: that imposing an additional tonnage on foreign vessels, the policy and propriety of which he much doubted. The American trade not destroyed by the war, and our commercial restrictions will during their continuance, be very small. A few fast sailing vessels to and from France, and partial return cargoes for our produce exported to Lisbon and Cadiz, under licenses, form the bulk of the trade in which American merchants can be employed in their own shipping. All our other, and by far the greater part of our importations, must be in neutral foreign bottoms. Is it not of importance to the nation, and to the Government, that these importations should be encouraged? To the nation, because the goods are wanted, and to the Government, because revenue is wanted. The revenue from duties will for some time be principally derivable, unless our measures destroy the trade, from importations in vessels which you are about to subject to a burden that must greatly discourage, if it does not prevent, their coming to our ports. If, as some suppose, four-fifths of the duties received during the war will be from goods imported in foreign vessels, surely it is not good policy to drive them from us. We shall lose by this impolitic proceeding much more in the reduction of this source of revenue, than we can possibly gain by an increased foreign tonnage. In fact, the amount received from tonnage duty will not, even if it be extended as proposed, bear any comparison with that obtained from duties on goods imported.

Mr. M. said that the tonnage duty was never considered so much as a means of revenue, as of ascertaining the amount of the tonnage of foreign and American vessels, respectively, arriving in the United States. He said it would be found, though he had not the documents before him to make an accurate comparison, that the receipts from this source had been heretofore comparatively trifling. For the sake of such an increase as this addition will give us, it is a folly to sacrifice a much larger amount of duties on merchandise, which it will be the means of losing. Besides, he was opposed to it as another added to the many disproportionate and oppressive burdens already heaped upon commerce. Neither was it presumable that all the loss would fall on foreigners. Our own merchants, deprived of the opportunity of employing their capital in one way, would be driven to resort to others. It was presumable that at least in the cargoes of vessels coming to the United States, under a neutral character, American merchants will be often interested. No law; no policy forbids it. The expenses of the voyages of such vessels would fall on them, and when the amount of these in a state of war, together with the double duties, is considered, we ought to hesitate before we subject them to further exactions. This measure, though professedly in favor of American commerce, will be an accumulation of the difficulties of our merchants, and add nothing to the coffers of the Treasury.

Mr. M. said that in order to show the extent of the present exactions from foreign vessels coming here with cargoes, he would state a recent case with which he had been furnished from the port of Philadelphia. A vessel of this description brought in a cargo, the sales of which amounted to only nineteen thousand dollars, the duties and tonnage on which amounted to $10,991, leaving no more than a balance of about eight thousand dollars. Now, such is already the discrimination between foreign and American vessels, that on this small importation, it amounted to $1,260; the difference of duties $1,090, and of tonnage $170, constituting that sum.

Another view of the subject had been presented, to which he would allude. Several articles, as salt, molasses, rum, sugar, &c., were brought to this country in foreign vessels only. By this measure you are in effect laying further duties on those articles; lessening the inducements for their importation, and enhancing the price to our citizens; and this without any rational prospect of advantage to the revenue, as in all probability you derive more from the present tonnage than in future, discouraged as the trade will be by this new exaction, the increase will afford. Mr. M. said he would present one further consideration of national policy as bearing upon this subject. As the bill now stands this duty is not intended to exist during the war merely, but to be a permanent part of our revenue system. Will it be submitted to by foreign Powers without retaliation? It was not to be presumed. We are then by this useless and unprofitable proceeding on our part to invite foreign nations to enhance their demands upon our vessels going to their ports. There is surely no sound policy in this. Under an impression that no benefit would arise in any way, and much injury will be the probable consequence of the proposed addition to foreign tonnage, Mr. M. said he would move to strike out the seventh section of the bill.

H. OF R.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. ROBERTS and BIBB, and rejected—ayes 26, noes 59.

Mr. BIBB moved to amend the sixth section, by striking out the words "salt, or with plaster of Paris," and insert the following: "articles on which no duties are imposed by law."—Carried.

Mr. CHEVES moved further to amend the fifth section, by striking out the words "or may be," and insert "now," making the penalties of the law applicable to the prohibitory laws now in force, not to those which may be hereafter enacted.—Carried.

Mr. MILNOR moved the following as a new section to the bill: "SEC. 8. And be it enacted, That this law shall continue in force during the present war between the United States and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and their dependencies, and no longer."—Carried.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow, and the yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. MILNOR were—yeas 67, nays 45, as follows:

Mr. SEYBERT presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the city and liberties of Philadelphia, natives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and naturalized citizens of the United States, praying that the President may be vested with the power of retaliation in certain cases therein mentioned.—Laid on the table.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the agreement of the Committee to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "authorizing the issuing of Treasury Notes for the service of the year 1813," and the amendments were concurred in by the House.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, who was instructed, by resolution, to inquire into the expediency of making provision for compensating the militia or volunteers who may have been accepted by the Executive of the States or Territories of the United States, made a report; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House to wit:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to make any additional provision for compensating the militia who have been called out, or whose services may be accepted by any of the States or Territories.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, reported a bill to compensate Hull, Bainbridge, and others; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. BASSETT, from the same Committee, reported a bill providing pensions for disabilities on board revenue cutters; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the bill allowing a bounty to privateers.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the bill from the Senate "vesting in the President of the United States the power of retaliation in the cases therein specified," with amendments; which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the committee appointed yesterday, reported a bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT, the petition of sundry inhabitants of the city and liberties of Philadelphia, presented this day, were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate vesting in the President of the United States the power of retaliation in cases therein specified.

An engrossed bill to continue in force, for a limited time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the acts heretofore passed upon the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to alter the times of holding the District Court in the respective districts of New York and Virginia, and to authorize the District Judges to appoint Commissioners to take affidavits and bail in certain cases, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a memorial from sundry citizens of New York, remonstrating against any change in the non-importation act.

A bill was received from the Senate, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit certain fines, penalties, and forfeitures, (on goods recently imported from the dependencies of Great Britain.) [This bill is the same in substance as that rejected a few days ago in this House by a very small majority.] The bill was twice read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means

ENFORCEMENT OF NON-IMPORTATION.

The bill for imposing an additional duty on foreign tonnage, and for enforcing the non-importation act, was read a third time.

Mr. GOLD opposed it at considerable length, on the ground of opposition particularly to the last mentioned provision of the bill. This was not, he said, a proper time to enforce the non-importation act.

Mr. ROBERTSON opposed the bill, principally on account of the provision prohibiting the delivery of goods sub judice, which he viewed as an oppressive measure on the mercantile interest, an innovation on established usage, and injurious to the character of our judiciary.

Mr. CALHOUN replied to Mr. GOLD, principally to the allegation that this was not a proper time to enforce the non-importation act. He expressed his astonishment at this sentiment coming from a gentleman who, with his political friends, had the other day voted against a partial suspension of that law. For his part, if the law was to remain in force, Mr. C. thought it the duty of every man to aid in enforcing it.

Mr. BIBB replied to the observation that the provision objected to was an innovation, &c. He took a view of the law on this subject—and showed the necessity of such a provision, in order to settle the practice in the several courts of the United States.

Mr. GOLD remarked, that any defects existing in the laws might be remedied without the passage of such a law as this. In relation to the other feature of the bill, the additional duty on foreign tonnage, he observed, that he did not so much object to it, though it would in its operation be a tax on the necessary article of salt, which is almost exclusively imported in foreign bottoms.

Mr. G. moved to recommit the bill for the purpose of expunging the objectionable section.

Mr. BIBB fully replied to Mr. GOLD.

Mr. McKIM supported the bill—explained the manner in which the present practice operated injuriously to the interests of the United States; and declared his intention to vote for the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN again spoke in favor of the bill, as going rigidly to enforce the non-importation law; because, although in favor of a repeal of it, having been unable to obtain that, he was decidedly in favor of a rigorous enforcement, which was necessary to enable it to produce any pressure on the enemy.

Mr. ROBERTS also spoke in support of the bill. The House having refused their assent to a suspension of the law; the gentlemen on the other side having themselves one and all expressed their attachment to the measure, all ought to join in a stern and rigorous execution of it. He would not, therefore, for a moment suppose that a majority would consent to the proposed recommitment.

Mr. GOLD explained the motives by which he had been actuated in voting against the proposed suspension of the non-importation. The proposed measure was not a peace-offering to commerce, but a temporary suspension for the mere sake of revenue, with an intention thereafter more firmly to rivet it on the nation, exhibiting what he termed the humiliating spectacle to the enemy of our dependence on indirect trade with her, in order to obtain a revenue.

Mr. RHEA expressed his obligation to the gentleman from New York and others on the same side of the House, for their support of the non-importation system, to which he had always been a friend from principle. Having always been a friend to it, he was now decidedly in favor of enforcing it, and therefore opposed to the proposed recommitment.

Mr. CHEVES spoke in favor of recommitment, because opposed to the provision which had been so much the subject of debate. He was opposed to it because it proposed to do away in this respect what he believed a salutary principle of our jurisprudence, that a man shall be injured as little as possible before he be adjudged to be guilty. He made a number of observations, the object of which was to show that the proposed provision, transcending the inexorable character of our revenue laws, was not necessary to the due execution of the laws.

The question on recommitment of the bill was then decided in the negative. For recommitment 49, against it 65, as follows:

YEAS—Stevenson Archer, Ezekiel Bacon, John Baker, Abijah Bigelow, Harmanus Bleecker, Elijah Brigham, Epaphroditus Champion, Langdon Cheves, Martin Chittenden, John Davenport, jr., John Dawson, Samuel Dinsmoor, William Ely, James Emott, Asa Fitch, Thomas R. Troup, Robert Whitehill, and Robert Wright—65.

The bill was then passed by about the same majority.

Ordered. That the title be, "An act forbidding the restoration of goods, wares, and merchandise, seized or labelled under any law forbidding the importation thereof; laying an additional duty on foreign tonnage, and providing for the unloading of articles on which no duty is imposed, under the inspection of an officer of the customs."

THE FRIGATE CONSTITUTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, reported by the Naval Committee this morning, to compensate the officers and crew of the United States' frigate Constitution for the destruction of the British frigates Guerriere and Java. [This bill provides that — dollars shall be paid out of the Treasury to Captain Hull and the officers and crew of the Constitution frigate, and a like sum to Captain Bainbridge and his crew, for their two gallant achievements; and appropriates a sum of — dollars therefor.]

Mr. BASSETT moved to fill the first blank with fifty thousand dollars.

After some conversation between Messrs. BASSETT, ELY, STOW, and MILNOR, on the propriety of making a general instead of a special provision on this head, as recommended by the President, the question on filling the first blank with fifty thousand dollars was carried in the affirmative, ayes 60.

The second blank was then filled with one hundred thousand dollars.

The Committee rose and reported the bill; and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. ALSTON renewed a motion, which he had ineffectually offered in the Committee, to amend the bill by adding a provision for the payment of the sum appropriated in this bill out of such fund as shall have accrued from prizes.

This motion was opposed by Mr. BASSETT, Mr. QUINCY, and Mr. MILNOR, on the ground that the proceeds of prizes were already pledged for the establishment of a pension fund for decrepit and disabled seamen.

The motion was negatived by yeas and nays, as follows:—for the motion 37, against it 70:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jun., David Bard, William Barnett, Robert Brown, William Butler, Francis Carr, Matthew Clay, James Cochran, William Crawford, Richard Cutts, Roger Davis, William Findley, James Fisk, Meshack Franklin, Thomas Gholson, Peterson Goodwyn, Felix Grundy, Bolling Hall, Obed Hall, Aylett Hawes, John M. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

EXTRA SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to alter the time of the next meeting of Congress.

Mr. GRUNDY moved to fix the day for the 4th Monday in May.

Mr. GHOLSON wished an earlier day.

Mr. PICKENS stated the situation of North Carolina, which would preclude her from returning members to this House before the time moved by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ROBERTS opposed the motion for so early a day; he did not believe it necessary to meet at so early a day for the purpose of laying taxes. He moved to fix on the first Monday in October.

Mr. GRUNDY spoke in support of his motion as necessary to the public service; and enforced his opinion by arguments drawn from the necessity of imposing taxes or devising other revenue for the support of Government.

Mr. JOHNSON was opposed to meeting before October next, because an earlier session was unnecessary for raising a revenue for 1814. If the tax bills were passed before the 1st of January, 1814, he said they would be in time to produce the necessary revenue for that year. An earlier meeting would embarrass rather than assist the operations of the Government.

After Mr. JOHNSON sat down, the Committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 24.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill directing evidence to be received on certain claims to land in the Mississippi Territory; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "giving further time to purchasers of public lands to complete their payments," with amendments. The Senate have concurred in the amendments of this House, "giving further time for registering claims to lands in the eastern district of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana," with amendments; in all which amendments they desire the concurrence of this House.

FOREIGN LICENSES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit the use of foreign licenses.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the bill received many amendments. And, on the question of the Committee's reporting the bill—

Mr. WRIGHT spoke against the bill at considerable length, as tending, by cutting off our export trade, to cripple the agriculture of the country.

Mr. NEWTON replied, and defended the bill on principles of general policy, the purity of commerce, and the general good.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE spoke warmly in support of the bill, as going to preclude the enemy from collecting a revenue from our commerce.

Mr. NELSON spoke in reprobation of the license trade, in reply to Mr. WRIGHT, and in support of the bill. He expressed his ardent hope that a law would pass to put an end to so disgraceful a trade.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

THE FRIGATE CONSTITUTION.

The bill making compensation to the officers and crew of the frigate Constitution for the destruction of the British frigates Guerriere and Java, was read a third time and passed, by yeas and nays. For the bill 61, against the bill 39, as follows:

Some conversation took place on the phraseology proper for the title of the bill. Mr. BACON moved to amend the title, so as to read "an act making compensation to the officers and crew of the frigate Constitution for their loss sustained in the destruction of the British frigates Guerriere and Java." Mr. DESHA moved to amend the title, so as to substitute for the words in italic, the words "the capture."—Motion lost, yeas 37. Mr. BACON's motion was negatived by a small majority. The following title was at length agreed to—46 to 39: "An act rewarding the officers and crew of the frigate Constitution."

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress copies of a proclamation of the British Lieutenant Governor of the island of Bermuda, which has appeared under circumstances leaving no doubt of its authenticity. It recites a British Order in Council of the 26th of October last, providing for the supply of the British West Indies and other colonial possessions, by a trade under special licenses; and is accompanied by a circular instruction to the Colonial Governors, which confines licensed importations from ports of the United States, to the ports of the Eastern States, exclusively.

The Government of Great Britain had already introduced into her commerce during war, a system, which, at once violating the rights of other nations, and resting on a mass of forgery and perjury unknown to other times, was making an unfortunate progress in undermining those principles of morality and religion which are the best foundation of national happiness.

The policy now proclaimed to the world, introduces into her modes of warfare a system equally distinguished by the deformity of its features, and the depravity of its character; having for its object to dissolve the ties of allegiance and the sentiments of loyalty in the adversary nation, and to seduce and separate its component parts, the one from the other.

The general tendency of these demoralizing and disorganizing contrivances will be reprobated by the civilized and Christian world; and the insulting attempt on the virtue, the honor, the patriotism, and the fidelity of our brethren of the Eastern States, will not fail to call forth all their indignation and resentment, and to attach more and more all the States to that happy Union and Constitution, against which such insidious and malignant artifices are directed.

The better to guard, nevertheless, against the effect of individual cupidity and treachery, and to turn the corrupt projects of the enemy against himself, I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of an effectual prohibition of any trade whatever, by citizens or inhabitants of the United States, under special licenses, whether relating to persons or ports; and, in aid thereof, a prohibition of all exportations from the United States in foreign bottoms—few of which are actually employed—whilst multiplying counterfeits of their flags and papers are covering and encouraging the navigation of the enemy.

By his Excellency, Brigadier General George Horsford, Lieutenant Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over these Islands, &c.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas I have received a copy of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent's Order in Council, bearing date at the Court at Carlton House, the 26th October, 1812, which order is in the words following, viz: "Whereas, during the late and present war, emergencies have at various times arisen essentially affecting the necessary supply of the British West India islands, and of lands and territories belonging to His Majesty on the continent of South America, and it has been found expedient and necessary for the trade and commerce of said islands, lands, &c. and for the support of the inhabitants thereof, further to extend, for a limited time, the importation into, and exportation from, the said islands, lands, and territories, His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, in the name and on behalf of His Majesty, is pleased, by and with the advice of His Majesty's Privy Council, to authorize and empower the Governor or Lieutenant Governor of any of the islands or territories in the West Indies, (in which description the Bahama islands and the Bermuda or Somer islands are included,) and of any of the lands or territories on the continent of South America, to His Majesty belonging; and they are hereby respectfully authorized and empowered to permit, until the 30th day of June, 1813, the importation into the said islands, lands, and territories, respectively, of staves and lumber, horses, mules, asses, neat cattle, sheep, hogs, and every other species of live stock, and live provisions, and also of every other kind of provisions whatsoever, (beef, butter, pork, salted, dried, and pickled fish, excepted,) in any unarmed ship or vessel not belonging to France, or to the subjects or inhabitants thereof, or of any port or place annexed to the territories of France under the license of the said respective Governors or Lieutenant Governors, which are hereby empowered to grant, in His Majesty's name, subject to such instructions as His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty, shall, from time to time, think fit to issue, to be signified by one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State; and also to permit, under licenses to be granted as aforesaid, the exportation from the said islands, lands, and territories, into which such importation as aforesaid shall be made, and in the ships aforesaid in which such importations shall have been made, of rum and molasses, and of any other goods and commodities whatsoever, except sugar, indigo, cotton, wool, coffee, and cocoa: Provided, That such ships or vessels shall duly enter into, report, and deliver, their respective cargoes, and reload at such ports only where regular custom-houses shall have been established. But, it is His Royal Highness's pleasure, nevertheless, and His Royal Highness, in the name and on behalf of His Majesty, and by and with the advice aforesaid, is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that nothing herein before contained shall be construed to permit the importation of staves, lumber, horses, mules, asses, neat cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, live stock, live provisions, or any kind of provisions whatsoever, as aforesaid, into any of the said islands, lands, or territories, in which there shall not, at the time when such articles shall be brought for importation, be levied the following duties on such articles of the growth or produce of the United States of America, namely:

On wheat flour, per bbl., not weighing more than 196 pounds, net weight	£	s.	d.
On bread or biscuit, of wheat flour, or any other grain, per barrel, not exceeding more than 100 pounds weight	0	3	4
On bread, for every 100 pounds, made from wheat or any other grain whatever, imported in bags or other packages than barrels, weighing as aforesaid	0	3	4
On flour or meal made from rye, peas, beans, Indian corn, or other grain than wheat, per barrel, not weighing more than 196 pounds	0	3	4
On peas, beans, rye, Indian corn, calivances, or other grain, per bushel	0	0	10
On rice, for every 100 pounds, net weight, and so in proportion for a less or larger quantity	0	3	4
On shingles, called Boston chips , not more than 12 inches in length, per thousand	0	3	4
On shingles, being more than one foot in length, per thousand	0	6	8
For every 1,200 (commonly called 1,000) red oak staves	1	0	0
For every 1,200 (commonly called 1,000) white oak staves, and for every 1,000 pieces of heading	0	15	0
For every 1,000 feet of white or yellow pine lumber, of all descriptions	0	10	0
For every 1,000 feet of pitch pine lumber	0	15	0
For all other kinds of wood or timber, not before enumerated	0	15	0
For every 1,000 wood hoops	0	5	0
And in proportion for a less or larger quantity of all and every of the articles enumerated.

Horses, neat cattle, and other live stock, for every £100 of the value thereof, at the port or at the place of importation - - - 10 0 0

And whereas I have deemed it expedient and necessary to make known and publish the same within this His Majesty's Government, I do therefore issue this my proclamation, to the end that all persons whom it doth or may concern, being duly apprized thereof, may govern themselves accordingly.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the Islands, this 14th day of January, 1813, and in the 53d year of His Majesty's reign.

GEORGE HORSFORD.

By his Excellency's command:

ROBERT KENNEDY.
God save the King.

(Circular.)

DOWNING STREET, Nov. 9, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing an Order of Council, which has been judged expedient to issue, in consequence of the existing hostilities between His Majesty and the United States of America. By this order you are authorized to grant licenses for the importation of certain articles enumerated in the order, and for the exportation of certain articles also enumerated in the same order, in the ships in which the importation shall be made.

This intercourse is to be subject to the condition stated in the order, and such instructions as you may from time to time receive from one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State. I am commanded by His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to signify to you that in granting the licenses for the importation of the above-enumerated articles you take care that the articles so to be imported be severally enumerated in the body of the license, that the port or place from whence the importation is to be made, and the port to which the vessel is bound, be also inserted in the body of the license.

That if the person applying for the license, shall not be able to state the name of the vessel on board of which the proposed importation is to be made, the condition of the license should be that the name of the vessel, the name of the master, her tonnage, and her national character, be endorsed on the license, on quitting her port of clearance, and that the condition of her license should also be, that she proceed direct for the port of her destination.

Although the Order in Council authorizes you to permit the importations of the enumerated articles in any vessels not French, you will not grant these licenses to any except to vessels in amity with His Majesty, unless you are convinced that the island will be exposed to serious embarrassments by so confining the importation in question.

Whatever importations are proposed to be made under the order, from the United States of America, should be by your licenses confined to the ports in the Eastern States exclusively, unless you have reason to suppose that the object of the order would not be fulfilled if licenses are not also granted for importations from the other ports in the United States.

With respect to the licenses for exportation on board the vessels in which an importation shall have been previously made, you will observe that the order does not require that the port of destination in such case shall be the same as that from whence the importation had been made, but you will take care that in the body of the license be inserted the name of the vessel, her tonnage, the name of the master, and her national character, the port of clearance and the port of destination; and that the cargo be described in the body of the license, according to the words of the order, viz: rum, molasses, or any other goods and commodities whatever, except sugar, indigo, cotton, wool, coffee, and cocoa.

You will take care that the term of the import license does not exceed the term of the order on which it is granted, and that you do not issue any license for exportation under this order, after that period.

The fee payable for each license is not in any case to exceed the sum of one pound one shilling.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant.

To Lieut. Gov. HARCOURT, &c.

The Message and accompanying document were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXTRA SESSION.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to alter the time of the next meeting of Congress—a motion being under consideration to fix on the fourth Monday in October.

Mr. GRUNDY spoke in reply to some observations of Mr. JOHNSON (on yesterday) in favor of that day. Mr. G. was decidedly in favor of meeting in May; he believed it necessary to the support of public credit that the House should meet in May. Had not the Committee of Ways and Means first taught him that an early session was necessary with that view, if revenue should not, as it would not, be provided at this session, he should not have been found advocating an extra session. The House had been told by their financial committee, that it was indispensably necessary forthwith to provide a revenue; and that a paper system, without a foundation of permanent revenue, would involve the nation in disgrace or irretrievable ruin. Mr. G. quoted various reports of the Committee of Ways and Means to show that they had made such statements. With these facts staring him in the face, how could he do otherwise than urge an early session? If it was indispensably necessary a day or two ago to provide a revenue, what had since occurred obviating that necessity? Nothing. War had been declared, and it was the duty of those who declared it to provide the ways and means for carrying it on. Mr. G. protested against the idea which had been advanced of giving enormous interest for loans, and against accumulating a large debt, almost without the knowledge of the people on whom it would be saddled, and expressed his determination, as far as lay in his power, to go on and provide the ways and means.

Mr. JOHNSON rose to explain. He had said yesterday, that if money could not be had for six per cent., he would, rather than cease the contest on that account, give sixteen per cent., or as far as the whole property of the nation would extend; because he considered it to involve principles on which the existence of the nation depended. If money was wanting, the people would clothe themselves and fight without pay. But money was not wanting. The gentleman had admitted that taxes to be levied in May, if Congress then met, would not be wanted until 1814. Mr. J. contended that they might be laid in the autumnal session in ample time for 1814. Why, then, meet earlier?

Mr. BIBB said, that the Committee had reported that it was necessary to provide a permanent revenue to a certain amount for the service of the year 1814. If the next meeting of Congress were delayed until October, he did not believe the taxes could be levied in due season. In support of this belief, he adduced various considerations, among which was the inexpediency of delaying the imposition of taxes until the farmers of the country had disposed of the annual proceeds of their labor, without making provision for the payment of the necessary taxes. Nothing, he said, had turned up to change the opinion the Committee of Ways and Means had first expressed on this subject; the necessary revenue bills could not be passed at this session; and he was, therefore, in favor of an early session.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Extra Session.

H. OF R.

Mr. ROBERTS said, subsequent reflection had convinced him that the motion which he had yesterday made for October was perfectly proper, though he felt no anxiety on the subject, and should cheerfully acquiesce in any decision in favor of an earlier day. The gentleman who was last up had quoted the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means. It appeared that there was, as very naturally there might be, a difference of opinion among the members of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject. The opinion he had formed, Mr. R. said, was founded on documents before the House. He believed that, for the present year, sufficient security was given to the public creditors, an ample permanent revenue having been provided; and that there would be time, in a session, to commence in October, to provide revenue for 1814. He dwelt on the expense and inconvenience of an extra session, &c., which he could not but think unnecessary.

Mr. CHEVES said, he was tired; tired of endeavors to provide a fixed revenue; but he was compelled once more to rise to explain his view of this subject. He hoped he had never been understood to say, for he never meant to say, that the present revenue would be sufficient for the support of the credit of the Government for the year 1813, unconnected with a provision for future years. The provision actually made was sufficient for the year 1813. But it was his opinion that there ought to be a further provision in the year 1813, and, at as early a period as possible, in order to support the public credit for that year. His opinion was, that we ought to provide a revenue for 1814 and subsequent years, in time to produce the effect of giving confidence to the public credit. Mr. C. said he should, therefore, vote for an early session, because, without it, he did not believe that the public credit would be duly supported.

Mr. PLEASANTS said he wanted words to describe the repugnance he felt at the idea that the public credit, which had been maintained unimpaired from the commencement of the Government to this day, should be injured in the smallest degree, while, from the partiality of his fellow-citizens, he was placed here as one of its guardians. If time were permitted in this session, before its Constitutional termination, he would sit here from morning to 12 o'clock every night, but he would mature a system for securing to the utmost that credit. But time was not permitted. Under these circumstances what ought Congress to do? To assemble here as early as possible after the termination of this session, and mature a system to provide the necessary revenue. He had always been of the opinion, for himself, that it was the duty of Congress to have matured a system of taxes at this session. It had been stated, that at least eight and a half millions of revenue would be necessary in 1814, in addition to the revenue now provided, on the principles on which we had gone into the war. He did not believe this money could be brought into the Treasury by any provision to be made in October. Personal convenience of the members, and considerations of expense, must yield to others of greater magnitude. The expense of the per diem allowance ought not to be taken into consideration, because so many days as the House should sit in the Spring would be cut off from the Winter session, &c.

Mr. BIGELOW said he felt no responsibility himself on the subject of taxation; he had no hand in making a resort to taxation necessary. He did not know that he should vote for a session on either day proposed, but he rose to state a fact to show the utter impossibility of a collection of taxes in 1814, which should be laid next October. An act was passed in 1798, laying a direct tax of two millions. The first year in which any proceeds from it came into the Treasury was 1800, in which year something upwards of seven hundred thousand dollars only was received; in 1801, $500,000 more were received; and in every year since something had been received on account of that tax laid in 1798. The internal taxes had produced a result something similar. He had barely stated this fact to show that it would be impossible in October to lay a tax to produce a revenue.

Mr. WRIGHT opposed an early session. He could not see how it could be necessary in May to lay taxes, which it had not been thought proper to propose at the present session. What had occurred, or what would occur, he asked, to make them necessary in May, if they were not necessary now? Why lay taxes in 1813, if they were not necessary till 1814? He was opposed to an unnecessary convocation of Congress, and it also seemed to him not to be necessary.

The question was then taken on the day for the meeting of Congress, and decided in favor of the fourth Monday in May—49 to 39—and the bill was so passed—yeas 78, nays 33, as follows:

THURSDAY, February 25.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the bill from the Senate "directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit certain fines, penalties, and forfeitures therein mentioned," without amendment. The bill was then committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the bill "vesting in the President of the United States the power of retaliation in certain cases," and the bill was recommitted to the Committee of Foreign Relations.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from a select committee, reported a bill to repeal in part, an act, entitled "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments, and for other purposes," which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

An engrossed bill directing evidence to be received on certain claims to land in the Mississippi Territory, was read the third time, amended by unanimous consent, and passed.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "giving further time to the purchasers of public lands to complete their payments," were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the amendments of this House to the bill "allowing further time for registering the claims to land in the Eastern district of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana," were read, and concurred in by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed several bills, to wit: "An act to encourage the destruction of the armed vessels of war of the enemy;" "An act to authorize and empower the president and managers of the Washington Turnpike Company, of the State of Maryland, when organized, to extend and make their turnpike road to, or from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, through the said District, to the line thereof;" "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to authorize the making a turnpike from Mason's causeway, to the town of Alexandria,'" "An act for the relief of Nathaniel G. Ingraham, Alexander Phoenix, and William Nexsen, jr.;" "An act to establish certain post roads in the State of Louisiana;"

"An act for the relief of the representatives of Samuel Lapsley, deceased;" in all which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill for releasing John McMaster from his confinement, for violating the embargo laws, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was, on motion, indefinitely postponed.

MERCHANTS' BONDS.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit certain fines, forfeitures, and penalties.

Mr. CHEVES offered the following additional section by way of amendment:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That, on application being made to the proper district judge for a remission of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, directed to be remitted by the act, entitled "An act directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, forfeitures, and penalties, in certain cases," and the act, entitled "An act authorizing the admission, under certain circumstances, of vessels owned by citizens of the United States of America, with their cargoes, from British ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope," if it shall appear to his satisfaction that the case is entitled to the benefits of the acts aforesaid, and embraced by the provisions thereof, such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall be remitted, and the prosecution instituted for the recovery thereof shall be discontinued, on the order of said judge to that effect, on payment of costs and duties, in the manner prescribed by the act under which the application shall have been made.

After some discussion on this amendment, the question was taken on it and decided in the negative, yeas 33.

A motion was then made by Mr. RHEA to strike out the first section of the bill, with a view to try its principle.

The motion produced considerable discussion, in which Messrs. WILLIAMS and WRIGHT supported the motion, and Messrs. CHEVES, BIBB, MITCHILL, BLEEKER, and REED opposed it. The motion was finally lost, 55 to 41.

The question then recurred on a motion previously made to strike out of the first section, the words "which were shipped from Great Britain prior to the declaration of war," which motion, affording relief, was intended to destroy the provision to the particular case which produced the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS stated that the case on which the bill was predicated was not an isolated one, as had been stated, but that, if the bill was passed, there were many others which would claim relief under its provisions.

The motion to amend was opposed, by Mr. BACON and Mr. FRISK, and lost, 54 to 53.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. RHEA renewed his motion for striking out the first section of the bill.

This motion again involved a discussion of the principles of the bill, which was continued some time, in which Messrs. McKIM and ROBERTS spoke in favor of striking out the section, and Mr. CHEVES against it.

The question on striking out the first section was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative. For striking out the section 54, against it 61, as follows:

Mr. ROBERTS moved to amend the bill so as to place the goods intended to be released by this bill upon the same footing, as to the duties accruing to Government, as those goods imported since the declaration of war.

This motion produced considerable discussion; in which it was contended, in favor of exacting the double duties, that the goods were very probably now on hand, or had been sold under the same advantages for obtaining high prices as other goods since imported; and that they ought to afford the same revenue to the Government. Against the amendment, it was argued that as the goods were shipped before the declaration of war, and before double duties were imposed by law, it would be unjust to exact the double duties on them.

Mr. ROBERTS's motion was lost, without a division.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day.

The bill was accordingly read a third time, and passed by yeas and nays, as follows: For the bill 57—against it 45:

FRIDAY, February 26.

The SPEAKER presented the petition of the crew of the frigate Constitution, praying compensation for capturing the British frigates Guerriere and Java.—Laid on the table.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill concerning invalid pensioners; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported the agreement of that committee to the amendment of the Senate, to the bill "giving further time to purchasers of public lands to complete their payments," with an amendment; which was concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the Committee on Foreign Relations were discharged from so much of the President's Message, of the 23d instant, as relates to the license trade on board of American vessels.

The bill from the Senate "to establish certain post roads in the State of Louisiana" was read twice and ordered to be read the third time to-day. The bill was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "for the relief of Nathaniel G. Ingraham, Alexander Phoenix, and William Nexsen, junior," was read twice and committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A bill from the Senate "for the relief of the representatives of Samuel Lapsley, deceased," was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of George Nebinger, and others."

The bill from the Senate "supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to authorize the making a turnpike road from Mason's causeway to the town of Alexandria,'" was read twice and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The amendment to the Senate to the bill "in addition to the act regulating the Post Office Establishment" was read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill from the Senate to authorize and empower the President and Managers of the Washington Turnpike Company of the State of Maryland, when organized, to extend and make their turnpike to or from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, through the said District, to the line thereof," was read twice and ordered to be read the third time to-day. The bill was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill to reward the officers and crew of the frigate Constitution, for the capture and destruction of the frigates Guerriere and Java, which adds a donation of $25,000 to Captain Jones and crew for the capture of the British sloop of war Frolic, was read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate "to encourage the destruction of the armed vessels of war of the enemy" was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill prohibiting the exportation of certain articles therein specified, in foreign ships or vessels; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The bill is as follows:

A Bill prohibiting the exportation of certain articles therein specified in foreign ships or vessels.

Be it enacted, &c., That no foreign ship or vessel shall be permitted to clear out or depart from any port or place within the United States, or the territories thereof, having on board any stores, lumber, horses, mules, asses, neat cattle, sheep, hogs, and every species of live stock and live provisions, and also every other kind of provision whatsoever, (sea stores only excepted.)

SEC. 2. That if any foreign vessel shall, during the continuance of this act, take on board any of the articles above enumerated, other than provisions and sea stores necessary for the voyage, such ship or vessel and the cargo on board shall be wholly forfeited and may be seized and condemned in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction, and every person concerned in such unlawful shipment shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding — dollars, nor less than — dollars, for every such offence.

SEC. 3. Prescribes the mode of recovery and distribution of penalties.

SEC. 4. Limits the duration of the bill to the 1st of July next.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the same committee, reported the bill from the Senate, "vesting in the President of the United States the power of retaliation in the cases therein specified," with amendments; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

MEDAL TO COMMODORE PREBLE, &c.

Mr. QUINCY, from a committee appointed on a Message from the President, of the 23d of December last, respecting the execution of the resolution of Congress, for the presentation of a gold medal to Commodore Preble, &c., made a report; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of the Navy relative to the resolution of Congress of the 3d of March, 1805, and to the proceedings under the same, having caused the letters marked A and C to be addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, received from him the letters marked B and D, with the accompanying documents annexed to that letter and to this report.

From these letters and documents it appears that, in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, dated the 16th day of December, 1805, and in explanation of "the causes why the expenditures of that branch of the public service had so far exceeded the estimates and appropriations for the same," the then Secretary of the Navy did transmit "an estimate of expenses defrayed" by the Navy Department, containing an item, declared to be "for expenditures under the resolution of Congress of the 3d of March, 1805; for which objects no appropriations have been made; they have, therefore, been defrayed out of the appropriations for the support of the Navy for the year 1805, twenty thousand dollars."

Upon this statement an act passed on the 22d of January, 1806, making an additional appropriation to supply the deficiencies in the appropriations for the naval service during the year 1805, in which was included the above sum, thus stated to be a deficiency, incurred by an expenditure, which, to that amount, had been defrayed by the Navy Department.

It now appears, by the annexed letter of the Secretary of the Navy, dated the 2d of February, instant, that the item abovementioned, instead of being, as it was stated to be, "for expenditures which had been defrayed" by the Navy Department, was in fact, merely an item stating "a deficit," which resulted from "an estimate that the objects, contemplated by the resolution, would, if carried into effect, cost the sum of twenty thousand dollars."

From the preceding statement, resulting from the annexed letter and document, it therefore appears to your committee that the sum of twenty thousand dollars had not been "defrayed out of the appropriations for the support of the Navy for the year 1805," as was alleged to have been done in the item annexed to the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, of the 16th of December, 1805.

It also, from the same evidence, appears to your committee, that the above sum of twenty thousand dollars has never been expended for objects specified in the item annexed to that letter, and on account of which that sum was included in the appropriation, made by the act of the 22d of January, 1806; the sum of six thousand nine hundred and forty-one dollars and thirty-two cents only having been expended for objects specified in that item, there remained an unexpended balance of that item of appropriation of thirteen thousand and fifty dollars and sixty-eight cents.

In relation to this balance it appears, by the annexed letters of the Secretary of the Navy, that it is not known, with certainty, at the Navy Department, whether that balance has been applied to other objects of navy expenditures, any further than from the circumstance that, at that time, the warrants of the Navy Department "upon the Treasurer were drawn upon the appropriations indiscriminately;" and the whole amount of the appropriations having been expended," it is presumed, or supposed, "to follow, irresistibly, that this balance was merged in the general navy expenditures."

Inasmuch, therefore, as the amount of this item of appropriation was obtained under the suggestion of an actual and "defrayed" expenditure, when, in fact, it was merely an estimated and undefrayed expense, and inasmuch as it appears that it has been expended for objects to which it was, originally, not destined by law, your committee are of opinion that a further examination is required into the real objects to which this unexpended balance, obtained under that suggestion, has been actually applied.

With respect to that part of the resolution of the 3d of March, 1805, which "requests the President to cause a sword to be presented to each of the commissioned officers and midshipmen who distinguished themselves in the attack on the town, batteries, and naval force of Tripoli," in the execution of which the Secretary of the Navy states that "it is presumed that the President saw, what, to his mind, appeared difficulties of great delicacy, from the peculiar language of the resolution," your committee cannot but regret that the terms of the resolution should have been such as to prevent the officers' and midshipmen of that squadron from receiving the decreed and well-deserved marks of their country's gratitude and honor. It is, however, apparent to your committee, that Congress, by passing the resolution of the 3d of March, 1805, did decide that some of the officers and midshipmen, engaged in that service, were entitled to, and should receive, the destined testimony of the nation's sense of their merit. If, as is suggested in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, the nature of the service and the equality of desert make discrimination difficult, your committee are of opinion that, under such circumstances, it is better, and more worthy of the national character, that all should receive the destined reward, than that it should be withheld from all. The universality of distribution (should, in the opinion of the President, "all have acted gloriously") will be a testimony of general merit, and to each individual an evidence of his having been a partaker of the glory of that service. A total neglect of such distribution, after so distinct and public an acknowledgment of the title of some, is, in the opinion of your committee, doing justice to none. Under these impressions, considering that the squadron under the command of Commodore Preble, in the harbor and before the batteries of Tripoli, constitutes one of the most brilliant portions of our naval history; considering that the resolution passed on the 3d of March, 1805, raised just expectations in the officers and midshipmen, engaged in that service, of receiving some distinct token of their country's favor; considering, also, the great importance, at this crisis of our affairs, of not discouraging the spirit of our naval commanders by withholding rewards to which they have already been declared, by a solemn resolution of Congress, to be entitled; your committee have deemed it their duty to recommend a renewal of the appropriation, to the amount of the unexpended balance above stated, to enable the President of the United States to carry into full effect the resolution of the 3d of March, 1805.

In pursuance of these opinions and reasonings your committee propose, for adoption, the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the sum of thirteen thousand and fifty-eight dollars and sixty-eight cents be appropriated, to enable the President of the United States to cause a sword to be presented to each of the officers and midshipmen who distinguished themselves at the attacks of the town, batteries, and naval force of Tripoli, in conformity with the resolution of Congress of the 3d of March, 1805.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to lay before this House, at the ensuing session of Congress, a detailed statement of all the objects of expenditure to which the appropriations under the act of the 11th of December, 1805, and under the act of the 22d of January, 1806, making additional appropriations for the naval service, were applied.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Jan. 27, 1813.

SIR: The committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States relative to the presentation of a gold medal to Commodore Preble, and swords to the officers of his squadron, have directed me to state the following facts as existing in the records of the House of Representatives.

It appears, by a letter of the Committee of Ways and Means, dated the 12th of December, 1805, and by the documents accompanying that letter, published by order of the House of Representatives, on the 16th of January, 1806, that the Secretary of the Treasury had apprized that committee, by letter, of a large deficiency in the appropriations for the naval service, during the then current year, (1805;) and that, in reply to the said letter of the Committee of Ways and Means, inquiring why the expenditures of that branch of the public service so far exceeded the estimates, and appropriations, the Secretary of the Navy did, by his letter, dated the 16th of December, 1805, transmit an account of expenses defrayed by the Navy Department out of the appropriations for the year 1805, and which, not having been contemplated in the estimate on which that appropriation was founded, the expenditure had constituted a total deficiency of six hundred thousand dollars.

Among the items thus stated to have been defrayed, was one of twenty thousand dollars for the expenditures under the resolution of Congress of the 3d of March, 1805.

Upon this statement I am directed to inquire whether that sum had been expended, and whether that deficiency did then exist, as stated in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy? And, if it were expended, to request that an account of the particulars, specifying the dates, amount, and objects, of such expenditure of twenty thousand dollars, may be transmitted to the committee, from your Department.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
 JOSIAH QUINCY.

B.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 2, 1813.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 27th ultimo.

On referring to the communication made by the Secretary of the Navy, on the 18th of December, 1805, to the honorable John Randolph, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I find that there was at that time an estimated deficit in the Navy appropriations of six hundred thousand dollars, and various items are therein stated as constituting this deficit. Among others, the sum of twenty thousand dollars is estimated "for expenditures under the resolution of Congress of the 3d of March, 1805;" that is, it was estimated that the objects contemplated by the resolution would, if carried into effect, cost the sum of twenty thousand dollars. The resolution embraced three distinct objects, namely: a gold medal to Commodore Preble; a sword to each of the commissioned officers and midshipmen who had distinguished themselves in the several attacks against Tripoli; and one month's extra pay to each of the petty officers, seamen, and marines, of the squadron. Of these objects, two only, that is, the medal and the one month's pay, were carried into effect. The cost of these objects appears by the enclosed paper, marked (a), to have been six thousand nine hundred and forty-one dollars and thirty-two cents.

It results from this, that, of the twenty thousand dollars estimated as necessary to carry into effect the objects contemplated by the resolution of the 3d of March, 1805, there remained unexpended a balance of thirteen thousand and fifty-eight dollars and sixty-eight cents, and that one of the objects of the resolution was never carried into effect. This balance, it is presumed, was merged in the general navy expenditures. For these objects there never was a specific appropriation made; and at that time the warrants of the Secretary of the Navy upon the Treasurer, did not, as they have done since the act of the 3d of March, 1809, "specify the particular appropriation or appropriations to which the same should be charged."

I have the honor to be, respectfully, yours, &c.

W. JONES.

Hon. JOSIAH QUINCY, of the House of Representatives.

There appears to have been paid on account of the medal presented to Commodore Preble, nine hundred and eighty dollars and thirty-two cents.

There being no special appropriation for the payments under the resolution of Congress, of the 3d of March, 1805, there was no distinct account raised on the books of this office for the payments. They were charged under the general account for "Pay of the Navy;" of course the amount could only be ascertained by examining various accounts with the Department, which has been done, and it is believed with accuracy, and the amount appears to be five thousand nine hundred and sixty-one dollars.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 25, 1813.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 22d instant, in which you inquire "on what grounds the Navy Department presumes that the balance of $13,058 68 was merged in the general navy expenditures," as stated in the letter addressed to you on the second instant.

The terms "it is presumed," as used in my letter of the second instant, might, with perfect propriety, have been omitted; for, as therein stated, "there never was a specific appropriation made for the objects in question, and, at that time, the warrants of the Secretary of the Navy, upon the Treasurer, did not, as they have done since the act of the 3d of March, 1809, express the particular appropriation or appropriations to which the same should be charged." Of course the warrants of the Secretary of the Navy, upon the Treasurer, were drawn upon the appropriations indiscriminately; and the whole amount of the appropriations having been expended, it follows irresistibly that the balance of $13,058 68 was merged in the general naval expenditures.

If there had been a specific appropriation of twenty thousand dollars, and if the warrants of the Secretary of the Navy had have expressed the object for which they were drawn upon the Treasurer, and the power of transferring had not have existed, or, if it existed, had not have been exercised, it would then have been in the power of the Secretary of the Navy to have answered all the queries which you have been pleased to propound to him upon this subject; and, under such circumstances, the information to you would probably have been, that the unexpended balance had been carried to the surplus fund.

The papers herewith, numbered one and two, afford information as to the "dates of the several actual expenditures of the sum of $980 32, paid on account of the medal to Commodore Preble, and an account of the other payments of the sum of $5,961."

I am, very respectfully, sir, yours, &c.

W. JONES.

FOREIGN LICENSES.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit the use of foreign licenses.

After some conversation on the propriety of the bill's lying for consideration—

Mr. WRIGHT moved to postpone the consideration of the bill indefinitely.

Mr. W. made a very long speech in support of his motion. He was entirely opposed, he said, to a measure, which would cut off our trade with Spain and Portugal, our prolific and friendly markets, merely because Great Britain thought proper not to prevent it.

Mr. POTTER spoke against the bill. The effect of this and of other bills before the House, would be, to produce the evils of an embargo, without making the measure effectual. If gentlemen came forward boldly and proposed an embargo, he declared he would vote for such a measure to continue as long as the war.

Mr. RHEA spoke against the motion.

Mr. NEWTON spoke on the same side. Its passage was more than ever necessary to the establishment of a pure and national commerce.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE also spoke against indefinite postponement. He viewed the license system as a new mode of levying a tax on our commerce, which it was degrading to pay.

Mr. GROSVENOR said he was in favor of the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely, as he understood that such a postponement was tantamount to a rejection of it. The bill, he said, contained provisions, which, under severe penalties, forbid a commerce with neutral nations, by permission or license of the British Government. So far as it went to prohibit a trade to the country, colonies, or dependencies of the enemy, whether with, or without their permission, he had no objection, except what arose from the utter superfluity of the measure. He believed the declaration of war interdicted all such trade. If such a trade came not within the Constitutional definition of treason, if it did not "aid and comfort" the enemy, he was at a loss to understand the meaning of those terms. Yet, Mr. G. said, if it seemed good to the Government to add new restraints, to heap petty pecuniary penalties on a crime which now works a forfeiture of liberty and life, they should have no opposition from him. It was that feature of the bill only which forbids all neutral commerce under British license which, in his mind, rendered the bill utterly reprehensible; and he wished to be understood, as applying all his remarks to this view of the measure.

As well, said Mr. G., as I have understood the arguments of the supporters of this bill, they are not founded on any pretence that our licensed neutral commerce has proved injurious to the commercial or pecuniary interests of the country—such a position might be refuted by a single glance at the state of the commercial world during the past year.

But, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. G., the beneficial effects of these licenses, to our commerce and our pecuniary resources, have not been questioned. Far different are the reasons which have led to the bill; far different the evils which it is intended to remedy. The honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BLACKLEDGE) has told us that this licensed commerce is a foul blot on our national character, a prostration of our honor; a crime of the darkest hue, worthy of the rack and the gibbet—[Mr. BLACKLEDGE explained: he said that he had declared this licensed trade a degradation to the American name, a crime that ought to be punished with the gallows. But, he had also said, that it was injurious to us, because it supplied our enemy with food for her armies, her colonies, her subjects, and her allies—and that the price paid for the licenses furnished her with pecuniary aid to continue the war against us.]

H. OF R.

Foreign Licenses.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

Mr. G.: Mr. Speaker, I perfectly understand the honorable gentleman. But I am speaking solely of that principle in the bill which prohibits commerce with neutral nations—with Russia, Sweden, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, and their dependencies. Does the gentleman mean that we should destroy our commerce with these nations because through them some scraps of our produce may reach the English armies or colonies? Does he mean, that, because Russia, with Roman fortitude, and Herculean strength, has crumbled to atoms the colossal fabric of French despotism, that she has forfeited all title to our esteem and friendship? Does he mean that Spain and Portugal are no longer neutrals, because, in their days of despair, they accepted the aid of a nation then at peace with us? And because Britain has thrown her veteran body between them and their gigantic oppressor, must we, therefore, refuse them our commerce and our amity?

Sir, has that gentleman observed the conduct of the people of Spain and Portugal for the last five years, and has he no sympathy for their sufferings, no esteem for their fortitude, no admiration for their deeds of exalted heroism? When empires were crumbling around them, when even the northern Autocrat paused and trembled, despoiled of their Government, trodden to the very earth by the myrmidons of France, that gallant and indignant people spurned the chains of the arch tyrant, and rose en masse to rescue their rights and their religion.

Sir, even on this floor I have heard, and my blood has curdled while I have heard it—even here I have heard the cause and the noble conduct of that people treated with scorn and contumely.

It is true their rights are not such as are secured by our Constitution. Nor do I believe that their religion is wholly unadulterated. But they are the rights and the religion of an independent nation. They are the choice of a gallant and noble people—and to preserve them from the basest usurpation that ever stained the records of treachery, that people have sustained a long, bloody, and successful contest.

And is it possible that the Government of the only independent Republic on earth can adopt a measure intended to humble such a people beneath the feet of a gigantic usurper? Will not the moral sense of America revolt at conduct so flagitious? Will she suffer her history, at the date of only thirty years from her own glorious struggle for independence, to be blasted by the record of so foul a deed? If she will, let her no longer hope for the smiles of Heaven. Her race of virtue and of glory is ended.

But, say honorable gentlemen, "England will obtain a portion of our produce through this licensed commerce with neutrals." Be it so—what is her benefit from that revenue, even upon a day-book and ledger calculation, compared with our own? If, indeed, such a calculation, upon such a subject, is not utterly disgraceful. When, preceding the war, you adopted an embargo, what was the situation of the interior of your Northern and Eastern States? For six months the door to exportation had been closed upon their surplus produce by the rigor of the climate. The war found their condition as the embargo had left it—so powerful and numerous were the ships of the enemy upon the European seas, that there was no safety in exportation. Thus, on the 19th of June last, those States had in prospect, a Summer of distress, and a harvest of bankruptcies and ruin.

How was this distress, this ruin averted? By the use of those very licenses now so loudly reprobated, and by that alone. An avenue to foreign neutral markets was opened. Under their protection your surplus produce was exported; and the price of wheat alone, rising solely from these licenses, bears ample testimony to the benefits which your farmers, your merchants, and your whole country have received from them. It has been a most lucrative commerce; and the paltry sums which the licenses have cost have no perceptible check upon the benefits of the trade. In return for your produce you have received millions into your Treasury, and tens of millions into your country. They have circulated through, and enriched the body politic. What then, sir, though Britain does receive some advantages from this commerce—your advantages are beyond all computation greater. What, though, from the scraps of your trade, she picks a trifle to support her wars, your gains are incomparably greater and more essential; your surplus, and, therefore, useless produce, is converted into the very sinews of war; into active capital; enabling your people to pay your oppressive taxes, to fill your enormous loans, and to sustain their fortunes and families through this barren Winter of war.

Mr. Speaker, let me solemnly ask, at what late stage of insanity must those statesmen have arrived who would wantonly cast from their country a commerce so advantageous, so indispensable to their condition? But, sir, we are told that our honor is at stake—that this licensed neutral commerce is "a foul blot on our national character."

It appears to me, sir, that gentlemen have mistaken this whole matter. Unless I am much deceived, no point, either of national honor, or national character, is involved in the question. If we were at peace with England; if we retained our neutral character, there would be some foundation for saying that it was dishonorable to carry on a commerce with other neutral nations, under British license. In peace, we should have a perfect right to such commerce, and England would have no right to molest us in its enjoyment. To purchase the enjoyment of that, to which, without money and without price, we had a perfect right, might be dishonorable. It certainly would be so, if we were able to vindicate our right by arms; for then, as an independent nation, honor and policy would both point to such a resort. In a state of peace, therefore, this bill might be defended, and all the declamation about honor, character, dignity, and magnanimity, might be applicable.

Foreign Licenses.

But, how widely different is the case before us. We are in a state of warfare with Great Britain, and, as to her, have no neutral character or rights. In relation to our own Government, commerce with neutral nations, without licenses, is indisputably both legal and honorable. By the acknowledged laws of war, Great Britain has a perfect right to capture all our ships, and seize all our property on the ocean; and, of course, as far as her maritime means extend, to obstruct and destroy our neutral trade. Her numerous cruisers, surrounding the Peninsula, swarming in the Baltic, and covering the Indian sea, enable her, in a great measure, to destroy our whole foreign commerce. Thus situated, from some motive, whether to advance her own interests, or from sympathy with the heroic nations of the Peninsula, I will not stop to inquire, she chooses to relax the rigid rules of war. In certain cases, she abandons her right of capturing our ships and property; she relinquishes a right of war in favor of her enemy; and these licenses are merely notices to her cruisers to what extent, and in what cases, this indisputable right is thus relinquished. They are taken by our merchants as witnesses of the order of the British Government, that, notwithstanding her belligerent rights, certain portions of our commerce shall remain unobstructed.

Suppose, instead of special licenses, an Order in Council had been issued, prohibiting any obstructions of our commerce to the ports of Russia, Spain, and Portugal; this would be a general license, and I put the question to this House, and to the nation, Could a commerce with those ports, under such a general license, be considered in any degree illegal or dishonorable? No one will pretend it. But, I pray you, sir, in point of principle, as bearing on our character and our honor, where is the difference between a commerce under a general and a special license? The modes, it is true, differ; the object, the effect, are the same. What then, sir, is the argument of gentlemen upon this point of national honor? What is their language to the merchants of their country? "When dangers cluster around your commerce, when exposed to certain capture, when insurance rises, to a total destruction of your trade, then launch your ships on the ocean, for then your commerce is fair and honorable! But, if danger disappears, if the enemy refuses to capture your property, if your commerce becomes secure and lucrative, then chain your ships to the docks, for then your trade becomes a "foul blot to the national character."

Mr. Speaker, is it possible that this House can adopt a measure founded on grounds and reasoning like this? Is it possible that such spurious chivalry, such frenzy of patriotism, have usurped on this floor the seats which once were filled by sober wisdom and common sense? But, permit me to ask, who are the gentlemen, who, on this bill, have declaimed so vehemently in the cause of national honor?

Sir, I am sensible that any reasoning founded on the inconsistency of your adversary is neither very fair nor very conclusive. If entirely successful, it merely proves that gentlemen yesterday held opinions which they do not possess today. Certainly, it would never have been resorted to by me, had not the example been set by the supporters of this bill.

It has been boldly asserted that our opposition to the bill introduced the other day, to suspend the non-importation act, is inconsistent with our present conduct. I regret that the honorable gentleman who made the charge had not condescended, instead of a general accusation, to mention some point of inconsistency.

It is not necessary to repeat the reasons so ably detailed by my honorable friend from Rhode Island, (Mr. POTTER,) which compelled us to resist that bill; but this I aver, that they are in no shape inconsistent with our opposition to this measure, which cuts up, root and branch, all exportation in American ships. But, with the good leave of gentlemen, I will point you to another and a darker picture, sir. The "suspension bill," as it was called, was introduced for the express purpose of procuring revenue, and its passage at this session was declared indispensable, by the honorable chairman who reported it, to sustain the credit of the nation. With this view it was supported by its friends. To obtain money for this war without a direct appeal to the people, to put further off the dooms-day of direct taxation, its supporters were willing to open a circuitous, though actual commerce with the enemy; to receive her manufactures, and, of course, to send her the productions of our soil.

When nine months of the war had not expired, when our armies had met nothing but captivity and death, while a whole territory, wrested from us, was yet in British hands; they were ready to inform the enemy, that hostilities must stay, unless supported by her commerce. Mr. Speaker, are the gentlemen who voted for such a measure, the very same who now talk so flippantly about the dignity and honor of the nation? Do those very gentlemen, who, three days ago, were so eager to open an indirect, though actual trade with the enemy herself, now shrink, like the sensitive plant, from all advantages derived from a neutral commerce, merely because the enemy abandons her right to destroy it? Having swallowed the camel, do they strain at a gnat? Sir, "it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle," than to refute this charge of gross and palpable inconsistency. With permission, I would propound a few questions, as well to the Government, as to those sticklers for national honor and dignity. How is it, gentlemen, that in time of peace, our commerce has been openly, and for years protected by French, Dutch, and British licenses, and you have remained undisturbed? How is it, that when our Imperial friend of France, opened his ports to all licensed trade from two Southern cities, in a few Southern productions, and shut them to the remainder of our nation, that your honorable feelings were unmoved, and your patriotism silent as the grave? During this whole war, in the open face of day, under the very nose of Government, this neutral commerce has been constantly prosecuted, under the protection of these licenses; and yet this bill has calmly slept, until this moment.

During these periods of disgrace and humiliation, where have the patriotism, the honor, the high sensibilities of honorable gentlemen been wandering? And how is it, that at this peculiar moment they burst upon us in strains of chivalry, which would rival the Knight of La Mancha in the paroxysms of his disorder?

Sir, to these questions I expect no answer; it would be barbarous to press them further. But, sir, although we shall hear nothing of it from those gentlemen, there is a clue, which will guide us through this labyrinth of mysteries and inconsistencies. The objects of this bill are not what they profess to be. I have no doubt, that, like the act to suspend the non-importation law, it is purely a penurious measure—a Treasury machine, invented by the able Secretary of that Department, to wring a few more millions from the people of the Atlantic States. Sir, to my eye, the hand of the honorable Secretary is apparent in every part of the machinery.

On the 9th of February the Secretary wrote to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means as follows:

"It appears in every point of view highly desirable that the duty on foreign tonnage should be increased. A duty of ten dollars per ton does not seem greater than what is required for the protection of American vessels. But I cannot form any correct estimate of the probable addition resulting to the revenue from such an increase; much would depend on the suppression of the trade carried on by American vessels with enemies' licenses."

In pursuance of this hint, on the 15th of the present month, a bill was reported to tax foreign neutral ships, at the enormous rate of six dollars per ton. This bill, it will be recollected, came before the House on the same day that a resolution to tax whiskey was rejected. The bill was opposed, because its manifest effects would be, to tax those who vended the domestic productions which should be exported, and those who consumed the foreign commodities, which should be imported in these taxed neutral bottoms. These venders and consumers resided, principally, in the Atlantic States; their taxes had recently been rendered heavy by the imposition of double duties, and nothing would be more unjust and wicked, while the South and the West remained untaxed, than to throw the whole pecuniary weight of the war upon the Northern, Middle, and Eastern States. All remonstrances were vain; the bill scarcely squinted to the South or the West; it looked North, Northeast, and, of course, passed with the usual war majority. But, sir, while licenses were permitted, the venders and consumers might escape the tax; their produce might be exported, and foreign commodities imported in our own licensed ships. The Secretary saw this, and resorted to a remedy, which might have startled any officer less hostile to commerce and less greedy of revenue. He knew, that such was the British power on the ocean, if the use of licenses was prohibited, neutral ships, at least for a season, must be substituted for our own; and thus the tax would at once be augmented and secured. Hence, at the close of the paragraph, which I before read, he says, "much, (that is, much of the tax) would depend on the suppression of the trade carried on by American vessels with enemies' licenses." The honorable Secretary never speaks to this House in vain. Unversed as I am in this strange mode of official intercourse, this Court language of nods, hints, and insinuations, I never once dreamed, that these few words contained a positive direction to this House to destroy our licensed neutral commerce. Not so the Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, (Mr. NEWTON;) he was filled with new light and new activity; and this bill, which for three months had slept in his pocket, was, on the twenty-second, thrown on your table. The next day, it was pushed through the Committee, and on this day is to be driven through this House. Do not these facts point with unerring certainty to the author and the objects of this bill? Sir, although it is made to strut on this floor in the guise, port, and armor of a national champion, it is nothing more or less than a poor collector of revenue for the year 1814.

To rebut this irresistible conclusion, gentlemen have pressed into their service the last Message of the President. In that Message, the President recommends a total prohibition of exportation in neutral ships. In pursuance of that suggestion, the Committee have this morning reported a bill for that purpose. That bill prohibits the carrying by neutrals of every principal article of exportation in the Middle, Northern, and Eastern States, while not one Southern staple is glanced at by its provisions. Notwithstanding this characteristic feature of this bill—notwithstanding this unerring criterion proves it a straggling relative of the old embargo family, yet, I do not believe, that there is any serious intention to adopt it.

It is inconsistent with the financial operations of the country. The tax and license project is his work. The non-exportation project is the forlorn offspring of the President—by him only is it recommended. If there is any faith in public documents, these facts are undeniable. Can any gentleman, who understands the condition of the Cabinet, the relative powers of its component parts, doubt for a moment whose project will triumph? Do they suppose, that in this jostle for influence, wit will not prevail over honesty, intrigue over office? Sir, the President is no match for the Secretary—but if there be no clashing of influence; if the Cabinet are united, then we have a right to conclude, that down to the 22d of February, when the license bill was reported, the project of the Secretary was approved and adopted by the Government. If this be so, then I ask if it be possible that in three days, that project has been abandoned, and the very reverse of it adopted? Not one event has transpired to produce such a radical change. Like the vane on yonder spire, does the Administration change with every change of wind? Nay, more mutable than the weathercock, do they traverse the whole compass though the sky is serene and not a breeze is moving? Sir, at this alarming crisis, when stability alone can insure respect and confidence, the Government dare not incur the contempt of the enemy, and the ridicule of their own people. I do not therefore believe, whatever may be the motives of certain speaking automata on this floor, that the bill to prohibit exportation in neutral ships, will ever become a law. The great magician does not pull his wires and dance his puppets with so weak and so clumsy a hand.

Mr. Speaker, if in all this I am mistaken, if this measure has no financial views, but is intended only as an attack on the commerce of your merchants, under some mistaken notions of honor and national dignity, I have then only to lament the infatuation of its authors. The measure will prove wholly inefficient. It may harass your merchants, and embarrass your farmers—it may create a new swarm of informers, and transfer, by fines and forfeitures, the hard earned fortunes of your merchants into the pockets of the supple tools of Government. But, as to its general effect, it will entirely fail. This Government cannot change the nature of man—they cannot counteract the laws of nature. While the habits, the propensities and all the feelings of the American people, press forward to the accumulation of property, it is obvious that you obstruct their progress. The surplus produce of this country will never perish in the hands of your farmers—it will find an avenue through which it will reach those who can purchase and pay for it—and all your penal laws, counteracting this irresistible operation of human nature, will only serve to injure your citizens, and of consequence your country.

For six years, experience has been constantly teaching you this salutary lesson—you know its truth and have acknowledged its correctness. And yet such is your infatuation, such is your zeal to imitate the despotic examples which have shrouded in misery the continent of Europe, that you do not hesitate to repeat and reiterate measures, which have produced nothing to your country but discontent, distress, and poverty; they will never produce anything better; let them be abandoned; and let your people, in these times of national calamity, not be compelled to believe that the Government of their choice is more inimical to their interest than the Government of their avowed enemy.

Mr. ROBERTS replied to Mr. GROSVENOR; as also did Mr. CALHOUN, at considerable length, and Mr. BLACKLEDGE.

Mr. WRIGHT again spoke against the bill.

Mr. PLEASANTS doubted the possibility of reaching the evil intended to be guarded against by any statutory provision; but it was yet such a subject as to justify inquiry; and he should therefore vote against indefinite postponement.

Mr. MILNOR said a few words against the bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke against the bill. The effect of it, he said, would be, by our own act, to cut off all that part of our trade which the enemy did not destroy. He viewed it as a resuscitation of that old spirit of embargo, which he thought we had forever laid when we commenced actual hostilities.

Mr. CALHOUN was about to rise to reply, but declined speaking from the lateness of the hour.

The question was then taken on indefinite postponement and lost—for the postponement 41, against it 75, as follows:

Revenue Laws—Foreign Licenses.

FEBRUARY, 1813.

The question then recurred on concurring in the first amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole: When the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 27.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported the bill from the Senate "concerning the shipping and commerce of the United States," without amendment, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWSON, from the select committee on the subject, made a report in relation to making alterations in the Representative Chamber, for the purpose of ventilating the same, &c., and also introduced a bill making an appropriation for that purpose, which was twice read and committed.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill prohibiting the use of foreign licenses on board vessels of the United States.

The first amendment made in Committee of the Whole having been taken up and concurred in—

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the further consideration of the bill was ordered to lie on the table, for the purpose of taking up certain appropriation bills, the passage of which was indispensably necessary.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the Naval Establishment for 1813, was passed through a Committee of the Whole, and the bill making like appropriations for the Military Establishment, passed through a Committee, and both were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "the better to provide for the supplies of the Army of the United States, and for accountability of persons intrusted with the same." The Senate have also passed the bill "for the regulation of seamen in the public ships and in the merchant service of the United States," with amendments; in which bill and amendments they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill from the Senate was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A motion was made by Mr. JOHNSON, that, when the House adjourns, it will adjourn to meet again to-morrow, and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 30, nays 45.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Senate to the bill "rewarding the officers and crew of the frigate Constitution." The Committee reported their agreement to the same, and the amendments were then concurred in by the House.

The report of the Committee of Foreign Relations proposing amendments to the bill vesting in the President of the United States the power of retaliation in certain cases passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was agreed to by the House.

On the question of ordering the bill to a third reading, considerable debate took place. Messrs.

QUINCY, SEYBERT, CALHOUN, WRIGHT, GRUNDY, RHEA, and GOLDSBOROUGH, took part in it.

The objections to the bill were not to the principle of retaliation, but arose from the opinion that such a power already existed, from usage and from the nature of things, and was inseparable from sovereignty.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and with the bill to be read a third time.

REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. QUINCY, from the select committee appointed on the subject, in pursuance of a motion made by himself, made the following report:

"The committee appointed to inquire into the principle and practice adopted by the Treasury Department, in relation to the revenue laws, and to the mitigating or remitting the fines, penalties, and forfeitures, accruing under the same, having, in pursuance of that appointment, had an interview with the Secretary of the Treasury, and examined such papers as they deemed necessary for the due execution of their trust, addressed to him a letter marked A, and received from him in reply the letter marked B, with the accompanying document—all of which are annexed to this report.

"It appears to your Committee, as far as they are enabled to judge, that the remitting and mitigating powers, exercised by the Treasury Department, have been used in a manner liberal and just. Your Committee have not deemed it their duty, from the terms of their authority, to enter into the consideration of the expediency of relieving the Treasury Department from the burden of exercising this discretion. In some commercial communities a similar discretion is vested in a board of commissioners, whose numerous members form a check upon each other, and the publicity of whose proceedings preserve their decisions under the scrutiny of the public eye, and the wholesome control of public opinion.

"Your committee report to the House the annexed papers as the result of their inquiry."

The report was read and ordered to lie on the table.

FOREIGN LICENSES.

The House again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit the use of licenses or passes issued under the authority of any foreign Government.

Mr. ROANE moved that the House do reconsider their vote of concurrence in the first amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House; which was determined in the affirmative.

The question was then again taken to concur with the Committee of the Whole House in the said first amendment, and was determined in the negative.

The residue of the said amendments were severally concurred in by the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. NELSON, that the bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole; which was determined in the negative.

The bill was then further amended, and a motion was made by Mr. QUINCY, that it do lie on the table; which was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken that the bill be Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time on Monday.

POWER OF RETALIATION.

The bill giving to the President of the United States the power of retaliation in certain cases therein mentioned, was read a third time.

A motion was made by Mr. QUINCY to adjourn—lost, 56, to 16.

The bill was then passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., William Anderson, Stevenson Archer, David Bard, William Barnett, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, William Butler, John C. #### EXPORTATION IN FOREIGN BOTTOMS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill prohibiting the exportation of certain articles therein mentioned in foreign vessels.

Mr. CALHOUN spoke at some length in explanation of the object of the bill.

Mr. QUINCY made some observations in reply, and moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following amendment, as the contingency on which the bill should have effect: "whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President of the United States, and he shall declare by proclamation, that any Governor or Lt. Governor of any British West India Island shall have exercised the authority and issued any license under the authority given by the Prince Regent's Order in Council, dated 26th October, 1812."

After some debate, this motion was negatived, by a large majority.

Mr. QUINCY moved to add to the articles proposed to be prohibited from being exported, the following: "and also wheat, flour, rice, tobacco, cotton, indigo, tar, pitch, rosin and turpentine."

This motion having been seconded by Mr. WILLIAMS—

After some observations from Mr. CUTTS, in its favor, it was carried, by a vote of 46 to 25.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH then moved an amendment going to restrict the prohibition of exportations to the British West India Islands and South American possessions.

But before this motion was decided on, the Committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

And the House adjourned at 6 o'clock.

MONDAY, March 1.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported the bill from the Senate "supplementary to an act entitled "An act authorizing the making a turnpike road from Mason's causeway to the town of Alexandria," with amendments; which were read: and, on motion of Mr. BLACKLEDGE, the bill and report were postponed indefinitely.

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the consideration of several petitions.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate, "the better to provide for the supplies of the Army of the United States, and for the accountability of persons intrusted with the same," without amendment. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FISK moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for purchasing furniture and other articles necessary for the accommodation of the President's household, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment and of the Militia in the actual service of the United States, for the year 1813, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1813, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate "the better to provide for the supplies of the Army of the United States, and for the accountability of persons intrusted with the same," was read the third time, and passed.

The annual bill concerning invalid pensioners, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The amendments of the Senate to the "bill regulating the employment of foreign seamen in the armed vessels and merchant service of the United States," were again taken up and agreed to.

The bill making an appropriation of $5,000 for certain alterations in the hall of the House of Representatives, was passed through a Committee of the Whole and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House took up for consideration the amendments of the Senate to the bill regulating the employment of foreign seamen in the service of the United States.

A motion was made to refer them to the Committee of Foreign Relations.—It was opposed by Mr. GRUNDY, and lost.

On the suggestion of Mr. REED, the bill was ordered to lie for an hour or two for consideration.

The House agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the general appropriation bill.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1813," with amendments. The Senate have also passed the bill "authorizing the discharge of Daniel Updike from his imprisonment," with an amendment; in which amendments they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have concurred in the amendment of this House to their amendment to the bill "giving further time to purchasers of public lands to complete their payments," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of this House; and the Senate have also passed a "joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to prescribe a system of military discipline."

The resolution was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1813," were read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

REMISSION OF FORFEITURE.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Vincent, of Charleston, South Carolina, made the following report :

That the facts concerning this petition are contained in certain documents which accompany the petition, in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the committee on the subject of the said petition, and in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the collector of the port of St. Mary's, in Georgia; all of which are herewith reported.

That it appears the petitioner applied to the Secretary of the Treasury, under his ordinary powers, for relief from penalties and forfeitures incurred by the importation of British manufactures from the Spanish dependencies, and that, under the said application, the Secretary has finally and definitively decided, from which decision the petitioner prays to be relieved.

The committee, therefore, without inquiring into the merits of that decision, are of opinion that it would be improper and impolitic to revise, by an act of legislation, a decision thus finally and definitively made. The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolve :

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition be not granted.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 1, 1813.

SIR : I have the honor to return Thomas Vincent's petition, and the accompanying documents.

The circumstances under which possession was taken of Amelia island are known to the committee. As soon as the fact was known at the Treasury, a letter, a copy of which is enclosed, was written to the collector of St. Mary's, enjoining on him to continue to consider Amelia island as a foreign port. All the acts of the late Governor Matthews, respecting the taking possession, what is called the capitulation, the asking bonds for Spanish duties, and the advice to masters of vessels and others, to proceed with prohibited merchandise to the United States, were altogether unauthorized and illegal.

The most valuable cargo then in Amelia island harbor, was that of Mr. Stephen Girard's vessel, which, together with two or three more, proceeded to the Delaware, where they have been seized and libelled. The parties have not applied for a remission, but contend that they have incurred no forfeiture; and the suits are still pending. The cargoes have, notwithstanding the opposition of Government, been restored to the parties, on giving bond for the appraised value, which is understood to have been the prime cost. It has been stated, but whether correctly I cannot vouch, that Mr. Girard's bond for the ship and cargo is $296,000; and that the cargo was sold for more than $600,000.

The following eight cases are the only ones, (those just now mentioned excepted,) in which prohibited goods, to my knowledge, have been imported from Amelia island since possession was taken by Governor Matthews. In all of them application was made for a remission of the forfeiture; and this was, in all the cases, granted, on the same conditions as in the case of Thomas Vincent, which is in the possession of the committee :

July 8, 1812.—Ship Nautilus, Thomas Vincent, petitioner; goods imported into South Carolina.

MARCH, 1813.

Foreign Licenses.

H. OF R.

July 8, 1812.—Ship Eclipse, Micah Stone, for P. Chase, petitioner; goods imported into Georgia.

July 9, 1812.—Ship Charlotte, John Haslet and J. M. Clark, petitioners; goods imported into South Carolina.

July 13, 1812.—Ship Julia, Sylvanus Howett, petitioner; goods imported into Norfolk.

August 6, 1812.—Brig Union, Thomas Cross, petitioner; goods imported into Portland.

October 23, 1812.—R. Richardson and J. Bolton, petitioners; goods imported into St. Mary's.

December 14, 1812.—Strobel and Aspinall, petitioners; goods imported into St. Mary's.

December 14, 1812.—James Blair and J. Napier, petitioners; goods imported into St. Mary's.

In the last three cases the merchandise was brought in boats across the St. Mary's river.

As, in the case of the petitioner, the merchandise sold for less than the prime cost and double duties, it is only that part of the decision which imposed those duties of which he complains. On that subject I will only observe, that the merchandise in that and all the other cases could not be legally admitted to entry until after the remission of the forfeitures, all of which were remitted subsequent to the first day of July, and after the passing of the act of Congress imposing the double duties. That condition appeared equally consistent with equity, and with the law then in force. With respect to the bonds given at Amelia island to an unauthorized person, it is evident that they are a perfect nullity, and cannot be recovered from the petitioners.

It may not be improper to add, that the same rule of decision has been adopted, and the forfeitures remitted precisely on the same terms as in the case of the "Nautilus," in the following cases, viz:

1. Brig South Carolina, arrived at Charleston, from Calcutta, remitted on the 13th of July, 1812; the circumstances of which case were stated in my letter of the 10th of December last, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

2. Two cases of merchandise, imported from Canada, subsequent to the declaration of war, under the apprehension of danger from the enemy, viz: furs, by J. Jacob Astor, remitted October 13, 1812, and merchandise by David Vantine, remitted November 17, 1812. Should the bill, intended for the relief of importers from the British provinces, since the declaration of war, be rejected by Congress, the same rule of decision which has been adopted in those two cases would be applied to all the others.

3. Nine vessels, which, being either on the coast, waiting for orders, or at sea, bound to foreign ports, and being informed of the war, came into the ports of the United States to avoid capture by the enemy, viz:

July 13, 1812.—Schooner Mary, from Liverpool, arrived at Boston; Stephen Higginson, jr., petitioner.

July 13, 1812.—Ship South Carolina, from Algiers, arrived at Philadelphia; Samuel Singleton, petitioner.

July 14, 1812.—Ship Charleston and Liverpool Packet, from Liverpool, arrived at Norfolk; Edward Howe, jr., petitioner.

August 14, 1812.—Brig Thomas, from Liverpool, arrived at Norfolk; John S. Trott, M. Blake, and others, petitioners.

August 26, 1812.—Brig Taber, from Montego Bay, arrived at New York; John Patrick and John Baker, petitioners.

August 26, 1812.—Ship Jason, from Liverpool, arrived at Portsmouth, New Hampshire; J. and William Flagg, petitioners.

August 27, 1812.—Brig Emeline, from Jamaica, arrived at New York; John Patrick and Jacob Fash, petitioners.

August 31, 1812.—Brig Nymph, from Martinique, arrived at Boston; D. Patch and Ph. Currier, petitioners.

October 12, 1812.—Brig William and Martha, from Liverpool, arrived at Boston; John M'Lean and D. Ellis, petitioners.

I have the honor to be, with respect, &c., sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Honorable LANGDON CHEVES,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 7, 1812.

SIR: I learn, by a letter from Mr. George Mathews, that a portion of East Florida has been ceded to the United States. Unacquainted as I am with the circumstances of that event, and not being yet informed of the manner in which it will be viewed by the Government of the United States, I can only direct you to continue to consider, for the present, and until otherwise instructed, every part of East Florida, by whomsoever possessed, as a foreign port or place.

I am, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, after observing on the propriety of the House having all the information on foreign affairs which was accessible; and remarking, also, that they were much in the dark in respect to our relations with France, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House the French decree, purporting to be a repeal of the Berlin decrees, referred to in his Message of the 4th of November last; together with such information as he may possess concerning the time and manner of promulgating the same; and, also, any correspondence or information touching the relations of the United States with France, in the office of the Department of State, not heretofore communicated, which, in the opinion of the President, it is not incompatible with the public interest to communicate.

And on the question to agree to the same, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., William Anderson, Stevenson Archer, John Baker, David Bard, William Barnett, Burwell Bassett, William W. NAYS—Bolling Hall, John M. Hyneman, Lemuel Sawyer, and Charles Turner, jun.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH and Mr. KENNEDY were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President.

On motion, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 2.

An engrossed bill concerning invalid pensioners was read the third time, and passed.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill for the relief of Susannah Wiley, was read and concurred in by the House.

A Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, containing a statement of proceedings under the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio. Laid on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed "a resolution requesting the President of the United States to present medals to Captain William Bainbridge and the officers of the frigate Constitution." They have also passed the bill "for the relief of Susannah Wiley," with an amendment; in which resolution and amendment they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory, remonstrating against any change in the form of government of the said Territory.—Laid on the table.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the resolutions of the Legislature of the Illinois Territory, presented on the 25th of January, 1813; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the select committee, to whom was recommitted, on the 27th ultimo, the report of a committee appointed to inquire into alterations necessary to be made in the Representative Chamber, were discharged from the said report.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the joint resolution from the Senate, authorizing the President of the United States to provide a system of military discipline, with amendments; which were read and concurred in by the House, and the amendments ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

On motion of Mr. TURNER,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, to the persons employed by the Doorkeeper, by virtue of the authority of this House, the sum of fifty dollars each, for extra services, and to John Oswald Dunn, for his services, the sum of one hundred dollars.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill "authorizing the discharge of Daniel Updike from his imprisonment," was read and concurred in by the House.

The amendment of the Senate to the amendment of this House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill "giving further time to purchasers of public lands to complete their payments," were read, and the first concurred in and the second disagreed to by the House.

An engrossed bill making an appropriation for alterations to be made in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, was read the third time and passed.

Ordered, That the title be, "An act making an appropriation for alterations and repairs to be made in the Capitol;" and that the Clerk do carry the bill to the Senate, and desire their concurrence therein.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the better regulation of the general staff of the Army of the United States;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, "for the better organization of the General Staff of the Army of the United States," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

EXPORTATIONS IN FOREIGN BOTTOMS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill prohibiting the exportation of certain articles therein specified, in foreign vessels.

Mr. POTTER moved to amend the bill, by inserting, after the articles specified, the words, "and every other article, the growth produce, or manufacture of the United States."

Mr. CALHOUN opposed the amendment, as going beyond the system which had been proposed by the Committee of Foreign Relations, in their report.

The motion was agreed to, however, by the following vote: For the motion 40, against it 35.

The bill having been gone through, the question was stated on the Committee's rising and reporting the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT opposed the bill, as going to produce a most injurious effect on our own agriculture, ineffectual as to the enemy, and incompatible with a state of active war.

Mr. McKIM said a few words in reply. The prohibition of exportation in foreign bottoms was by no means, as the gentleman appeared to view it, a prohibition of all exportation, which would still take place in American bottoms.

Mr. LOWNDES opposed the bill, as well on account of its operation on our own commerce and agriculture, as on account of its effect on neutral commerce, which we, having gone to war for our neutral rights, ought to be the last to slight or disregard.

Mr. RHEA spoke in favor of the bill, and declared he could see no objection to its passage on the ground of its operation on neutrals.

Mr. CLAY spoke at considerable length in favor of this bill, as forming a complete system, connected with one which passed the House the other day, prohibiting the use of foreign licenses on board vessels of the United States, suited to the present relations of the United States, and to the proper action on the enemy.

Mr. ROBERTSON spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, I do not often trespass on the patience of the House, but I request their attention whilst I state a few of the reasons which compel me to oppose the bill now under consideration.

I am the more disposed to do this, because my opposition arises from considerations in a great measure peculiar to myself, and because I differ with gentlemen in the correctness of whose opinions I usually concur. Without, then, considering the principles it involves, I reject this bill, because, it is not in fact what it professes to be; it is not a restrictive measure; its provisions may operate prejudicially on ourselves, but cannot affect the enemy. In one of two general systems, I might go along with gentlemen. Let us have non-importation, non-intercourse, and embargo—thus the restrictive system may have its full bearing; let us refuse to purchase manufactures of the British; let us refuse to furnish them with provisions, then we may be consoled for the privations which we ourselves must experience, by reflecting on the great evils which we inflict on the enemy.

I can but smile at the patriotism of honorable gentlemen, who affect to starve the English by refusing to buy their manufactures, whilst they inundate the army, the navy, the colonies of that nation, with a profusion of all the necessaries and luxuries of life—they will starve a few miserable manufacturers, whilst they industriously feed their armed men. With the most glaring and barefaced inconsistency, they object to admitting into our markets any the minutest article of British manufacture, that the inhabitants may perish for the want of means to purchase bread; whilst bread is exported with a hope that it should, indeed a perfect certainty that it will be consumed by this same people. I cannot concur in these half-way measures. I voted for a repeal of the non-importation act. I hoped that commerce, sufficiently hazardous and fettered by the present state of the world, would cease to be shackled by ourselves. I hoped, that now the sword was drawn, we should carry on war in the usual and accustomed manner—that the Government would be aided by the receipt of revenue arising from duties and imposts—that the people would be thus partially relieved from taxes—that the nation would be strengthened and inspirited by an accession of wealth, now, more than ever necessary.

But whatever, sir, might be my opinion of this bill, viewed as a restrictive measure; for other considerations it meets with my decided disapprobation. We prohibit neutrals from clearing out from our ports, with the productions of our country, whilst our own vessels are left free to do so. We deny to them that commerce, which as a neutral we formerly enjoyed. Heretofore we complained of the injustice of belligerents, and, now that we are engaged in war, and that too for neutral rights and free trade, we are about to practise similar abuses. Aware that some apology would be deemed necessary, we call it a municipal regulation; it may be so—and perhaps we are borne out by strict law; but we attempt a justification on the ground of cutting off our enemy from supplies, of which he stands in need, and which, notwithstanding his perilous situation, he dares to hope to receive through a train of insolent artifices, derogatory to the integrity of the Union, and disgraceful to those with whom they shall prevail.

Now, sir, if the measure proposed could in any way counteract his views—if it went the full length of preventing him from procuring the various articles which his necessities require, I confess it would be inflicting a punishment, which not only the laws of war would authorize, but which the unprecedented baseness of his late attempt most loudly calls for; but no such effect will be produced. For what is there to prevent our vessels from transporting the products of the United States to Amelia, Pensacola, St. Bartholemews, there to be deposited, and thence carried in neutral or British bottoms to Jamaica, the Bahamas, or wheresoever else they may be wanted? And again, if, notwithstanding the hostile attitude in which we stand in relation to each other, England is compelled to encourage a trade by license, will not her necessities equally induce her to connive at exportation? Can it be doubted, that her armed vessels would not be instructed to allow our provisions to pass unmolested, when, by pursuing a contrary conduct, she would be starving her own colonies? And is it not clear that a traffic, which the war prevents from being direct, would continue to be carried on, as it is at present, through intermediate ports?

Mr. Chairman, the present scheme seems to me to be merely calculated to produce vexation and embarrassment at home; to operate with peculiar hardship on neutral rights, without inflicting on the enemy any injury commensurate with these evils. Sir, if gentlemen wish to reap the full effect of a restrictive system, that system must be rigid and complete. Let our ports be sealed, let there be neither egress nor ingress, let us neither buy nor sell, and let us prepare to bear the positive burdens of active war. No section of our widely extended Union could then complain of peculiar oppression. The plan would present itself to us, recommended, at least, by the generality of its operation; by the impartiality of its character. But, if this cannot be done, if the shipping interests of some of the States, and the manufacturing establishments of others, must be encouraged, and if others still must sell their wheat and flour, let us pursue the opposite course, let us sweep restrictive measures by the board; thus should we enjoy all the advantages which would result to the Government from imposts, all the benefits that would accrue to individuals from exports. In either of these modes of proceeding I might concur; but I cannot consent to the plan now submitted, nor acquiesce in the wisdom or policy of our existing regulations. They are not promotive of the general welfare, but, on the contrary, are ruinous to the interests of that portion of the Union whose interest it is peculiarly my duty to protect. Yet, I cannot help observing that, however under their oppressive operation commerce languishes, and Southern agriculture is completely annihilated, they are tolerated by the Eastern States, because they promote their domestic manufactures, and improverish and embarrass the Government; and they are advocated and supported by the Middle States, because they consider, or affect to consider them, as very patriotic; because they inflict privations, which, by-the-by, they do not feel; and, finally, because, nevertheless, they are enabled to sell off, at excellent prices, the productions of their farms. Thus, sir, a feast is spread before us; but it is served up, however splendidly and abundantly, in shallow dishes; and, while the foxes of the Eastern and Middle States lap up the soup with great dexterity, the storks of the Mississippi, Mobile, and Altamaha, look on, perhaps with admiration, but certainly with no satisfaction whatever. While, sir, the spleen of hostility towards the Government is gratified, while the manufacturing establishments of the East are promoted, while the middle section of the Union disposes of, at high prices, the abundant harvest of their fields, what becomes of the commerce of our country? What fate befalls the agriculture of the South? Our cotton rots on the stalk. From this proscription of foreign manufactures, the grower of the raw material is irretrievably ruined. Possibly he may sell an inconsiderable portion of his crop, for contemptible prices, to domestic manufacturers, whilst he is compelled to buy, at enormous rates, the articles which his wants require. If he wishes to sell, he finds no competition among purchasers. Does he find it necessary to purchase, he suffers equally from the want of competition among those who sell.

Whatever may have been the measures of which I speak in principle, in practice they have not answered expectation. I conceive they were honorable to the Government. They had for their object the rights and real independence of the nation; but the embargo, the most efficient among them, has long since been laid aside; it was found impossible to carry it into effect. However well intended, whatever good was fairly hoped from it, the result expected has not been realized.

[Here Mr. R. was interrupted to make way for a message. He proceeded:]

Mr. Chairman, at the moment of this interruption I was about to conclude; but, one word, before I resume my seat, in reply to the honorable Speaker. He has said that the bill now before you forms a part of a series of measures intimately connected with, and depending on each other, and having in view the same object—retaliation on the enemy. I confess I do not think the honorable gentleman was successful in making out his proposition; it certainly strikes me in no such light. If I deemed his opinion correct, it should unquestionably receive my hearty support. Indeed, having already voted for the measures to which he alludes, I should feel myself compelled to do so upon every principle of consistency. To meet the lure held out to some of our merchants, the bribe to induce them to violate their allegiance to their country, and to sacrifice their individual honor, I gave, most cheerfully, my assent to the act prohibiting the use of foreign licenses. To meet the unprecedented barbarities of the British and their savage allies—barbarities which fill the soul with indignation and curdle the blood with horror—I hesitated not to consent to add the sanction of this House to principles of severe retaliation to be acted on by the President; but how this bill, which merely prohibits to neutrals a trade which it leaves open to ourselves, is connected with either of those acts, I cannot perceive; and, having already, I think, satisfactorily shown that it can produce no sensible effect upon the enemy, for these, and other reasons, which a want of time will not permit me to state, it does not meet with my approbation, and cannot receive my vote.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill; which was ordered to lie on the table, for the purpose of taking up the following business.

The bill for the better organization of the staff of the Army then went through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to a third reading.

The joint resolution of the Senate requesting the President of the United States to cause to be prepared and laid before Congress, a military system of discipline for the Infantry of the Army and Militia of the United States.

The bill for the better organization of the staff of the Army was then read a third time and passed, 51 to 34.

The House again took up for consideration the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit the exportation of certain articles from the United States in foreign vessels.

A debate of considerable length took place, in which Mr. CALHOUN supported the bill, though opposed to the amendment made on motion of Mr. QUINCY in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROSVENOR spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: When I had the honor to address you, on a measure, which has finally passed this House, I stated, at some length, my reasons for believing that the Government had no serious intention to pass the bill now before you. But sir, from a furious zeal, this day manifested in a certain quarter, to drive the measure through this House, I fear I was mistaken. I therefore deem it an indispensable duty, in the name of the commercial and agricultural districts which I represent, to enter my solemn protest against this new project of the Government.

I shall not enter into any argument, to show the impolicy, the injustice, and the danger of such a measure, considered as a measure of non-exportation. The task has been most ably and successfully performed by an honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES;) he has shown, that connected with the maritime power of the enemy, and with other bills already passed this House, this measure has all the blasting qualities, without even the few equivocal benefits of a broad restrictive system; and he has demonstrated the irreparable mischiefs which must result, from such weak and mongrel measures. His reasoning has not been met—it cannot be refuted—I will not weaken its effect on the House, by attempting to enforce it.

My principal object in rising, was to examine the grounds upon which the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who last addressed you, has rested his justification of the measure. He has assured us, that it is not at all intended as a part of any new system; that its object is in no respect a prohibition of free and fair exportation. Sir, whatever gentlemen may intend, it is too palpable for denial, that this measure is, in truth, a restrictive and an anti-commercial measure, and in conjunction with the license bill already passed, must operate (as far as such weak and unnatural measures can operate) as a broad and iron system of non-exportation.

But, sir, what are the intention and the objects of the bill according to the view of that honorable gentleman: "To avenge insult"—"to retaliate on the enemy his attempts to destroy us"—"to carry to his own lips his own poisoned chalice." And where are these insults, these injuries, these vital attempts of the enemy to be found? Henry's celebrated mission, after rioting for a time on the spoils of the Treasury, has found the tomb of the Capulets. And although its ghost seems to haunt the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, yet sure I am, that a thing of air would not have inspired him with all those bitter feelings which he has poured forth upon the enemy.

No sir, it is the last Message of the President which contains all this dreadful matter. In that Message came before us an Order in Council by the Prince Regent, and a letter from a British Secretary, to a West Indian Governor. Sir, by that order, certain West Indian ports are opened to the importation of articles which they wish to purchase, and to the exportation of produce which they wish to sell. This is no new practice; in every European war, the belligerent mother country has never failed to open some of her colonies to neutral commerce. By this order nothing more is done, and so far from any insult or injury to us in the body of the order, our nation is not even named. The order, however, recognises the letter of the British Secretary; the only part of that letter, with which we have anything to do, is contained in the following paragraph:

"Whatever importations are proposed to be made under the order from the United States, should be by your licenses confined to the ports of the Eastern States exclusively, unless you have reason to suppose that the object of the order would not be fulfilled, if licenses are not also granted for importations from other ports in the United States."

Upon this slender basis, rests that mass of invective, with which the President has been pleased to fill his Message. Here, and here alone, can the honorable gentleman from South Carolina find a provocation for the bitter anathemas which he has poured upon the enemy; and here alone, must the good people of New England hunt for "those degrading insults," those "vile invitations to treason," and that "steady purpose in the enemy, to kindle the flames of civil war, and to dismember their happy Union," which have been charged by the President, and which the honorable gentleman has endeavored to establish. If, in truth, such be the character of these English documents, they surely merit the disapprobation and contempt of the American people. For although England is an enemy, yet the laws of honorable warfare would condemn her for any insidious attempts upon the internal organization of our Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, does it become our Government to mount on these stilts of honor, and to reproach the enemy so violently? Have they furnished him no precedent for attacks upon the fealty of our citizens? Have they forgotten the first proclamation of General Hull in Canada? That black instrument, it is true, did not invite the Canadian subjects of Britain to a peaceful commerce with the nation—it did not offer them a trade refused to their mother country; but, transcending all such paltry expedients, with unblushing turpitude, it struck to the very vitals of their allegiance; it called them to rebellion and treason. Will it be denied that our Government is responsible for this measure? Have they ever uttered a syllable in disapprobation of it? On the contrary, it is well known, that its first appearance was hailed with unbounded plaudits, by the whole ministerial party; it never has been disavowed by the Government. And to this hour it has not been censured by those on this floor, who now make the “welkin ring” with their denunciations of the enemy, for following, at a humble distance, the vile example.

Sir, I reprobated that proclamation, because it was an attempt to conquer by corruption, by subornation and treason, instead of open and honorable warfare. And because it provided an example, which, through the whole South, might be retorted upon us with bloody interest.

As far as this British measure has a similar character, it has my unfeigned abhorrence; and if it would bring one dollar into the Treasury, or add one soldier to our armies; if it would erase one stain from our national escutcheon, or stifle one groan of our suffering country, I would join the honorable gentleman, and scold the Prince Regent for his sinful conduct, most heartily and most vociferously. Nay, if it pleased the honorable gentleman, I would, hand in hand with him, collect all the curses of Lord Peter, and all the orthodox anathemas of Dr. Slop, and pile them on the head of that wicked ruler. But, in the present case, the gentleman must excuse me; without some prospect of advantage to my country, I will not prostrate her dignity by heaping wanton curses even on her enemies.

Sir, I grant the honorable gentleman that this latter is an improper attempt to sow dissension among our citizens. I agree with him that the attempt is as weak as it is wicked. I give the gentleman all his premises. But I contend that the bill which he has reported is a palpable non sequitur from those principles. It is not a legitimate consequence that we should therefore suffer the gentleman to cut up, root and branch, all our neutral commerce. What, because your enemy is silly and wicked, does it follow that you must become insane? Because you have been in-sulted and injured, must you therefore commit suicide? Because your enemy wishes to reduce your citizens, will you for that destroy their commerce and deprive them of bread? Weak, in my opinion, weak indeed are those State logicians who reason so perversely.

But “our honor is involved, and we must vindicate our honor even at the expense of national ruin,” is the doctrine of the honorable gentleman. I am weary, weary of this perpetual and confused din about our national honor. Not a measure of more than ordinary mischief travels through this House unconnected with this topic of declamation. In the name of national honor, the non-intercourse and non-importation acts were fastened on the people. The embargo was a dreadful sacrifice at her shrine; she kindled the flames of war which are now consuming our country. Nothing could purify our insulted honor but rivers of human blood.

Mr. Speaker, I would solemnly demand, what is this national honor, this object of ministerial idolatry? Is she one of those infernal deities which can feed on nothing but commercial havoc and national ruin? Does she, like the demons of a Merina’s temple, sit abstracted and ferocious, never smiling but on national distress, never propitiated but by human sacrifice? Then she is the last deity that a virtuous and republican people should worship. But this is not her character; she is a beneficent, healing, and curing goddess, allied inseparably to public virtue, prosperity, and happiness. Such she was in those days when the great WASHINGTON presided in our councils. And such, notwithstanding the misdeeds that have been perpetrated in her name, she continues to this day. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina has mistaken her character, and that mistake has stamped error upon all his argument.

Sir, those rules of national or individual honor must be spurious, which require that, to avenge an insult or an injury, you should grasp a poignard and bury it in your own bosom.

Mr. Speaker, strip this case of its flaming drape, and the nation would be astonished at the manner in which it is treated by the Government. The enemy chooses to open some of her colonies; she prefers that the benefits of that trade should be received by the northern and eastern part of the country. What her inducements and views are, is of no consequence. I do not believe that the inducement is to benefit this country, or any part of it, for the Prince Regent has not yet published his “love for the Americans.”

The question is, whether this act is of such a nature as to justify us in closing the ports of the Northern and Eastern States—not against England, for against a trade with her they are already closed, but against all trade in neutral ships.

Sir, the people of those States have committed no offence meriting such punishment. They have already felt the hand of Government heavy upon them; and surely the present state of the nation should admonish gentlemen not to drive any section to despair of better days.

MARCH, 1813.

Exportation in Foreign Vessels.

H. OF R.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) has pertinently asked, to what extent you would carry your new principles of honor and retaliation. The enemy spares the commerce of the East, and destroys that of the South; you must equalize them by destroying the former. You cannot stop here. If the enemy blockades the South, you must embargo New England. If he burns Charleston and Norfolk, you must burn New York and Boston. In fine, anything spared in one section of the Union by the enemy, which he has the power to destroy, and not spared in another, must be destroyed by our Government, by way of equalizing the burdens of the war.

Such are now the feelings displayed in this House, and in this Government. Such were not the feelings when France issued her Southern licenses; when she designated a few Southern ports as worthy to enjoy her trade, and closed it against all the cities of the East. Such were not the feelings when the last embargo was laid; when the Southern States had mostly exported their surplus produce, and the Northern and Eastern States, on account of the Winter there, had almost the whole on their hands.

It is most unfortunate that these high sensibilities, these patriotic feelings, are never indulged but at the expense of the northern and eastern sections of the Union.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN,) to whom I have so often alluded, was disposed highly to compliment the people of the Northern States. He declared his full confidence in their fidelity, patriotism, and honor, and he believes that they will not only spurn with contempt the attempt to seduce them, but will hail the present measure as just, honorable, and wise. Sir, the patriotism of that people is undoubtedly as warm and as disinterested as that of any people on this globe; and if, indeed, this were an attack on their honor, they would need no such law as this to teach them their duty, or to compel them to perform it. But, sir, I do not believe that their patriotism will feel insulted. They will hardly be satisfied by flattery and compliment for this attack upon their commerce. I would not be surprised if they should answer the honorable gentleman somewhat in this manner: "Hands off, Mr. CALHOUN, if it please you; we do not dislike your compliments; indeed, we are pleased with the notes of this new tune from the South. We will do anything in reason to oblige you; but really, sir, to be complimented out of our commerce; to be flattered into poverty; to be cowed into service, is a little more than the rules of civility demand."

Sir, the people of New England know their duty, and they will perform it, without these unnecessary and insulting tones. They know their rights, also, and they will protect them at any and every hazard.

It has been avowed on this floor, [by Mr. Speaker CLAY,] that this bill is only one part of a contemplated system of rigid non-exportation. Have gentlemen reflected on the disastrous consequences of such a system at the present time? The district which I have the honor to represent, is a portion of an extensive tract of mercantile and agricultural country, extending up the Hudson river far into the interior of New York. The merchants and farmers of that country did believe, that when you appealed to arms, your restrictive system was at rest forever. They had a right so to believe, from the declarations of gentlemen on this floor, and from the unequivocal conduct of Government. Under this belief, during the present Winter, the merchants have constantly purchased produce at high and advanced prices. In the numerous villages scattered on either side of the Hudson river, and over immense tracts far to the west of it, the stores are groaning with the productions of their soil. Sir, when the Spring opens, they will find all their prospects blasted, and bankruptcy staring in their faces. Through the whole frozen interior of the North and East, the condition of the merchants and farmers is similar, and similar disastrous consequences will be realized.

We are involved in war with a nation powerful in her resources, clothed in complete armor, and to whom, from long habit, a state of warfare has become almost a national condition. We need all our resources and all our energies to save this war from a disgraceful conclusion. What then but madness can dictate a policy tending to dry up our resources and paralyze our energies. Wounded by the spear of war, what but downright political quackery could prescribe those "restrictive" nostrums, to restore the nation to health and vigor? Are the old chimerical notions of starving the enemy, yet floating in the brains of gentlemen? In despite of experience, do they yet believe that our blessed country alone can produce food for the world? Are the countries of the Baltic and Caspian seas no longer cultivated? Has the Nile ceased to fructify the fields of Egypt? Have Sicily and the Barbary coasts returned to a barren state of nature? Has France herself agreed to bury her surplus breadstuffs in the earth? Or has England lost that ascendancy on the ocean, and forgot all those commercial arts, by which she was wont to procure supplies from all those countries? Seven years of restrictions have in vain been tried. Your enemy has laughed you to scorn, and your own people have cursed the policy that crushed their prosperity. There is no doubt, that, as at the time you laid the embargo, the closing of your ports now, might produce a temporary inconvenience to the enemy; but the measure would finally and permanently recoil on our merchants, and even farmers. These men have, therefore, a deep and vital interest in this question. Twice already they have been sacrificed to test the efficacy of our "restrictive energies."

Do you intend again to stretch them on the rack, again to cover the country with sackcloth and ashes? Is another brood of "restrictive" harpies, more unseemly and more hungry than their predecessors, to be let loose among them? And is this bill a pioneer to the new swarms of "continental" locusts?

Mr. Speaker, I shudder when I behold that anti-commercial demon, which for seven years has been glutted with the mangled limbs of commerce, still hovering about this bill. The deluded people did believe that, when "you let slip the dogs of war," the monster had fallen, never again to trample down their rights, or devour the remnant of their prosperity. They were mistaken. He has risen invigorated from the blow; like the horse leech, he continues to cry, "give, give!" He never will be satisfied while the farmers of the North and the East are prosperous and powerful, or while the ships of an independent merchant, float safely and successfully on the ocean. Sir, I do trust in Heaven, that the people of this Union will not sleep forever—I do trust, that the time is not far distant when the rulers of this nation shall be compelled again to travel in the paths of peace, commerce, and honor. I do trust that this new system, fraught as it is with new destruction, will meet an effectual overthrow. On this floor, I have no hope of such an event. The current of influence is here too strong to be resisted. But if the God of nations "doth seek our rulers, and hath given our Senators wisdom," it must find its grave in the other branches of the Government.

Mr. QUINCY opposed the bill, and after some remarks from Mr. BLACKLEDGE in reply to him, the question on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their amendment was taken, to wit: to strike out from the fifth line of the first section, the words, "and every," and to insert, "wheat, flour, rice, cotton, tobacco, indigo, tar, pitch, or turpentine, or any other article, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States:" And passed in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 29, as follows:

The other amendments, reported by the Committee of the whole House, were then concurred in: and a motion was then made by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "thereof," the words "for any port in the British West Indies, and in the British dominions on the continent of South America," and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken that the bill be engrossed, and read the third time; and passed in the affirmative—yeas 59, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—William Anderson, Stevenson Archer, David Bard, William Barnett, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Robert Brown, William Butler, John C. The bill was then ordered to be read the third time to-day, which was accordingly done, and the bill passed.

CONSTITUTION AND JAVA.

The House took up for consideration the resolution from the Senate requesting the President of the United States to present to Captain William Bainbridge a gold medal, with suitable inscriptions, and to the officers of the frigate Constitution silver medals, in testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of their gallantry and skill in achieving the capture and destruction of the British frigate Java; which was read three times, and passed.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill allowing a bounty to privateers; but the Committee being unable to progress for want of a quorum, it rose and reported the fact to the House; and the bill and report were ordered to lie on the table, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 3.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a memorial of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, praying that further time may be allowed to the purchasers of public lands to complete their payments; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHEVES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Nathaniel G. Ingraham, Alexander Phoenix, and William Nexsen, jr., with amendments; which was read, and agreed to by the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The said amendments being engrossed, the bill was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to alter the times of holding the District Courts in the respective districts of New York and Virginia, and to authorize the district judges to appoint commissioners to take affidavits and bail in certain cases," with amendments; the bill "altering the time for holding the district court in the district of Maine; the bill "making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1813," with amendments; the bill "making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the volunteer militia in the actual service of the United States for the year 1813;" the bill "supplementary to an act for increasing the Navy of the United States," with amendments. The Senate have also passed a bill "authorizing the payment for wagons and teams captured or destroyed by the enemy;" in all which amendments and bill they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate authorizing the payment for wagons and teams captured or destroyed by the enemy, was read twice, and, on motion, committed to a Committee of the whole House.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "to alter the times of holding the district courts in the respective districts of New York and Virginia, and to authorize the district judges to appoint commissioners to take affidavits and bail in certain cases," were read, and concurred in by the House.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "supplementary to an act for increasing the Navy of the United States," were read, and concurred in by the House.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill "making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1813," were read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said amendments. The Committee reported their agreement thereto, and the amendments were concurred in by the House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill. It was reported without amendment, and ordered to be read the third time to-day. The bill was read the third time, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. REED,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House, at the next session of Congress, a statement of the number of Navy Yards belonging to, and occupied for the use of the United States; the accommodations provided in each, with the number of officers and men attached to each, with their rank and pay; also, the quantity and species of timber provided in each. Also, a statement of the expenditures made in each yard during the year 1811 and 1812; the number of vessels repaired during that time, with the species, quantity, and cost of repairs on each vessel, and the manner in which such repairs have been made, whether by contract or otherwise, and the terms. Also, the amount of timber provided under the law making an annual appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars, with a statement of the contracts made under said act, and the terms thereof; Also, the number of officers in the naval service of the United States, their rank, pay, and employ.

Mr. CHEVES, from the committee of naval inquiry, appointed at the last session, reported that the committee had collected many facts, but, owing to the pressure of other business, had not been able to conclude the proposed investigation. The facts which the committee had collected, however, he thought might be materially useful to the Navy Department; and he therefore moved to refer the documents to the Secretary of the Navy.—Agreed to

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide new certificates of registry, passed through a Committee of the Whole, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

The bill allowing a bounty to privateers was passed through a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to lie on the table, under the impression that it could not be acted on at the present session.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of the representatives of Samuel Lapsley, deceased, went through a Committee of the Whole, was ordered to a third reading, and passed; as also was the bill continuing in force the act declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of Georgia imposing certain port duties, the latter being much opposed, and passed by yeas and nays, 48 to 28, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., William Anderson, William Barnett, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, Robert Brown, John C. Calhoun, Langdon Cheves, John Clopton, Roger Davis, Joseph

Desha, Samuel Dinsmoor, Meshack Franklin, Bolling Hall, Obed Hall, Aylett Hawes, Joseph Kent, William R. King, Abner Lacock, Peter Little, Wm. Lowndes, Aaron Lyle, William McCoy, Alexander McKim, Samuel L. Mitchell, Jeremiah Morrow, Hugh Nelson, Thomas Newton, Stephen Ormsby, Israel Pickens, Wm. Piper, James Pleasants, jun., John Rhea, Jonathan Roberts, Thomas B. Robertson, William Rodman, Lemuel Sawyer, Adam Seybert, Samuel Shaw, George Smith, John Smith, William Strong, John Taliaferro, George M. Troup, Robert Whitehill, Richard Winn, and Robert Wright.

YAYS—Stevenson Archer, John Baker, Abijah Bigelow, Epaphroditus Champion, Lewis Condict, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, jun., William Ely, James Fisk, Thomas R. Gold, Isaiah L. Green, Thomas P. Grosvenor, Jacob Hufty, Lyman Law, Joseph Lewis, jun., James Morgan, Jonathan O. Moseley, Thomas Newbold, Joseph Pearson, Timothy Pitkin, junior, Elisha R. Potter, John Randolph, Ebenezer Seaver, Lewis B. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Charles Turner, jr., and Leonard White.

And there being but little business, and much difficulty in keeping a quorum, the House adjourned to 5 o'clock.

Evening Sitting, 5 o'clock.

The bills from the Senate for the relief of Louis Chacherie, and for the relief of Washington Lee, went through Committees of the Whole, and were read a third time and passed.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a roll of the persons holding office or employment under the authority of the United States, in conformity to a resolution of this House, of the 27th January; and was ordered to lie on the table.

A very desultory conversation took place on the printing this document; which was at length ordered to be printed by yeas and nays, 78 to 13.

A Message was received from the President of the United States in compliance with the resolution of the House, of Monday, transmitting certain documents touching our relations with France, not heretofore communicated.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER,

Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of this House be presented to HENRY CLAY, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in the discharge of the arduous duties assigned him while in the Chair.

Whereupon, the Hon. SPEAKER rose and made the following observations:

"I thank you, gentlemen, for the testimony you have just so kindly delivered in approbation of my conduct in the Chair. Amidst the momentous subjects of deliberation which undoubtedly distinguish the 12th Congress as the most memorable in the annals of America, it has been a source of animating consolation to me, that I have never failed to experience the liberal support of gentlemen in all quarters of the House. If in the moment of ardent debate, when all have been struggling to maintain the best interests of our beloved country as they have appeared to us respectively, causes of irritation have occurred, let us consign them to oblivion, and let us in the painful separation which is about to ensue, perhaps forever, cherish and cultivate a recollection only of the many agreeable hours we have spent together. Allow me, gentlemen, to express the fervent wish that one and all of you may enjoy all possible individual happiness, and that in the return to your several homes you may have pleasant journeys."

ARMED VESSELS OF THE ENEMY.

The bill to encourage the destruction of the armed vessels of war of the enemy, went through a Committee of the Whole and was reported to the House.

A motion was made to postpone the same indefinitely, and negatived.

For indefinite postponement 41, against it 43.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, by the following vote, by yeas and nays. For the third reading 55, against it 35, as follows:

NAYS—John Baker, David Bard, William Barnett, Abijah Bigelow, Harmanus Bleecker, Elijah Brigham, John C. Potter, Josiah Quincy, John Randolph, William Reed, William Rodman, John Sevier, Adam Seybert, Daniel Sheffey, Philip Stuart, Lewis B. Sturges, Samuel Taggart, and Leonard White.

And the bill was accordingly read a third time.

A motion was made by Mr. Lewis to postpone the further consideration of the bill to the 4th Monday in May. Negatived. For postponement 37, against it 45.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided in the affirmative, yeas 50.

Mr. TURNER moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the communication of the President of the United States, communicated this day, with the list of officers of the United States, and also five hundred copies of the President's Message of this date, and accompanying documents relative to our relations with the Government of France, be printed for the use of the members of this and of the next Congress.

The question to consider the resolution was taken, and determined in the negative.

Direct Tax—Closing Business.

H. of R.

QUOTA OF THE DIRECT TAX.

Mr. BIGELOW moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House, at the next session of Congress, a statement showing the quota payable by each State, of the direct tax laid by the act, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;" the amount of said tax that has been paid into the Treasury from each State, respectively, and the respective sums and duties of payment; the expenses in each State of collecting said tax, the losses that have been sustained in each State, and the causes thereof, and the balance of each State's quota of the said tax now due.

The question was taken that the House do now proceed to consider the said resolution, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 42, nays 37, as follows:

NAYS—Stevenson Archer, William Blackledge, William Butler, John C. Calhoun, James Cochran, Roger Davis, John Dawson, Joseph Desha, Elias Earle, Jas. Fisk, Peterson Goodwyn, Isaiah L. Green, Bolling Hall, Obed Hall, Joseph Kent, Peter Little, William Lowndes, Aaron Lyle, Thomas Moore, William McCoy, Alexander McKim, Arunah Metcalf, Samuel L. Mitchill, Hugh Nelson, Stephen Ormsby, Israel Pickens, William Piper, Peter B. Porter, Samuel Ringgold, John Rhea, John Roane, Jonathan Roberts, Thomas B. Robertson, Samuel Shaw, George Smith, William Strong, and Charles Turner, junior.

Ordered, That the said resolution do lie on the table.

CLOSING BUSINESS.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, a committee was appointed, jointly, with a committee to be appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses are now ready to adjourn, and desire to know whether he has any further communication to make to them during the present session.

MESSRS. DAWSON and GROSVENOR were appointed the committee on the part of the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "concerning invalid pensioners," with an amendment; the bill "making an appropriation for alterations and repairs in the Capitol;" the bill "authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to provide new certificates of registry;" the bill "supplementary to the acts heretofore passed upon the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization," with amendments. The Senate have also passed a bill "to provide for the accommodation of the President of the United States;" in all which amendments and bill they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate agree to the resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress, and have appointed a committee on their part.

For some time a quorum was not present.

Bills from the Senate were waiting. A call of the House was had, and it appeared that sixty-four members only were present.

After receiving from the President all the bills which had passed, and being informed by the committee that he had no further communications to make, the House adjourned sine die.

GREAT BRITAIN.

[Communicated to Congress by the Messages of November 4,* 12, and 18, 1812.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

For the further information of Congress relative to the pacific advances made on the part of this Government to that of Great Britain, and the manner in which they have been met by the latter, I transmit the sequel of the communications on that subject received from the late Chargé d'Affaires at London.

JAMES MADISON.

NOVEMBER 12, 1812.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of a communication from Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State. It is connected with the correspondence accompanying my Message of the 12th instant, but had not, at that date, been received.

JAMES MADISON.

NOVEMBER 18, 1812.

Extract—Mr. Monroe to Mr. Russell.

JUNE 26, 1812.

This letter is committed to Mr. Foster, who has promised to deliver it to you in safety.

On the 18th of this month a declaration of war against Great Britain passed Congress. I send you a copy of the act, of the President's Message, and of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, which brought the subject under consideration.

This measure has been produced by the continued aggressions of the British Government on the rights of the United States, and the presumption arising from that and other facts, which it is unnecessary to recite, that no favorable change of policy might be expected from it. It was impossible for the United States to surrender their rights, by relinquishing the ground which they had taken; and it was equally incompatible with their interests and character to rely longer on measures which had failed to accomplish their objects. War was the only remaining alternative; and that fact being clearly ascertained, you will find by the documents transmitted, that it was adopted with decision.

As war has been resorted to by necessity, and, of course, with reluctance, this Government looks forward to the restoration of peace with much interest, and a sincere desire to promote it on conditions just, equal, and honorable to both parties. It is in the power of Great Britain to terminate the war on such conditions, and it would be very satisfactory to the President to meet it in arrangements to that effect.

Although there are many just and weighty causes of complaint against Great Britain, you will perceive, by the documents transmitted, that the Orders in Council, and other blockades, illegal, according to the principles lately acknowledged, and the impressment of our seamen, are considered to be of the highest importance. If the Orders in Council are repealed, and no illegal blockades are substituted for them; and orders are given to discontinue the impressment of seamen from our vessels, and to restore those already impressed, there is no reason why hostilities should not immediately cease. Securing these objects, you are authorized to stipulate an armistice, to commence from the signature of the instrument providing for it, or at the end of fifty or sixty days, or other the shortest term that the British Government will assent to. Definitive arrangements will be made on these and every other difference by a treaty, to be concluded either here or at London, though it is much desired that the subject should be entered on in this city.

As an inducement to the British Government to discontinue the practice of impressments from our vessels, you may give assurance that a law will be passed (to be reciprocal) to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the public or commercial service of the United States. There can be no doubt that such an arrangement would prove much more efficacious in securing to Great Britain her seamen, than the practice to which it is proposed to be a substitute, independent of all the other objections to it.

Indemnity for injuries received under the Orders in Council, and other edicts violating our rights, seems to be incident to their repeal; but the President is willing that the consideration of that claim should not be pressed at this time, so as to interfere with the preliminary arrangement alluded to. It will be proper to bring it into view, merely to show that it is expected that provision will be made for it in the treaty which is to follow. Every other interest may also be provided for at the same time.

It is hoped that the British Government will find it consistent with its interest and honor to terminate the war by an armistice, in the manner and on the conditions proposed. In so doing, it will abandon no right, it will sacrifice no interest; it will abstain only from violating our rights, and, in return, it will restore peace with the Power from whom, in a friendly commercial intercourse, so many advantages will be derived, not to mention the injuries which cannot fail to result from a prosecution of the war.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Russell.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 27, 1812.

SIR: I wrote you on the 26th of June, by Mr. Foster, a letter, which he promised to deliver you in person, or by a safe hand.

In that letter you were informed that the Orders in Council, and other illegal blockades, and the impressment of our seamen by Great Britain, as you well knew before, were the principal causes of the war; and that, if they were removed, you might stipulate an armistice, leaving them and all other grounds of difference for final and more precise adjustment by treaty. As an inducement to the British Government to discontinue the practice of impressment from our vessels, by which alone our seamen can be made secure, you were authorized to stipulate a prohibition by law, to be reciprocal, of the employment of British seamen in the public or commercial service of the United States. As such an arrangement, which might be made completely effectual and satisfactory by suitable regulations and penalties, would operate almost exclusively in favor of Great Britain—for, as few of our seamen ever enter voluntarily into the British service, the reciprocity would be nominal—its advantage to Great Britain would be more than an equivalent for any she derives from impressment, which alone ought to induce her to abandon the practice, if she had no other motive for it. A stipulation to prohibit by law the employment of British seamen in the service of the United States is to be understood in the sense and spirit of our Constitution. The passage of such a law must depend of course on Congress, who, it might reasonably be presumed, would give effect to it.

By authorizing you to secure these objects as the grounds of an armistice, it was not intended to restrict you to any precise form in which it should be done. It is not particularly necessary that the several points should be specially provided for in the convention stipulating the armistice. A clear and distinct understanding with the British Government on the subject of impressment, comprising in it the discharge of the men already impressed, and on future blockades, if the Orders in Council are revoked, is all that is indispensable. The Orders in Council being revoked, and the proposed understanding on the other points, that is, on blockades and impressment, being first obtained in a manner, though informal, to admit of no mistake or disagreement hereafter, the instrument providing for the armistice may assume a general form, especially if more agreeable to the British Government. It may, for example, be said in general terms, "that both Powers being sincerely desirous to terminate the differences which unhappily subsist between them, and equally so that full time should be given for the adjustment thereof, agree

"1. That an armistice shall take place for that purpose, to commence on the — day of —.

"2. That they will forthwith appoint on each side commissioners with full power to form a treaty, which shall provide, by reciprocal arrangements, for the security of their seamen from being taken or employed in the service of the other Power, for the regulation of their commerce, and all other interesting questions now depending between them.

"3. The armistice shall not cease without a previous notice by one to the other party of — days, and shall not be understood as having other effect than merely to suspend military operations by land and by sea."

By this you will perceive that the President is desirous of removing every obstacle to an accommodation, which consists merely of form. Securing in a safe and satisfactory manner the rights and interests of the United States, in these two great and essential circumstances, as it is presumed may be accomplished by the proposed understanding, he is willing that it be done in a manner the most satisfactory and honorable to Great Britain, as well as to the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. Graham to Mr. Russell.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Aug. 9, 1812.

SIR: The Secretary left this city about ten days ago on a short visit to Virginia. Since that period, Mr. Baker has, in consequence of some despatches from his Government, addressed to Mr. Foster, made to me a communication respecting the intentions of his Government, as regards the Orders in Council. It was of a character, however, so entirely informal and confidential, that Mr. Baker did not feel himself at liberty to make it in the form of a note, verbal, or pro memoria, or even to permit me to make a memorandum of it at the time he made it. As it authorizes an expectation that something more precise and definite, in an official form, may soon be received by this Government, it is the less necessary that I should go into an explanation of the views of the President in relation to it, more particularly as the Secretary of State is daily expected, and will be able to do it in a manner more satisfactory.

I refer you to the enclosed papers for information as to the maritime and military movements incident to the war, and will add, that the President is anxious to know, as soon as possible, the result of the proposals you were authorized to make to the British Government respecting an armistice. He considers them so fair and reasonable, that he cannot but hope that they will be acceded to, and thus be the means of hastening an honorable and permanent peace.

I have the honor, &c.

JOHN GRAHAM.

Mr. Graham to Mr. Russell.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Aug. 10, 1812.

SIR: Thinking that it may possibly be useful to you, I do myself the honor to enclose a memorandum of the conversation between Mr. Baker and myself, alluded to in my letter of yesterday's date. From a conversation with Mr. Baker since this memorandum was made, I find that I was correct in representing to the President that the intimation from Mr. Foster and the British authorities at Halifax was to be understood as connected with a suspension of hostilities on the frontiers of Canada.

I have the honor, &c.

JOHN GRAHAM.

[Memorandum referred to in the above letter.]

Mr. Baker verbally communicated to me, for the information of the President, that he had received despatches from his Government addressed to Mr. Foster, dated, I believe, about the 17th of June, from which he was authorized to say that an official declaration would be sent to this country; that the Orders in Council, so far as they affected the United States would be repealed on the first of August, to be revived on the 1st of May, 1813, unless the conduct of the French Government, and the result of the communications with the American Government, should be such as, in the opinion of His Majesty, to render their revival unnecessary. Mr. Baker, moreover, stated that the orders would be revived, provided the American Government did not, within fourteen days after they received the official declaration of their repeal, admit British armed vessels into their ports, and put an end to the restrictive measures which had grown out of the Orders in Council.

The despatches authorizing this communication to the American Government expressly directed that it should be made verbally, and Mr. Baker did not consider himself at liberty to reduce it to writing, even in the form of a note verbal, or pro memoria, or to suffer me to take a memorandum of his communication at the time he made it. I understood from him that the despatches had been opened by Mr. Foster at Halifax, who, in consequence of a conversation he had had with Vice-Admiral Sawyer and Sir John Sherbrooke, had authorized Mr. Baker to say that these gentlemen would agree, as a measure leading to a suspension of hostilities, that all captures made after a day to be fixed, should not be proceeded against immediately, but be detained to await the future decision of the two Governments. Mr. Foster had not seen Sir George Prevost, but had written to him by express, and did not doubt but that he would agree to an arrangement for the temporary suspension of hostilities. Mr. Baker also stated that he had received an authority from Mr. Foster to act as Chargé des Affaires, provided the American Government would receive him in that character, for the purpose of enabling him officially to communicate the declaration which was to be expected from the British Government. His functions to be understood, of course, as ceasing on the renewal of hostilities.

I replied, that although to so general and informal a communication no answer might be necessary, and certainly no particular answer expected, yet I was authorized to say that the communication is received with sincere satisfaction, as it is hoped that the spirit in which it was authorized by his Government may lead to such further communications as will open the way, not only for an early and satisfactory termination of existing hostilities, but to that entire adjustment of all the differences which produced them, and to that permanent peace and solid friendship which ought to be mutually desired by both countries, and which is sincerely desired by this. With this desire, an authority was given to Mr. Russell on the subject of an armistice, as introductory to a final pacification, as has been made known to Mr. Foster; and the same desire will be felt on the receipt of the further and more particular communications which are shortly to be expected, with respect to the joint intimation from Mr. Foster and the British authorities at Halifax on the subject of suspending judicial proceedings in the case of maritime captures, to be accompanied by a suspension of military operations. The authority given to Mr. Russell just alluded to, and of which Mr. Foster was the bearer, is full proof of the solicitude of the Government of the United States to bring about a general suspension of hostilities on admissible terms, with as little delay as possible. It was not to be doubted, therefore, that any other practicable expedient for attaining a similar result would readily be concurred in. Upon the most favorable consideration, however, which could be given to the expedient suggested through him, it did not appear to be reducible to any practical shape to which the Executive would be authorized to give it the necessary sanction; nor, indeed, is it probable, if it was less liable to insuperable difficulties, that it could have any material effect previous to the result of the pacific advance made by this Government, and which must, if favorably received, become operative as soon as any other arrangement tha could now be made. It was stated to Mr. Baker that the President did not, under existing circumstances, consider Mr. Foster as vested with the power of appointing a Chargé des Affaires; but that no difficulty in point of form would be made, as any authentic communication through him, or any other channel, would be received with attention and respect.

Extract—Secretary of State to Mr. Russell.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
August 21, 1812.

My last letter to you was of the 27th July, and was forwarded by the British packet the Althea, under the special protection of Mr. Baker. The object of that letter, and of the next preceding one of the 26th June, was to invest you with power to suspend, by an armistice, on such fair conditions as it was presumed could not be rejected, the operation of the war, which had been brought on the United States by the injustice and violence of the British Government. At the moment of the declaration of war, the President, regretting the necessity which produced it, looked to its termination and provided for it; and happy will it be for both countries if the disposition felt, and the advance thus made on his part, are entertained and met by the British Government in a similar spirit.

You have been informed by Mr. Graham of what passed in my late absence from the city, in an interview between Mr. Baker and him, in consequence of a despatch from the British Government to Mr. Foster, received at Halifax, just before he sailed for England, and transmitted by him to Mr. Baker, relating to a proposed suspension or repeal of the British Orders in Council. You will have seen, by the note forwarded to you by Mr. Graham, of Mr. Baker's communication to him, that Mr. Foster had authorized him to state that the commanders of the British forces at Halifax would agree to a suspension, after a day to be fixed, of the condemnation of prizes, to await the decision of both Governments, without, however, preventing captures on either side. It appears, also, that Mr. Foster had promised to communicate with Sir George Prevost, and to advise him to propose to our Government an armistice.

Sir George Prevost has since proposed to General Dearborn, at the suggestion of Mr. Foster, a suspension of offensive operations by land, in a letter which was transmitted by the General to the Secretary at War. A provisional agreement was entered into between General Dearborn and Colonel Baynes, the British Adjutant General, bearer of General Prevost's letter, that neither party should act offensively before the decision of our Government should be taken on the subject.

Since my return to Washington the document alluded to in Mr. Foster's despatch, as finally decided on by the British Government, has been handed to me by Mr. Baker, with a remark that its authenticity might be relied on. Mr. Baker added that it was not improbable that the admiral at Halifax might agree likewise to a suspension of captures, though he did not profess or appear to be acquainted with his sentiments on that point.

On full consideration of all the circumstances which merit attention, the President regrets that it is not in his power to accede to the proposed arrangement. The following are among the principal reasons which have produced this decision:

1. The President has no power to suspend judicial proceedings on prizes. A capture, if lawful, vests a right over which he has no control. Nor could he prevent captures otherwise than by an indiscriminate recall of the commissions granted to our privateers, which he could not justify under existing circumstances.

2. The proposition is not made by the British Government, nor is there any certainty that it would be approved by it. The proposed arrangement, if acceded to, might not be observed by the British officers themselves, if their Government, in consequence of the war, should give them instructions of a different character, even if they were given without a knowledge of the arrangement.

3. No security is given or proposed as to the Indians, nor could any be relied on. They have engaged in the war on the side of the British Government, and are now prosecuting it with vigor, in their usual savage mode. They can only be restrained by force when once let loose, and that force has already been ordered out for the purpose.

4. The proposition is not reciprocal, because it restrains the United States from acting where their power is greatest, and leaves Great Britain at liberty and gives her time to augment her forces in our neighborhood.

5. That as a principal object of war is to obtain redress against the British practice of impressment, an agreement to suspend hostilities, even before the British Government is heard from on that subject, might be considered a relinquishment of that claim.

6. It is the more objectionable, and of less importance, in consideration of the instructions heretofore given you, which, if met by the British Government, may have already produced the same result in a greater extent and more satisfactory form.

I might add that the declaration itself is objectionable in many respects, particularly the following:

1. Because it asserts a right in the British Government to restore the Orders in Council, or any part thereof, to their full effect, on a principle of retaliation on France, under circumstances of which she alone is to judge; a right which this Government cannot admit, especially in the extent heretofore claimed and acted on by the British Government.

2. That the repeal is founded exclusively on the French decree of 28th April, 1811, by which the repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, announced on the 5th August, 1810, to take effect on the 1st of November of that year, at which time their operation actually ceased, is disregarded, as are the claims of the United States arising from the repeal on that day, even according to the British pledge.

3. That even if the United States had no right to claim the repeal of the British Orders in Council prior to the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, nor before the notification of that decree to the British Government on the 20th of May of the present year, the British repeal ought to have borne date from that day, and been subject to none of the limitations attached to it.

These remarks on the declaration of the Prince Regent, which are not pursued with rigor, nor in the full extent which they might be, are applicable to it, in relation to the state of things which existed before the determination of the United States to resist the aggressions of the British Government by war. By that determination the relations between the two countries have been altogether changed; and it is only by a termination of the war, or by measures leading to it by consent of both Governments, that its calamities can be closed or mitigated. It is not now a question whether the declaration of the Prince Regent is such as ought to have produced a repeal of the non-importation act, had not war been declared; because, by the declaration of war, that question is superseded, and the non-importation act having been continued in force by Congress, and become a measure of war, and among the most efficient, it is no longer subject to the control of the Executive in the sense and for the purpose for which it was adopted. The declaration, however, of the Prince Regent will not be without effect. By repealing the Orders in Council, with out reviving the blockade of May 1806, or any other illegal blockade, as is understood to be the case, it removes a great obstacle to an accommodation. The President considers it an indication of a disposition in the British Government to accommodate the differences which subsist between the countries, and I am instructed to assure you that, if such disposition really exists, and is persevered in, and is extended to other objects, especially the important one of impressment, a durable and happy peace and reconciliation cannot fail to result from it.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, Sept. 1, 1812.

SIR: You will perceive by the enclosed copies of notes which have passed between Lord Castlereagh and me, that the moderate and equitable terms proposed for a suspension of hostilities have been rejected, and that it is my intention to return immediately to the United States.

My continuance here, after it has been so broadly intimated to me by his Lordship that I am no longer acknowledged in my diplomatic capacity, and after a knowledge that instructions are given to the British Admiral to negotiate an arrangement on the other side of the Atlantic, would, in my view of the subject, not only be useless, but improper.

It is probable, however, that the vessel in which I propose to embark will not take her departure before the 15th or 20th of this month.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JONA. RUSSELL.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

Mr. Russell to Lord Castlereagh.

LONDON, August 24, 1812.

MY LORD: It is only necessary, I trust, to call the attention of your Lordship to a review of the conduct of the Government of the United States, to prove, incontrovertibly, its unceasing anxiety to maintain the relations of peace and friendship with Great Britain. Its patience in suffering the many wrongs which it has received, and its perseverance in endeavoring, by amicable means, to obtain redress, are known to the world. Despairing at length of receiving this redress from the justice of the British Government, to which it had so often applied in vain, and feeling that a further forbearance would be a virtual surrender of interests and rights essential to the prosperity and independence of the nation confided to its protection, it has been compelled to discharge its high duty by an appeal to arms. While, however, it regards this course as the only one which remained for it to pursue, with a hope of preserving any portion of that kind of character which constitutes the vital strength of every nation, yet it is still willing to give another proof of the spirit which has uniformly distinguished its proceedings, by seeking to arrest, on terms consistent with justice and honor, the calamities of war. It has, therefore, authorized me to stipulate with His Britannic Majesty's Government an armistice, to commence at or before the expiration of sixty days after the signature of the instrument providing for it, on condition that the Orders in Council be repealed, and no illegal blockades be substituted for them; and that orders be immediately given to discontinue the impressment of persons from American vessels, and to restore the citizens of the United States already impressed; it being, moreover, well understood that the British Government will assent to enter into definitive arrangements, as soon as may be, on these and every other difference, by a treaty to be concluded either at London or Washington, as, on an impartial consideration of existing circumstances, shall be deemed most expedient.

As an inducement to Great Britain to discontinue the practice of impressment from American vessels, I am authorized to give assurance that a law shall be passed (to be reciprocal) to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the public or commercial service of the United States. It is sincerely believed that such an arrangement would prove more efficacious in securing to Great Britain her seamen than the practice of impressment, so derogatory to the sovereign attributes of the United States, and so incompatible with the personal rights of their citizens.

Your Lordship will not be surprised that I have presented the revocation of the Orders in Council as a preliminary to the suspension of hostilities, when it is considered that the act of the British Government of the 23d June last, ordaining that revocation, is predicated on conditions, the performance of which is rendered impracticable by the change which is since known to have occurred in the relations between the two countries. It cannot now be expected that the Government of the United States will immediately, on due notice of that act, revoke or cause to be revoked its acts excluding from the waters and harbors of the United States all British armed vessels, and interdicting commercial intercourse with Great Britain. Such a procedure would necessarily involve consequences too unreasonable and extravagant to be for a moment presumed. The Order in Council of the 23d June last will, therefore, according to its own terms, be null and of no effect, and a new act of the British Government, adapted to existing circumstances, is obviously required for the effectual repeal of the Orders in Council, of which the United States complain.

The Government of the United States considers indemnity for injuries received under the Orders in Council, and other edicts violating the rights of the American nation, to be incident to their repeal, and it believes that satisfactory provision will be made in the definitive treaty to be hereafter negotiated for this purpose.

The conditions now offered to the British Government for the termination of the war by an armistice, as above stated, are so moderate and just in themselves, and so entirely consistent with its interest and honor, that a confident hope is indulged that it will not hesitate to accept them. In so doing, it will abandon no right, it will sacrifice no interest; it will abstain only from violating the rights of the United States, and in return it will restore peace with the Power, from whom, in a friendly commercial intercourse, so many advantages are to be derived.

Your Lordship is undoubtedly aware of the serious difficulties with which a prosecution of the war, even for a short period, must necessarily embarrass all future attempts at accommodation. Passions exasperated by injuries, alliances, or conquests, on terms which forbid their abandonment, will inevitably hereafter imbitter and protract a contest which might now be so easily and happily terminated.

Deeply impressed with these truths, I cannot but persuade myself that His Royal Highness the Prince Regent will take into his early consideration the propositions herein made on behalf of the United States, and decide on them in a spirit of conciliation and justice.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Russell.

FOREIGN OFFICE, August 29, 1812.

SIR: Although the diplomatic relations between the two Governments have been terminated by a declaration of war on the part of the United States, I have not hesitated, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the authority under which you act, to submit to the Prince Regent the proposition contained in your letter of the 24th for a suspension of hostilities.

From the period at which your instructions must have been issued, it is obvious that this overture was determined upon by the Government of the United States, in ignorance of the Order in Council of the 23d of June last; and, as you inform me that you are not at liberty to depart from the conditions set forth in your letter, it only remains for me to acquaint you that the Prince Regent feels himself under the necessity of declining to accede to the proposition therein contained, as being, on various grounds, absolutely inadmissible.

As soon as there was reason to apprehend that Mr. Foster's functions might have ceased in America, and that he might have been obliged to withdraw himself, in consequence of war having been declared, from the United States, before the above-mentioned order of the 23d of June and the instructions consequent thereupon could have reached him, measures were taken for authorizing the British Admiral on the American station to propose to the Government of the United States an immediate and reciprocal revocation of all hostile orders, with the tender of giving full effect, in the event of hostilities being discontinued, to the provisions of the said order, upon the conditions therein specified.

From this statement you will perceive that the view you have taken of this part of the subject is incorrect; and that, in the present state of the relations between the two countries, the operation of the order of the 23d June can only be defeated by a refusal on the part of your Government to desist from hostilities, or to comply with the conditions expressed in the said order.

Under the circumstances of your having no powers to negotiate, I must decline entering into a detailed discussion of the propositions which you have been directed to bring forward.

I cannot, however, refrain on one single point from expressing my surprise, namely, that as a condition preliminary even to a suspension of hostilities, the Government of the United States should have thought fit to demand that the British Government should desist from an ancient and accustomed practice of impressing British seamen from the merchant ships of a foreign State, simply on the assurance that a law shall hereafter be passed to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the public or commercial service of that State.

The British Government now, as heretofore, is ready to receive from the Government of the United States, and amicably to discuss, any proposition which professes to have in view either to check abuse in the exercise of the practice of impressment, or to accomplish, by means less liable to vexation, the object for which impressment has hitherto been found necessary; but they cannot consent to suspend the exercise of a right upon which the naval strength of the Empire mainly depends, until they are fully convinced that means can be devised; and will be adopted, by which the object to be obtained by the exercise of that right can be effectually secured.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CASTLEREAGH.

JONATHAN RUSSELL, Esq., &c.

Mr. Russell to Lord Castlereagh.

18, BENTINCK STREET, Sept. 1, 1812.

MY LORD: I have learned with much regret by your Lordship's note dated the 29th ultimo, which I did not receive until this morning, that the Prince Regent has thought proper to decline to accede to the proposition for a suspension of hostilities, contained in my note of the 24th August.

It has been matter of surprise to me that my view with regard to the revocation of the Orders in Council, on the 23d of June last, should have been considered to have been incorrect, when it appears by your Lordship's note that the British Government itself has deemed it necessary to give powers to the British Admiral to stipulate for its full effect, and thereby admitted that a new act was required for that purpose.

It now only remains for me to announce to your Lordship, that it is my intention to embark immediately at Plymouth, on board the ship Lark, for the United States; and to request that permission may be granted, as soon as may be, for the embarkation of my servants' baggage, and the effects of this Legation, and that the necessary passports may be furnished for my own and their safe conduct to that destination.

I avail myself of this occasion to apprise your Lordship, that I am authorized by the Government of the United States to leave Reuben Guant Beasley, Esq., as its agent for prisoners of war in this country, and to desire that every necessary facility may be afforded him in the exercise of that trust by the British Government.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Rt. Hon. LORD CASTLEREAGH, &c.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, September 3, 1812.

SIR: I enclose herein a copy of a note received yesterday from Lord Castlereagh, which will acquaint you that I have obtained my passports to return to the United States, and that Mr. Beasley is permitted to remain here as agent for prisoners of war.

Immediately on demanding my passports, I addressed to the Consuls a circular, of which you will also find a copy enclosed.

The Swiftsure packet sailed on the 31st of last month from Falmouth for America, and it is very probable that she takes out instructions suggested by the overture made here, but there is no reason to believe that they can be of a nature to satisfy the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

12th CON. 2d SESS.—38

Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Russell.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Sept. 2, 1812.

SIR: I have laid before His Royal Highness the Prince Regent your letter of the 1st instant, in which you announce your intention to embark immediately at Plymouth, on board the ship Lark, for the United States.

I have already had the honor of forwarding to you an Admiralty order for the protection of that ship as a cartel, on her voyage to America; and I herewith enclose to you a passport for the free embarkation of yourself and family, in conformity to your request. The Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury will issue directions to the commissioners of the customs to give every facility to the embarkation of your effects.

If previous to your departure from England you can point out to me any particular manner in which I can facilitate your arrangements, I beg that you will command my services.

His Royal Highness has commanded me to signify to you, for the information of your Government, that there will be no difficulty in allowing Mr. R. G. Beasley, as stated in your letter, to reside in this country as the United States' agent for prisoners of war.

I have the honor, to be, &c.

CASTLEREAGH.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, September 19, 1812.

SIR: On the 12th I received your letter of the 27th of July last; and the copies of my note to Lord Castlereagh, and of his Lordship's reply enclosed herein, will inform you that the propositions made in consequence of it have been rejected.

As I have but this moment heard of the immediate departure of the Friends, I have time only to add, that I have received the communications of Mr. Graham, of the 9th and 10th of August, by the Gleaner, and that I leave London this evening to embark on board the Lark, at Plymouth, for New York.

I am, with great respect, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

P. S. An interesting interview took place between Lord Castlereagh and myself on the 16th instant, the account of which I must, for want of time, reserve until I have the honor to see you.

[Enclosed in Mr. Russell's despatch of Sept. 19.]

Mr. Russell to Lord Castlereagh.

18, BENTINCK STREET,

September 12, 1812.

MY LORD: In consequence of additional instructions which I received from my Government this morning, I called about noon at the Foreign Office, and found with regret that your Lordship was out of town. My object was to communicate to your Lordship the powers under which I act, that you might perceive their validity and extent. I have, however, sought to state them substantially in the official letter which I have herewith the honor to transmit to your Lordship; but, should you find anything that stands in need of explanation previous to being submitted to His Royal Highness, I shall remain at 18, Bentinck street, to receive the commands of your Lordship. If your Lordship could, in courtesy, find any motive in my personal convenience to hasten a decision upon the propositions which I have submitted, the season of the year, my anxiety to depart, (all my arrangements being made, all my luggage having left town,) and the detention of the Lark at much expense, will plead powerfully in my favor. I have the honor to be, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Mr. Russell to Lord Castlereagh.

18, BENTINCK STREET,
September 12, 1812.

MY LORD: I hasten, authorized by instructions recently received from the Government of the United States, and urged by an unfeigned anxiety to arrest the calamities of war, to propose to your Lordship a convention for the suspension of hostilities, to take effect at such time as may be mutually agreed upon, and stipulating that each party shall forthwith appoint Commissioners with full power to form a treaty, which shall provide by reciprocal arrangements for the security of their seamen from being taken or employed in the service of the other Power, for the regulation of their commerce, and all other interesting questions now depending between them; and that the armistice shall not cease without such previous notice by one to the other party as may be agreed upon, and shall not be understood as having any other effect than merely to suspend military operations by land and by sea.

In proposing to your Lordship these terms for a suspension of hostilities, I am instructed to come to a clear and distinct understanding with His Britannic Majesty's Government, without requiring it to be formal, concerning impressments, comprising in it the discharge of the citizens of the United States already impressed, and concerning future blockades; the revocation of the Orders in Council being confirmed.

Your Lordship is aware that the power of the Government of the United States to prohibit the employment of British seamen must be exercised in the sense and spirit of the Constitution, but there is no reason to doubt but that it will be so exercised effectually, and with good faith.

Such a measure, as it might, by suitable regulations and penalties, be made completely effectual and satisfactory, would operate almost exclusively in favor of Great Britain; for, as few American seamen ever enter voluntarily into the British service, the reciprocity would be nominal, and it is sincerely believed that it would be more than an equivalent for any advantage she may derive from impressment.

By the proposition which I have now the honor to make in behalf of my Government, your Lordship will perceive the earnest desire of the President to remove every obstacle to an accommodation, which consists merely of form, and to secure the rights and interests of the United States in a manner the most satisfactory and honorable to Great Britain as well as to America.

The importance of the overture now made will, I trust, obtain for it the early consideration of His Royal Highness, the Prince Regent; and I shall detain the vessel in which I have taken my passage to the United States until I have the honor to learn his decision.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Russell.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Sept. 16, 1812.

Lord Castlereagh presents his compliments to Mr. Russell, and requests to have the honor of seeing him at his house in St. James's square, at nine o'clock this evening.

Mr. Hamilton to Mr. Russell.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Sept. 16, 1812.

DEAR SIR: I have not seen Lord Castlereagh since his receipt of your two last letters of —, but have received his directions to say to you that he cannot have it in his power to reply to them for a few days, or would have had much pleasure in attending immediately to your request in that respect. You may be assured that no delay will take place which can be avoided.

I am, dear sir, faithfully yours,

WILLIAM HAMILTON.

JONATHAN RUSSELL, Esq., &c.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Hamilton.

18, BENTINCK STREET,
September 16, 1816.

DEAR SIR: I have learned, with much regret and disappointment, that Lord Castlereagh has directed you to inform me that it is not in his power to give an immediate answer to the last letters which I have had the honor to address to him. The object of those letters was of a nature to require an early decision; reluctant, however, by any precipitancy on my part to protract the present unhappy relations between the two countries, I beg you to acquaint his Lordship that I shall remain in town until Sunday, the 20th instant, when, unless some special and satisfactory reason be assigned for a longer delay, I shall consider it to be my duty to proceed to Plymouth to embark for the United States.

I am, dear sir, with great truth, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

N. B. Sent at three o'clock.

Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Russell.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Sept. 18, 1812.

SIR: Under the explanations you have afforded me of the nature of the instructions which you have received from your Government, I have, as on the preceding occasion, been induced to lay your letter of the 12th instant before His Royal Highness, the Prince Regent.

His Royal Highness commands me to express to you his regret that he cannot perceive any substantial difference between the proposition for a suspension of hostilities, which you are now directed to make, and that which was contained in your letter of the 24th of August last. The form of the proposed arrangement, it is true, is different; but it only appears to aim at executing the same purpose in a more covert, and therefore in a more objectionable manner.

You are now directed to require, as preliminary to a suspension of hostilities, a clear and distinct understanding, without, however, requiring it to be formed, on all the points referred to in your former proposition. It is obvious that, were this proposal acceded to, the discussion on the several points must substantially precede the understanding required.

This course of proceeding, as bearing on the face of it a character of disguise, is not only felt to be in principle inadmissible, but as unlikely to lead in practice to any advantageous result. As it does not appear, on the important subject of impressment, that you are either authorized to propose any specific plan, with reference to which the suspension of that practice could be made a subject of deliberation, or that you have received any instructions for the guidance of your conduct on some of the leading principles which such a discussion must, in the first instance, involve.

Under these circumstances, the Prince Regent sincerely laments that he does not feel himself enabled to depart from the decision which I was directed to convey to you in my letter of the 2d instant. I have the honor, &c.

CASTLEREAGH.

JONATHAN RUSSELL, Esq.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

LONDON, September 19, 1812.

SIR: Since writing you this morning, fearing that this Government should infer from my silence an acquiescence in the strange and unwarrantable view which Lord Castlereagh has in his last note, thought fit to take of the overtures which I have submitted, and of the powers under which I acted, I have considered it my duty to return an answer, of which the enclosed is a copy. With great consideration and respect, I am, sir, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

HON. JAMES MONROE.

[Enclosed in Mr. Russell's despatch of Sept. 19.]

Mr. Russell to Lord Castlereagh.

LONDON, September 19, 1812.

MY LORD: I had the honor to receive last evening your Lordship's note of yesterday, and have learned, with great regret and disappointment, that His Royal Highness, the Prince Regent, has again rejected the just and moderate propositions for a suspension of hostilities which I have been instructed to present on the part of my Government.

After the verbal explanations which I had the honor to afford your Lordship on the 16th instant, both as to the object and sufficiency of my instructions, I did not expect to hear repeated any objections on these points. For itself, the American Government has nothing to disguise; and, by varying the proposition as to the manner of coming to a preliminary understanding, it merely intended to leave to the British Government that which might be most congenial to its feelings.

The propositions presented by me, however, on the 24th of August and 12th instant, are distinguishable by a diversity in the substance, as well as in the mode of the object which they embraced; as, by the former, the discontinuance of the practice of impressment was to be immediate, and to precede the prohibitory law of the United States relative to the employment of British seamen, when, by the latter, both these measures are deferred to take effect simultaneously hereafter. Having made a precise tender of such law, and exhibited the instructions which warranted it to your Lordship, I have learned, with surprise, that it does not appear to your Lordship that I am authorized to propose any specific plan on the subject of impressment. I still hope that the overtures made by me may again be taken into consideration by His Majesty's Government; and, as I leave town this afternoon for the United States, that it will authorize some agent to proceed thither and adopt them as a basis for reconciliation between the two countries, an event so devoutly to be wished.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

ON BOARD THE LARK, Nov. 7, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I am now passing the Narrows, and expect to land at New York this day. I conceive it to be my duty to repair to the seat of Government, and shall set off as soon as I can obtain my baggage. In the mean time I am sorry to inform you that the second proposition for an armistice was rejected like the first, and a vigorous prosecution of the war appears to be the only honorable alternative left to us. I have the honor to be, &c.

JONATHAN RUSSELL.

HON. JAMES MONROE, &c.

Mr. Russell to Mr. Monroe.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you herewith an account of the conversation alluded to in a postscript to my letter of the 19th September, and which I had not then sufficient time to copy.

I have the honor to be, &c.

HON. JAMES MONROE, &c.

Relations with Great Britain.

[Enclosed in Mr. Russell's letter of November 16.]

Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, September 17, 1812.

SIR: On the 12th instant I had the honor to receive your letter of the 27th of July last. I called immediately at the Foreign Office to prepare Lord Castlereagh, by imparting to him the nature and extent of my instructions, for the communication which it became me to make to him. His Lordship was in the country, and I was obliged to write to him without previously seeing him. I, however, accompanied my official note with a private letter, offering explanation, if required, and soliciting despatch.

I waited until two o'clock, the 16th instant, without hearing from his Lordship, when I was much surprised at receiving a note from Mr. Hamilton, the Under Secretary, indefinitely postponing an official reply. To give more precision to the transaction, I instantly addressed to him an answer, and a little before five o'clock, on the same day, I received an invitation from Lord Castlereagh to meet him at his house that evening at nine o'clock.

I waited on his Lordship at the time appointed, and found him, in company with Mr. Hamilton, at a table loaded with the records of American correspondence, which they appeared to have been examining.

I was courteously received, and, after a conversation of a few minutes, on indifferent subjects, I led the way to the business on which I came, by observing that I had once more been authorized to present the olive branch, and hoped it would not be again rejected.

His Lordship observed, that he had desired the interview to ascertain, before he submitted my communication of the 16th instant to the Prince Regent, the form and nature of the powers under which I acted. To satisfy him at once on both these points, I put into his hands your letter of the 27th July. I the more willingly adopted this mode of procedure, as, besides the confidence which its frankness was calculated to produce, the letter itself would best define my authority and prove the moderation and conciliatory temper of my Government.

His Lordship read it attentively. He then commented at some length both on the shape and substance of my powers. With regard to the former he observed, that all my authority was contained in a letter from the Secretary of State, which, as my diplomatic functions had ceased, appeared but a scanty foundation on which to place the important arrangement I had been instructed to propose. With regard to the extent of my powers, he could not perceive that they essentially differed from those under which I had brought forward the propositions contained in my note of the 24th of August. He considered that to enter with me into the understanding, required as a preliminary to a convention for an armistice, he would be compelled to act on unequal ground, as, from his situation, he must necessarily pledge his Government, when, from the nature of my authority, I could give no similar pledge for mine. He could not, therefore, think of committing the British faith and leaving the American Government free to disregard its engagements. Besides, it did not appear to him that, at the date of my last instructions, the revocation of the Orders in Council on the 23d of June had been received at Washington, and that great hopes were entertained of the favorable effects such intelligence would produce there. The question of impressment, he went on to observe, was attended with difficulties of which neither I nor my Government appeared to be aware. "Indeed," he continued, "there has evidently been much misapprehension on this subject, and an erroneous belief entertained that an arrangement, in regard to it, has been nearer an accomplishment than the facts will warrant. Even our friends in Congress, I mean (observing, perhaps, some alteration in my countenance,) those who were opposed to going to war with us, have been so confident in this mistake, that they have ascribed the failure of such an arrangement solely to the misconduct of the American Government. This error probably originated with Mr. King, for being much esteemed here, and always well received by the persons then in power, he seems to have misconstrued their readiness to listen to his representations and their warm professions of a disposition to remove the complaints of America, in relation to impressment, into a supposed conviction, on their part, of the propriety of adopting the plan which he had proposed. But Lord St. Vincent, whom he might have thought he had brought over to his opinions, appears never for a moment to have ceased to regard all arrangement on the subject to be attended with formidable, if not insurmountable, obstacles. This is obvious from a letter which his Lordship addressed to Sir William Scott at the time." Here Lord Castlereagh read a letter, contained in the records before him, in which Lord St. Vincent states to Sir William Scott the zeal with which Mr. King had assailed him on the subject of impressment, confesses his own perplexity and total incompetency to discover any practical project for the safe discontinuance of that practice, and asks for counsel and advice. "Thus you see," proceeded Lord Castlereagh, "that the confidence of Mr. King on this point was entirely unfounded.

"The extreme difficulty, if not total impracticability, of any satisfactory arrangement for the discontinuance of impressment, is most clearly manifested by the result of the negotiation carried on between Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney and Lords Auckland and Holland. The doctrines of which these noblemen had been the advocates, when in opposition, bound them by all the force of consistency to do everything under their commission for the satisfaction of America, relative to impressment, which the nature of the subject would possibly admit. There were many circumstances on that occasion peculiarly propitious to an amicable arrangement on this point, had such an arrangement been at all attainable. Both parties accordingly appear to have exhausted their ingenuity in attempting to devise expedients satisfactorily to perform the office of impressment; and nothing can more conclusively demonstrate the inherent difficulty of the matter, and the utter impossibility of finding the expedient which they sought, than that all their labors, pursued on that occasion with unexampled diligence, cordiality, and good faith, should have been in vain."

His Lordship now turned to a letter in a volume before him, addressed at the close of the negotiation by these Commissioners to the American Ministers, conceived in the kindest spirit of conciliation, in which they profess the most earnest desire to remove all cause of complaint on the part of America concerning impressment, regret that their endeavors had hitherto been ineffectual, lament the necessity of continuing the practice, and promise to provide as far as possible against the abuse of it.

"If," resumed his Lordship, "such was the result of a negotiation entertained under circumstances so highly favorable, where the powers and the disposition of the parties were limited only by the difficulties of the subject, what reasonable expectation can be encouraged that, in the actual state of things, with your circumscribed and imperfect authority, we can come to a more successful issue? I shall have to proceed in so weighty a concern with the utmost deliberation and circumspection; and it will be necessary for me to consult the great law officers of the Crown. You are not aware of the great sensibility and jealousy of the people of England on this subject; and no Administration could expect to remain in power that should consent to renounce the right of impressment, or to suspend the practice, without the certainty of an arrangement which should obviously be calculated most unequivocally to secure its object. Whether such an arrangement can be devised is extremely doubtful, but it is very certain that you have no sufficient powers for its accomplishment."

Such was the substance, and, in many parts, the language of his Lordship's discourse. To which I replied, that the main object of my powers being to effect a suspension of hostilities, their form could not be material—it was sufficient that they emanated from competent authority, and were distinctly and clearly conferred; that in requiring as a condition to an armistice a clear understanding relative to impressment and other points of controversy between the two countries, it was intended merely to lay the basis of an amicable adjustment, and thereby to diminish the probability of a renewal of hostilities. To come to such an understanding, to be in itself informal, and which expressly left the details of the points which it embraced to be discussed and adjusted by commissioners to be hereafter appointed, was certainly within the instructions which I had received, and I could, of course, thus far pledge my Government for its observance. I did not acknowledge the force of his objection, predicated on the inequality of our respective powers, nor perceive how the British faith would be particularly committed. The faith of both Governments would be equally committed for whatever was done under their respective authority; and although his Lordship might have power to go beyond the armistice and understanding for which I was instructed, yet there was no necessity for doing so; and while we acted within those limits, we stood on equal ground. And were it otherwise, yet, as the promise of the one party would be the sole consideration for the promise of the other, should either fail in the performance of its engagements, the other would necessarily be discharged, and the imputation of bad faith could alone attach to the first delinquent. Nor was I dismayed at the very formidable difficulties with which he had thought proper to array the subject of impressment; and, although willing to acknowledge my inferiority to the American negotiators who had preceded me in the matter, yet I was not disposed, on account of their failure, to shrink from the discharge of a duty imposed on me by my Government. To me, indeed, the whole question appeared much less alarming than his Lordship had described it to be; and that if Mr. King had really been mistaken with regard to the near completion of an adjustment, his Lordship must, on an attention to the whole correspondence at the time, acquit him from the imputation of any excessive want of penetration.

As to the supposed ignorance in America of the revocation of the Orders in Council at the time my instructions were dated, I observed, that if this ignorance did in fact exist, yet, from certain expressions in those instructions, an expectation of such a measure seems to have been confidently entertained, and the Orders in Council appeared no longer to form an obstacle to a reconciliation. However this might be, it ought not to be supposed that the American Government would be ready to abandon one main point for which it contended, merely because it had obtained another, which was generally considered to be of minor importance, and to submit to the continuance of impressment on account of the discontinuance of the Orders in Council. At any rate, having authorized me to propose terms of accommodation here, it would probably wait for information concerning the manner in which they had been received, before it would consent to more unfavorable conditions. In the mean time, the war would be prosecuted, and might produce new obstacles to a pacific arrangement. I was happy to learn that the failure of a former negotiation concerning impressment could not be ascribed to a want of sincerity and moderation in the American Government, and I hoped the mode now suggested for securing to Great Britain her own seamen might remove the difficulties which had hitherto embarrassed this question. If the people of England were so jealous and sensitive with regard to the exercise of this harsh practice, what ought to be the feelings of the people of America, who were the victims of it? In the United States this practice of impressment was considered as bearing a strong resemblance to the slave trade; aggravated, indeed, in some of its features, as the negro was purchased, already bereft of his liberty, and his slavery and exile were at least mitigated by his exemption from danger, by the interested forbearance of his task-master, and the consciousness that, if he could no longer associate with those who were dear to him, he was not compelled to do them injury; while the American citizen is torn, without price, at once, from all the blessings of freedom, and all the charities of social life, subjected to military law, exposed to incessant perils, and forced at times to hazard his life in despoiling or destroying his kindred and countrymen. It was matter of astonishment that, while Great Britain discovered such zeal for the abolition of the traffic in the barbarous and unbelieving natives of Africa, as to endeavor to force it on her reluctant allies, she could so obstinately adhere to the practice of impressing American citizens, whose civilization, religion, and blood, so obviously demanded a more favorable distinction.

I next pointed out to his Lordship the difference between the propositions which I now submitted and those contained in my note of the 24th of August. That although the object of both was essentially the same, there was great diversity in the manner of obtaining it. The discontinuance of the practice of impressment, which was before required to be immediate, and to constitute a formal preliminary to an armistice, was now deferred, to commence contemporaneously with the operation of the law of the United States prohibiting the employment of British seamen, and was consigned, with the other conditions, to a separate and informal arrangement. In this way it was, no doubt, intended, by respecting the feelings of the British Government, to obviate any objection which might have been the mere suggestions of its pride.

I finally offered, in order to answer at once all the observations and inquiries of Lord Castlereagh, that the proposed understanding should be expressed in the most general terms; that the laws, to take effect on the discontinuance of the practice of impressment, should prohibit the employment of the native subjects or citizens of the one State, excepting such only as had already been naturalized, on board the private or public ships of the other; thus removing any objection that might have been raised with regard to the future effect of naturalization, or the formal renunciation of any pretended right. With regard to blockades I proposed to follow the same course, and only to agree that none should be instituted by either party which were not conformable to the acknowledged laws of nations, leaving the definition of such blockade, and all other details, to be settled by the commissioners in the definitive treaty.

I was disappointed and grieved to find that these propositions, moderate and liberal as they were, should be treated in a manner which forbids me to expect their acceptance. I was even asked by Mr. Hamilton, if the United States would deliver up the native British seamen who might be naturalized in America. Although shocked at this demand, I mildly replied that such a procedure would be disgraceful to America, without being useful to Great Britain; that the habits of seamen were so peculiarly unaccommodating, that no one would patiently go through the long probation required by law, to become a citizen of a country where he could not pursue his professional occupations; and that not to employ him in this way would be virtually to surrender him to Great Britain.

I was disposed to believe, however, that a reciprocal arrangement might be made for giving up deserters from public vessels.

Here, perhaps, I owe an apology to my Government for having, without its precise commands, hazarded the overture abovementioned, relative to British subjects who may hereafter become citizens of the United States. In taking this step, however, I persuaded myself that I did not trespass against the spirit of the instructions which I had received; and, had the proposition been accepted, I should not have been without all hope that it would have been approved by the President, as its prospective operation would have prevented injustice, and its reciprocity disgrace. Should I, however, urged by too great a zeal to produce an accommodation, have mistaken herein the intentions of the President, I still should have derived some consolation from reflecting that this proposition, thus frankly and explicitly made, afforded an opportunity of satisfactorily testing the disposition of this Government, and might be useful in removing much misconception and error. The refusal, indeed, of this proposition sufficiently explains the view with which I was assailed with the ostentatious parade of the abortive negotiations relative to impressment; the exaggeration of its pretended difficulties; the artificial solemnity given to its character; the affected sensibility to the popular sentiment concerning it; and the fastidious exceptions taken to my powers; and proves most unequivocally the predetermination of the British Government to reject, at this time, every overture for the discontinuance of this degrading practice.

Most unfeignedly desiring to suspend the existing hostilities between the two States, with a reasonable prospect of finally terminating them in a manner honorable to both, I perhaps pressed with too much earnestness the adoption of the arrangement which I was instructed to propose; for Lord Castlereagh once observed, somewhat loftily, that if the American Government was so anxious to get rid of the war, it would have an opportunity of doing so on learning the revocation of the Orders in Council. I felt constrained on this occasion to assure His Lordship, that the anxiety of the American Government to get rid of the war was only a proof of the sincerity with which it had constantly sought to avoid it; but that no event had occurred, or was apprehended, to increase this anxiety. His Lordship, correcting his manner, rejoined, that it was not his intention to say anything offensive, but merely to suggest, that if the American Government sincerely wished for a restoration of the friendly relations between the two countries, it would consider the revocation of the Orders in Council as affording a fair occasion for the attainment of that object. After a pause of a few minutes, he added, that if the United States did not avail themselves of this occasion, not only to put an end to the war which they had declared, but to perform the conditions on which those orders were revoked, the orders would, of course, revive. I could not forbear to remind his Lordship, that when I took this view of the subject, in my note of the 24th of August, he found it to be incorrect; but I hoped that now I was so fortunate as to agree with him on this point, some provision would be made, in case the terms proposed for an armistice should be accepted, to prevent the revival of those edicts. His Lordship attempted to explain, but I could not distinctly seize his meaning.

The conversation ended with an assurance on the part of his Lordship that he would, with as little delay as possible, communicate officially to me the decision of the Prince Regent; and I took my leave, forbidden to hope that, while the present councils and the present opinion of the American people prevailed here, this decision will be favorable.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JONA. RUSSELL.

His Excellency JAMES MONROE, &c.

Admiral Warren to the Secretary of State.

HALIFAX, N. S., Sept. 30, 1812.

SIR: The departure of Mr. Foster from America has devolved upon me the charge of making known to you, for the information of the Government of the United States, the sentiments entertained by His Royal Highness the Prince Regent upon the existing relations of the two countries.

You will observe, from the enclosed copy of an Order in Council, bearing date the 23d of June, 1812, that the Orders in Council of the 7th of January, 1807, and the 26th of April, 1809, ceased to exist nearly at the same time that the Government of the United States declared war against His Majesty.

Immediately on the receipt of this declaration in London, the Order in Council, of which a copy is herewith enclosed to you, was issued, on the 31st day of July, for the embargo and detention of all American ships.

Under these circumstances, I am commanded to propose to your Government the immediate cessation of hostilities between the two countries, and I shall be most happy to be the instrument of bringing about a reconciliation so interesting and beneficial to America and Great Britain.

I, therefore, propose to you that the Government of the United States of America shall instantly recall their letters of marque and reprisal against British ships, together with all orders and instructions for any acts of hostility whatever against the territories of His Majesty or the persons or property of his subjects; with the understanding that, immediately on my receiving from you an official assurance to that effect, I shall instruct all the officers under my command to desist from corresponding measures of war against the ships and property of the United States, and that I shall transmit, without delay, corresponding intelligence to the several parts of the world, where hostilities may have commenced, the British commanders in which will be required to discontinue hostilities from the receipt of such notice.

Should the American Government accede to the above proposal for terminating hostilities, I am authorized to arrange with you as to the revocation of the laws which interdict the commerce and ships of war of Great Britain from the harbors and waters of the United States; in default of which revocation, within such reasonable periods as may be agreed upon, you will observe, by the order of the 23d of June, the Orders in Council of January, 1807, and April 1809, are to be revived.

The officer who conveys this letter to the American coast has received my orders to put to sea immediately upon the delivery of this despatch to the competent authority; and I earnestly recommend that no time may be lost in communicating to me the decision of your Government, persuaded, as I feel, that it cannot but be of a nature to lead to a speedy termination of the present differences.

The flag of truce, which you may charge with your reply, will find one of my cruisers at Sandy Hook ten days after the landing of this despatch, which I have directed to call there with a flag of truce for that purpose.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN BORLASE WARREN,

Admiral of the Blue, &c.

The Secretary of State to Admiral Warren.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Oct. 27, 1812.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 30th ultimo, and to submit it to the consideration of the President.

It appears that you are authorized to propose a cessation of hostilities between the United States and Great Britain, on the ground of the repeal of the Orders in Council, and in case the proposition is acceded to, to take measures, in concert with this Government, to carry it into complete effect on both sides.

You state, also, that you have it in charge, in that event, to enter into an arrangement with the Government of the United States for the repeal of the laws which interdict the ships of war and the commerce of Great Britain from the harbors and waters of the United States; and you intimate that, if the proposition is not acceded to, the Orders in Council, repealed conditionally by that of the 23d June last, will be revived against the commerce of the United States.

I am instructed to inform you that it will be very satisfactory to the President to meet the British Government in such arrangements as may terminate, without delay, the hostilities which now exist between the United States and Great Britain, on conditions honorable to both nations

At the moment of the declaration of war the President gave a signal proof of the attachment of the United States to peace. Instructions were given, at that early period, to the late Chargé des Affaires of the United States at London to propose to the British Government an armistice, on conditions which, it was presumed, would have been satisfactory. It has been seen with regret that the proposition made by Mr. Russell, particularly in regard to the important interest of impressment, was rejected, and that none was offered through that channel as a basis on which hostilities might cease.

As your Government has authorized you to propose a cessation of hostilities, and is doubtless aware of the important and salutary effect which a satisfactory adjustment of this difference cannot fail to have on the future relations between the two countries, I indulge the hope that it has ere this given you full power for the purpose. Experience has evinced that no peace can be durable unless this object is provided for. It is presumed, therefore, that it is equally the interest of both countries to adjust it at this time.

Without further discussing questions of right, the President is desirous to provide a remedy for the evils complained of on both sides. The claim of the British Government is to take from the merchant vessels of other countries, British subjects. In the practice, the commanders of British ships of war often take from the merchant vessels of the United States American citizens. If the United States prohibit the employment of British subjects in their service, and enforce the prohibition by suitable regulations and penalties, the motive for the practice is taken away. It is in this mode that the President is willing to accommodate this important controversy with the British Government, and it cannot be conceived on what ground the arrangement can be refused.

A suspension of the practice of impressment, pending the armistice, seems to be a necessary consequence. It cannot be presumed, while the parties are engaged in a negotiation to adjust amicably this important difference, that the United States would admit the right, or acquiesce in the practice of the opposite party, or that Great Britain would be unwilling to restrain her cruisers from a practice which would have the strongest tendency to defeat the negotiation. It is presumable that both parties would enter into the negotiation with a sincere desire to give it effect. For this purpose it is necessary that a clear and distinct understanding be first obtained between them, of the accommodation which each is prepared to make. If the British Government is willing to suspend the practice of impressment from American vessels, on consideration that the United States will exclude British seamen from their service, the regulations by which this compromise should be carried into effect would be solely the object of negotiation. The armistice would be of a short duration: if the parties agreed, peace would be the result; if the negotiation failed, each would be restored to its former state and to all its pretensions by recurring to war.

Lord Castlereagh, in his note to Mr. Russell, seems to have supposed that, had the British Government accepted the proposition made to it, Great Britain would have suspended immediately the exercise of a right, on the mere assurance of this Government that a law would be afterwards passed to prohibit the employment of British seamen in the service of the United States, and that Great Britain would have no agency in the regulations to give effect to that prohibition. Such an idea was not in the contemplation of this Government, nor is it to be reasonably inferred from Mr. Russell's note. Lest, however, by possibility such an inference might be drawn from the instructions to Mr. Russell, and anxious that there should be no misunderstanding in the case, subsequent instructions were given to Mr. Russell, with a view to obviate every objection of the kind alluded to. As they bear date on the 27th of July, and were forwarded by the British packet Althea, it is more than probable that they may have been received and acted on.

I am happy to explain to you thus fully the view of my Government on this important subject. The President desires that the war which exists between our countries should be terminated on such conditions as may secure a solid and durable peace. To accomplish this great object it is necessary that the interest of impressment be satisfactorily arranged. He is willing that Great Britain should be secured against the evils of which she complains. He seeks, on the other hand, that the citizens of the United States should be protected against a practice, which, while it degrades the nation, deprives them of their rights as freemen, takes them by force from their families and their country into a foreign service, to fight the battles of a foreign Power, perhaps against their own kindred and country.

I abstain from entering, in this communication, into other grounds of difference. The Orders in Council having been repealed, with a reservation not impairing a corresponding right on the part of the United States, and no illegal blockades revived or instituted in their stead, and an understanding being obtained on the subject of impressment in the mode herein proposed, the President is willing to agree to a cessation of hostilities, with a view to arrange by treaty, in a more distinct and ample manner, and to the satisfaction of both parties, every other subject of controversy.

I will only add that, if there be no objection to an accommodation of the difference relating to impressment in the mode proposed, other than the suspension of the British claim to impressment during the armistice, there can be none to proceeding without the armistice to an immediate discussion and arrangement of an article on that subject. This great question being satisfactorily adjusted, the way will be open for an armistice, or any other course leading most conveniently and expeditiously to a general pacification.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

SIR J. B. WARREN.

Relations with Denmark.

DENMARK.

Mr. Erving to the Secretary of State, enclosing a correspondence with the Danish Minister of Foreign Affairs.

No. 16.—Mr. Erving to Mr. Monroe.

COPENHAGEN, April 12, 1812.

SIR: My last despatch upon general business was No. 12. I therein mentioned the case of the "Jane Maria," which had been cut out of the port of Swinemunde by a French privateer. Subsequent to the date of that despatch the captain arrived, but in the intermediate time, a Frenchman had been put on board as a guard, and this became an obstacle to her departure. My correspondence with Mr. de Rosenkrantz on this affair is herewith submitted, viz: No. 1, December 10; No. 2, January 11; No. 3, January 15; No. 4, January 15; No. 5, January 16, of the enclosures. I understand that one of the crew of the "Jane Maria" has appeared before a notary, and sworn that, whilst the vessel lay at Swinemunde she had communication with the English, and was to have gone under their convoy. Should this declaration prove to be correct, yet I presume that she cannot therefore be condemned. The French Minister does not, however, find himself authorized to release her, but he momentarily expects orders from his Government on the subject. The papers of the vessel are in my possession.

In my despatch No. 10, I mentioned that of the cases which were pending on my arrival in Copenhagen, the "Minerva Smith," Mann, only remained to be adjudged, and that I had sought to delay it for the purpose of procuring, and in the hope of introducing before the tribunal some further evidence. A part of the evidence to which I referred was soon afterwards received from England, and laid before the Minister of State, in a note of December 13; a copy (No. 6) is enclosed, as it serves to explain the peculiar difficulties under which this, a property of very great value, was placed. No change having been produced by this representation in the opinion of the High Court, I obtained that the case should be laid before the Danish Chancery; and the report of that body not being sufficiently full and satisfactory, the case was transferred to the Sleswic Holstein Chancery, (on the king's own suggestion,) as Kiel, where the vessel was taken, being within the jurisdiction of that Chancery, the affair was not properly cognizable by the Danish Chancery. These various operations consumed a great deal of time; but finally towards the latter end of February the Sleswic Holstein Chancery produced a very laborious and voluminous report in favor of the case, pursuant to which His Majesty ordered the High Court to pass sentence of acquittal.

With my aforementioned despatch, No. 10, was transmitted copy of a note to Mr. de Rosenkrantz, (of September 23) respecting the then pending cases generally. Still further to promote the object of it I again addressed him on November 3. and in the progress of the business perceiving that the High Court had lost nothing of its disposition to condemn, and had actually determined to sacrifice one of the clearest cases in the whole list, (the "Brutus") on the 13th December, I thought it necessary to require that its proceedings should be arrested, and its opinions submitted to the King through his Chancery; (those two notes are Nos. 7 and 8 of the enclosed;) the necessary order was immediately given, and thus two or three cases were saved from condemnation. But though the report of the Chancery on the case of the "Brutus" was favorable, that vessel was finally condemned; the particular circumstances of her case will be seen in my note to Mr. de Rosenkrantz of April 10th, and the sentence of the tribunal (Nos. 7 B and 8 B) of the enclosed papers.

At the date of said despatch No. 10, there were ten cases depending, exclusive of French captures, and inclusive of the "Hannah" and "Two Generals," double captures, as appears by the list which was therewith transmitted. In despatch No. 11, I mentioned the release of the "Horace" and "Augustus," two of the list, so that there were at that time only six cases of simple captures depending. I have now the satisfaction of informing you that the whole of these have been acquitted, the "Brutus" as above mentioned only excepted. The "Hannah" and "Two Generals," must, I fear, be determined in Paris. The French Government has proposed to the Danish, that without reference to these questions of jurisdiction, which have always been found so difficult to arrange to the satisfaction of all parties, the simple rule shall be adopted of determining the question of prize in the tribunals of the country to which the captor may belong, in all cases where he may possess himself of the captured vessel's papers. This proposition has not been, nor do I believe that it will be, acceded to by the Danish Government; yet, sir, you will readily perceive that if the French Government should persist, there can be very little expectation of our obtaining from this, the release of a vessel which may have been condemned by the Council of Prizes. There is even some reason to apprehend that it will so persist, since the French Consul has now received orders from the Minister of Marine to transmit to Paris the papers of the ship "Olive Branch," which, as mentioned in my despatch No. 12, was seized under the very guns of the fort of Nyborg; and this case is peculiarly strong, since the "Olive Branch" had his Danish Majesty's license on board. But I must in this place also mention that my correspondence with Mr. Desaugiers (lately French Chargé d'Affaires here) which was submitted to you with despatch No. 8, having been also submitted to his Government, he is now answered by the Duke of Bassano, in terms strongly representing the excesses of the corsairs in general, and particularly reproving their practice of hoisting the French flag on board the vessels captured, of which he strictly forbids the recurrence.

The "Rachel," "Rover," and "Packet," three vessels (on the pending lists heretofore transmitted) which have been released, being partly laden with "colonial produce," were, pursuant to the established regulations with regard to vessels so laden, ordered to quit the port and to proceed on their voyages; the French privateers were then watching for and would infallibly have captured them on their departure. The copies herewith enclosed, viz: my notes to Mr. de Rosenkrantz of November 27, 28, and 29, (Nos. 9, 10, and 11,) Mr. de Rosenkrantz's unofficial note of December 1st, (No. 12,) my reply of same date (No. 13,) Mr. de Rosenkrantz's official note of December 2d, (No. 14,) relate to this matter, which you will be pleased to observe was very satisfactorily settled.

The last list of vessels which had passed this way was dated October 9: since then a few scattered vessels have presented themselves, viz:

The "Dolphin," Latham, "America," Briggs, from Petersburg to the United States, passed without interruption.

"Ann," How, arrived safely at Christiansand. "Sally," Brown, turned away from Amsterdam by the English, continued her voyage towards this place, and was wrecked on the coast of Jutland.

"Adriana," Abrahams, of Baltimore, belonging to Smith and Co., with a cargo of hides, convoyed by the Danes from Gottenburg to Copenhagen, (having Danish license,) cargo sold in Copenhagen and reconvoyed to Elsinæur.

"Columbia," Jennison, (owners unknown,) from St. Ubes, with salt, much under the same circumstances.

"Swanwick," Clark, with a cargo of tobacco, property of Pratt and Kintzing of Philadelphia, ditto.

"Asia," Ormsby, (Brown and Ives of Providence,) with three thousand five hundred chests of tea, arrived at Gottenburg some months since, in her voyage from thence to Copenhagen, captured by a Danish privateer, but immediately released, having the King's permission to come hither and sell.

This completes the account of our trade for the last year as far as particulars have come to my knowledge. In my despatch No. 12, I transmitted certain statements relating to that trade; triplicates of those statements were sent with No. 14, with the addition of a printed tariff of the duties payable on all merchandise passing through the Sound: a duplicate of the tariff is herewith enclosed. I have lately seen a printed statement of our exports from Petersburg during the last year, made by a commercial house of that place. It agrees in general with the document No. 3, enclosed in my aforesaid despatch. It is however more complete as to the number of vessels, including all those which went up through the Belt, and gives a total of 127, (noting that in 1810 the total was only 100 only,) but states that 29 of the 127 were bound to European ports, having as part of their cargoes 23,615 poods of flax! Most of these 29 probably returned through the Belt; such as passed the Sound must have had false clearances. In the course of judicial investigations the Danes have already discovered, as is supposed, sufficient grounds for distrusting the character of our commerce: such printed information from what is called a "respectable American house" at Petersburg, recommending itself to its correspondents by this species of industry, cannot fail to augment that distrust.

All the old and new cases being now disposed of, I herewith enclose a table (No. 19) bringing the whole of them and the proceedings which have been had on them into one view. I beg you, sir, to observe, that of thirty-eight cases of Danish captures on the list of 1811, there have been only three appeals of the captors against the sentences of acquittal given by the inferior tribunal, so little have been their expectations of procuring final condemnations, and that excepting the three English and English license cases, ("President," "Neptune," and "Aurora,") there has been but one final condemnation, viz. the "Brutus."

I hope that upon the whole this view will be satisfactory to the President. Mr. de Rosenkrantz told me in an early interview that the administration of justice was as impartial and as prompt here as in any other country; he added (referring to the disposition of the King) that in future we should have nothing to complain of. How far his assertion was correct, or his promise has been complied with, I will not presume to determine; but I must do that Minister the justice to say, that he spoke with perfect sincerity, and under impressions the most just and friendly, and to believe that where the results fall short of our expectations, it has not been from any failure of those dispositions.

I have taken occasion in former despatches to mention, and in frequent representations to Mr. de Rosenkrantz, to remonstrate against the practices of fining and taxing vessels acquitted in the tribunals. These practices, nearly indiscriminate as they are, I found to be quite unreasonable, in their application frequently most unjust; yet after all, for the amount of the exactions, they are not oppressive, perhaps had they been abolished altogether we might not have had quite so many vessels captured; there would certainly have been more appeals and might have been more condemnations. The lists herewith enclosed (papers marked No. 20) show the sums which the cases have been charged under the several heads of costs, fines, and two per mille tax in the tribunal of Copenhagen: the two per mille goes to the King's coffers; the fine goes to the captor for his trouble in capturing, where he is supposed to have had just grounds of suspicion; the court expenses are invariably forty rix dollars (equal to five and a half dollars) in each case. There are no other expenses but advocate's fees; here, as in all countries, the amount of these is settled by agreement between the counsel and client; in the inferior tribunal no advocate is employed.

The situation of the masters of our vessels condemned here was formerly made the more distressing by the prosecutions to which they were exposed on account of wages due to their sailors, the laws here compelling them to provide for their crews: these laws had been executed with great rigor, and large sums had been frequently adjudged to be paid by masters who could scarcely find credit for their own subsistence. The Consul had, by frequent representation, endeavored to remedy this evil, but without success. When I came to act in this matter I was answered, that if the master deceived the men by engaging them in a vessel which was not in fact American, as he pretended, it was but just that he should pay them, his sufferings then were chargeable only to his own misconduct: however, I finally obtained that it should be laid before the Chancery; that tribunal, by a report of January 11, adopted by His Majesty, decreed that "no lawsuit regarding the wages due to North American mariners from their captains shall be admitted before the tribunals." I did not succeed in obtaining payment for men out of the condemned vessel, but on this point thought it not prudent to go far.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Mr. MONROE, Secretary of State.

No. 7—B.

COPENHAGEN, April 10, 1812.

SIR: In one of the first interviews which I had with your Excellency, you assured me, on the part of His Majesty, "that, for the future, the United States, should have nothing to complain of;" fully relying then on the good faith and friendly sentiment in which this declaration was made, to those favorable dispositions of His Majesty I have addressed all my subsequent reclamations; and the reports which I have, from time to time, submitted to my Government, have corresponded to the harmony thus established in our proceedings. Judge then, sir, with what extreme concern and regret I now find myself under the necessity of protesting and reclaiming against a sentence of the High Court of Admiralty, grounded on the King's own decision, against the American ship Brutus and her cargo, the genuine property of American citizens; in favor of which I have been for several months negotiating with your Excellency; respecting which I have furnished documentary evidence of great importance, and the circumstances of which I was so fully authorized to consider as peculiarly favorable. Judge, sir, of the concern with which I see, in the sentence now given, that the reclamation which I have made, in this case, has been passed over; the documents which I have furnished have been set aside; and that grounds for condemnation have been assumed, wholly insufficient, and, in part, even contrary to facts as established by these documents. I am perfectly certain that His Majesty does not believe that I am capable of attempting to support any cause but the just cause of a genuine American citizen; nor shall I readily abandon the conviction that he is still actuated by the just and friendly dispositions which motivated the declaration above cited; hence I must presume that the misrepresentations which have been made to him, and the influence which has been produced in his mind, on the present occasion, are of a very extraordinary character; this conclusion is the more unavoidable since, certainly, I have long since succeeded in convincing your Excellency, who has such high and indisputable title to the entire confidence of His Majesty, that the cause of the Brutus is a just one, nor can I, in this view, fail to notice that the opinion of the Chancery was in its favor, that there was a division of opinion amongst the members of the High Court, and that the vessel was fully acquitted by the Inferior Court in Norway. By my note of December 13, 1811, I furnished to your Excellency proofs that the captor's appeal from that sentence had been made only because the American captain (Fenno) refused to pay six thousand rix dollars by way of compromise; and this complaint having been laid, by His Majesty's order before, and having been duly investigated by the Chancery, was deemed to be so well founded and so reasonable, that a new and severe law upon that subject was judged to be expedient. This is, in fine, the only case which has come before the King, wherein he has decided unfavorably against a prior sentence of acquittal by one of his tribunals; and it is the only case, as far as I know, wherein a difference of opinion amongst the members of the High Court existing, he has not decided in favor of the claimant. To the just and liberal principles which actuated His Majesty on such occasions, in this case was added that which, even in default of other favorable circumstances, it was to be supposed, could not but determine him to release the vessel; the offer on the part of the captors, and the refusal on the part of the American captain, to compromise; for what stronger presumption can be furnished against the justice of the captors' claim than their offer to compromise it for a small sum, or what more favorable to a belief in the American captain's innocence than his refusal to pay that sum?

By the copy of the sentence, which I have herewith the honor to enclose, your Excellency will perceive that the tribunal has commenced by an assertion that Captain Fenno, during his detention, attempted to escape, and that upon this supposed attempt are grounded its "suspicious;" but in the note which I addressed to you on the 4th of January I enclosed a document which proved most incontestably that no such attempt was made, and that the assertions of the captors, in this respect, were altogether false: how astonishing, then, that the High Court should venture to place its sentence on such ground. The other motive mentioned in the sentence, considered as objections to the neutrality of this ship and cargo, are scarcely entitled to comment. What, if different handwritings are found in a sea-letter, which issued from a department where many clerks are employed? What, if "omissions" or "errors" in such or other documents? I must observe, however, that the sea-letter in question was submitted to the examination of the American Consul, Mr. Saabye; and that he gave a formal certificate that the paper was genuine, which certificate was submitted to the Court by the claimant's counsel. As to the certificates of the French Consul, the American captains must receive them as the Consuls may please to give them, with whatever errors or absurdities they may contain; but it is worthy of particular observation, that the objection made, in this case, to the French Consul's certificate, originated in the tribunal itself. The captor did not deem that certificate to be of any importance; no objection was taken to it in any of the prior proceedings; the counsel of the American captain, of course, had not any opportunity of defending his client on that head.

We herein see an innovation on judicial proceedings, of a character entirely novel—the court placing itself in the situation of the accusing party, and condemning the property in litigation, on grounds not assumed by the captor. The only documents of real importance to be considered, are—1. The register. Is it, or is it not, a genuine document, proving the vessel to be the property of the persons therein named? 2. The clearance. Did the vessel, or did it not, come from New Orleans, as the captain pretends? 3. The bills of lading and invoice. Do they, or do they not, describe the cargo actually on board? These points, satisfactorily established, what else can be wanting, where the intention is to do justice to the captured, and to respect the neutral rights of the country to which he belongs? I can assure your Excellency, in fine, that of all the decisions which have taken place since my arrival here the one now in question is the most extraordinary. If, amongst all the just cases in which I have interfered, there was one which appeared to me to stand most clear from difficulties of all kinds, it was this of the Brutus;—and I was still more gratified in the confidence which I have indulged, that the vessel would be acquitted, because it was the last remaining on the list of captures which have occurred since my arrival here. What may be the merits of the captors, in the view of the King, I will not presume to conjecture; but I am sure that they cannot have any which can interfere with a due application of His Majesty's just principles, or any in relation to this case which are not founded on misrepresentation. I must, therefore, earnestly request that your Excellency will lay this representation before him; and I do confide, that, when His Majesty sees what I have stated, and is pleased to consider the enclosed sentence of his tribunal, he will think proper to reverse it, and to order the restitution of the property thus condemned. I have, &c.

No. 8, B.—Translation from the Danish.

Copy of the sentence pronounced by the High Court of Admiralty, in the case No. 164.

Captain JOHN FENNO, vs. J. T. SAMUELSEN, et al.

As Captain Fenno's conduct during the detention in endeavoring to escape the privateers must render him suspicious, and therefore authorize the capture, so his later conduct affords a grounded reason for calling his neutrality into question.

Besides, in the very documents by which Captain Fenno wants to prove the nationality of the vessel, and the legality of the voyage, there are found such deficiencies, that the precepts contained in the prize act, in this respect, cannot be looked upon as being accomplished.

1. The sea-letter is not in the usual order, as partly it is not filled out, and partly an elucidation is wanting in several places respecting the domicile and burden of the vessel. The only place where the burden is mentioned, is perceptibly added by a strange hand. Thus, the sea-letter can only be considered as a blank, arranged per males artes for the use of the vessel.

2. The attest found on this certificate of the cargo, under the name of the French Consul, must be false. Though the French Consuls might still, in the year 1811, have made use of the insignia of the French Republic, still it can no wise be admitted that words without meaning should have been inserted in their seals, which words are even put in a reversed manner. Thus, this seal must be counterfeited, by which no caution or accuracy has been observed, in order to imitate the true one. But, if the seal be considered as false, it also follows from thence, that the same must hold good with respect to the attest, the genuineness of which the seal is to confirm. And from this it further results, in pursuance of the prize act, and His Majesty's resolution communicated the 23d October, 1810, to this high court, that such a false attest vitiates the authenticity of all the other documents, even if they are in apparent order:

Decreed—

The ship Brutus, John Fenno, master, together with her cargo, litigated in this case, are hereby adjudged to Jens Tobias Samuelsen, and other privateer captains, as a good prize. The court charges of the prize court shall be paid out of the ship and cargo. For the rest, the costs of the process are annulled.

COPENHAGEN, April 10, 1812.

No. 17.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Monroc, Secretary of State.

COPENHAGEN, April 12, 1812.

SIR: With my despatch, No. 10, was submitted to you a copy of the reclamation, dated November 4, which I thought it my duty to make against the sentences of condemnation passed by the Danish tribunals, in the years 1809 and 1810, on American ships and cargoes. Mr. de Rosen-

krantz was prevented at first by ill health, and afterwards for a long time by pressure of various business (as I understood) from laying it before the King; in the meantime he continually discouraged any expectation that His Majesty would accede to the propositions which it contains, persisting in his declaration to me on my first arrival here, that there was no remedy for the past. Finding that in the usual course of business it was necessary for the Minister to inform himself fully and particularly as to the contents of the note, so as to submit it to the King by abstract only, I thought that I might at once expedite my object, and add to the probability of success in it, by having the note translated into the Danish language; I sent such a translation to the Minister, on the 22d of January, requesting (by No. 1 of the enclosures) that the whole might be laid before the King. This was done on the 14th of February, and on the same day the Minister addressed to me the note, No. 2, relating to Danish claims on our Government, to which I answered, on the 17th of February, as by No. 3, and on the 9th instant I finally received the Minister's reply to my reclamation of November 4, (No. 4 of the enclosures.)

All my former communications, sir, have prepaired you for this result, and the most extraordinary delay of the King in announcing it, though so far creditable to him, inasmuch as it denotes the reluctance with which he has come to a conclusion which he cannot conscientiously approve of, and which he has not found any admissible pleas to support or to countenance, yet has also afforded me the means of ascertaining that no favorable change of this determination is to be hoped for.

All the business which my appointment had in view being now completed, and as there is not, as far as I know, one American vessel actually under detention (by Danish capture) in any port of this Kingdom; after answering the Minister of State's note in suitable terms, I propose, pursuant to my instructions, to take leave and depart for Paris. I wrote yesterday to Mr. Barlow for passports, and as soon as they arrive, which may be about the commencement of next month, I shall be entirely ready to make use of them. In the meantime, I send home with this, and other despatches, my Secretary, Mr. Lewis, whose fidelity, industry, and zeal in the public service, I so entirely approve of, that I cannot but recommend him to your patronage and protection. Previous to my departure I propose, as I have before mentioned to you, to present Mr. Forbes in the quality of "agent" to the Minister of State, and to the other departments of Government here, and I doubt not but that if any of our vessels should hereafter be captured by Danish cruisers, he will be able to afford them every assistance of which their cases may be susceptible, and that his respectability of character and his other qualifications will procure due attention to his official representations. I hope also that on my return to Paris I may be able to assist Mr. Barlow in obtaining a favorable adjustment of the questions which have arisen out of the French captures in this quarter.

It seems to be scarcely probable, even if we should not be at war with England, that any of our vessels which may have left the United States for Russia will, if they touch at Gottenburg for information, proceed on their voyages; for either the Emperor of France will occupy the Russian ports, or the Emperor of Russia will submit to his terms; in either of which cases those ports will be rigorously closed against "colonial produce." If the Emperor of Russia should successfully resist, then his country will be inundated with whatever we can supply by the commerce of England; in this last case it is not to be supposed that the English will take any neutral vessels under their convoy; in the two former cases the neutral will not have any motive for joining convoy: on the other hand, the French cruisers will certainly intercept every vessel not under convoy, which may enter the Baltic with colonial produce; and it is equally certain that such cruisers will be sufficiently numerous; for, independent of the privateers properly French, the Danes have found so little encouragement for privateering during the last twelve months, that many of them are reduced to the necessity of seeking French commissions.

Mr. Lewis will carry with him the original of my despatch, No. 10, which encloses authentic copies of the sentences therein referred to; in these, sir, you will notice more particularly the extraordinary principles and offensive doctrines on which the tribunals have founded their decisions; and in case our country should still continue in peace, Government, having the whole matter before it, will be able to give our commerce such direction, and to place it under such regulations as may best comport with its future security.

With the most perfect respect and consideration, I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant.

COPENHAGEN, January 22, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to enclose a translation into the Danish language of my note to your Excellency of November 4, and of the statement thereto annexed. These I have caused to be prepared with particular care, trusting that you will be pleased to lay them in their entire form before His Majesty.

I cannot but take this occasion of renewing to your Excellency the expression of my earnest desire that you would enable me to transmit to my Government His Majesty's resolutions on the subject; nor of my anxiety that those resolutions, marked by the enlightened and friendly policy which I have anticipated in my reports to my Government, may correspond to the just expectations of the United States, and cement that harmony and good understanding between the two countries, which ought always to subsist.

MR. DE ROSENKRANTZ, &c.

No. 2.

[TRANSLATION.]

COPENHAGEN, February 14, 1812.

The Danish brig Henrick, Captain Scheel, departed from Cape François in 1799, was captured in the month of October, of the said year, by a French privateer, and recaptured a few days after by the United States' ship Pickering, which took her into the island of St. Christopher's, where she was condemned on the ground of being recaptured, whereby the owner only obtained about one-eighth part of the value of the vessel and cargo.

The American Government ought to be held responsible for this measure, having by their instructions of March 12, 1799, authorized her armed vessels to recapture all prizes taken by the French privateers. The sentence of condemnation, pronounced, appears also, to contain an inadmissible application of the American laws, which do not relate to the recapture of neutral vessels. The two accompanying printed documents prove that Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State of the United States, recognised the validity of the claim, and recommended the interest of the claimant to Congress. The owner, however, having been frustrated in his attempt to obtain the compensation due to him, has been obliged to institute a suit against the officers who recaptured his vessel, of which he is still waiting the issue.

A similar claim was preferred by the owner of the ship Mercator, captured in 1800, by Lieutenant Maley, commander of the United States' vessel Experiment, afterwards taken by a British cruiser, which carried her to Jamaica, where she was declared a good prize.

It is shown by the annexed printed report that damage to the amount of $33,864 has been awarded to the owner in this case; but he has not yet been able to obtain payment.

In presenting these claims to the notice of Mr. Erving, the special Minister of the United States of America, the undersigned Minister of State, and Chief of the Department of Foreign Affairs, flatters himself, that he will lay them before his Government, and endeavor to obtain for the parties interested that indemnity which the justice of their claims so evidently calls for, but which the intervention of His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires has not, to the present period, been able to accomplish.

The undersigned, in praying Mr. Erving to have the goodness to return him the enclosures, avails himself of the opportunity of renewing the continued assurance of his high consideration.

COPENHAGEN, Feb. 17, 1812.

SIR: I have received your Excellency's note of the 14th instant, relating to two claims of Danish subjects on the Government of the United States. I am uninstructed as to those claims, otherwise than by that note, and by the documents which it enclosed. In these I perceive, with great satisfaction, that during a war of two years between the United States and France, at a time when the Danish commerce was in activity, and the Western ocean was covered with American cruisers, the causes of complaint afforded to this country were confined to these cases; one of them a mere question as to the amount of salvage exacted on a recapture, and both of them grounded on the errors or misintelligence of officers employed on foreign stations; that these reclamations do not involve any misconduct of American tribunals, any violation of public law, any offence of neutral rights, or any bad faith or unfriendly disposition of the Government of the United States; but, on the contrary, that in every stage of the claims a love of justice, a respect for neutral rights, and a frank, generous, and friendly character towards Denmark, has been continually manifested by that Government; and, finally, that complete satisfaction to the claimants has hitherto been delayed by causes, which, though beyond the control of the Executive, do not forbid the expectation of redress.

I shall have the honor to submit to my Government a copy of your Excellency's note, adding whatever may be proper, on my part, to promote the object of it. I renew, &c.

I return herewith the printed papers which were enclosed in your Excellency's note.

COPENHAGEN, April 9, 1812.

The undersigned, Minister of State of the Department of Foreign Affairs, having laid before His Majesty the note which Mr. Erving, the special Minister of the United States of America, addressed to him the 4th November of last year, the principal object of which is to claim the revision of several sentences, definitively pronounced by the Supreme Tribunals of Admiralty, which the Special Minister considers ill-founded, and, in opposition to the principles he maintains, ought to serve as a basis to the proceedings on prizes, and rules for the judges authorized to pronounce between the captors commissioned by the Danish Government, and the captors and owners whose vessels have been captured under the flag of the United States, is authorized by the orders of His Majesty to make known to Mr. Erving, Special Minister of the United States, that the King's very particular sentiments of friendship for the United States, and his esteem for the President, cannot influence him to permit a revision of the sentences pronounced, terminating the causes arising from captures made by the cruisers under the flag of the United States.

The Special Minister will be pleased to find in this assertion, which is founded on the facts he may have made himself acquainted with since his residence here, that the American flag has on all occasions been treated in the maritime tribunals conformably to the rules established, precisely in the same manner as the neutral flags of Europe.

The undersigned is moreover authorized to observe to Mr. Erving, Special Minister of the United States, that if permission were given to the captured, who have pleaded before the tribunals which have decided by a definitive sentence between the parties, to make in their favor, revision of the causes terminated, the same indulgence should be given to the captors, who might complain of the sentences pronounced against them, and that in this manner the causes arising from prizes would experience indefinite delays, as prejudicial to the captured, as to the captors.

The undersigned, in expressing to Mr. Erving his regret at not being able to grant what the Special Minister proposed to him, has the honor to renew to him the assurance of his high consideration.

COPENHAGEN, April 6, 1812.

The undersigned, Minister of State and Chief of the Department of Foreign Affairs, has not failed to attend to the reclamations which Mr. Erving, the Special Minister of the United States of America, made to him under date of the 23d September, 23d November, and 13th December, of the last year, in favor of the different American vessels, and specially in that of the Brutus, Fenno, master, captured and brought into a port of Norway.

It is known to Mr. Erving, that the causes of the vessels, mentioned in the list of the 13th of December, have all been decided in favor of the captured, with the exception of the Maryland, now waiting a decision, and of the Brutus, which, as well as the others, have been reported to the King.

It is with regret that the undersigned is obliged to inform the Special Minister, that His Majesty, after having examined into this affair, has thought proper to leave to the Supreme Tribunal of Admiralty the pronouncing of the sentence, conformably to the principles and instructions prescribed to this tribunal by the regulations concerning privateers, and the ordinances regulating the proceedings before the Supreme Tribunal, and that this tribunal considers itself authorized to condemn both vessel and cargo for the reasons expressed in the sentence.

The decision of the King having been acted upon before the note of Mr. Erving, under date of the 10th instant, reached the undersigned, as the Special Minister will see by the date of the annexed copy of sentence, he has not been able to make use of the reiterated reclamations of Mr. Erving.

The undersigned flatters himself to be able shortly to inform the Special Minister, that the cause of the ship Maryland has been decided favorably.

He has the honor to renew to him the assurance of his high consideration.

ROSENKRANTZ.

No. 20.

Mr. Erving to Mr. Monroe.

COPENHAGEN, April 18, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to enclose a copy of what I propose to send to Mr. de Rosenkrantz, in reply to his note of the 9th instant.

With the most perfect respect and consideration, sir, your very obedient servant,

GEORGE W. ERVING.

P. S.—I shall leave with Mr. Forbes the documents belonging to the claims here, and the claimants' letters; but I think it most proper upon the whole, to transmit to you the original notes of Mr. de Rosenkrantz, and they are, therefore, herewith enclosed.

G. W. E.

Mr. Erving to Mr. de Rosenkrantz.

COPENHAGEN, April 18, 1812.

His Excellency Mr. de Rosenkrantz, First Minister of State and Chief of the Department for Foreign Affairs, &c., &c.

The undersigned, Special Minister of the United States of America, has had the honor to receive the note which his Excellency Mr. de Rosenkrantz, First Minister of State and Chief of the Department for Foreign Affairs, addressed to him on the 9th instant, by order of his Sovereign, in reply to the reclamation made by the undersigned on the 4th November, 1811, against certain sentences of Danish tribunals, passed in preceding years on vessels and cargoes, the property of American citizens.

It appears that His Majesty has not thought proper to authorize the Minister of State to enter into discussion with the undersigned, upon any of the various subjects which that reclamation embraces; to contest or to acquiesce in any of the doctrines upon which it is based; to offer any kind of satisfaction for any of the various injuries which it complains of; or, to propose any correction of the abuses and malversations which it points out as the sources of those injuries.

It is, therefore, the duty of the undersigned, formally to declare, that the Government of the United States cannot rest satisfied with such a mode of treating rights which it holds sacred, and will never sacrifice; and with such a rejection of the just claims of its injured citizens, which it will never cease to assert and to protect.

The President will certainly receive with satisfaction the sentiments of particular friendship towards the United States, and of esteem for himself, which His Danish Majesty has been pleased to profess, sentiments which he will readily reciprocate, and which he was eager and sincere in advancing; but he will, at the same time, receive with surprise, as well as with peculiar concern, the declaration with which these professions are accompanied, refusing a reparation for the wrongs which he has complained of; wrongs which, unredressed, cannot but be considered as being but little in accord with such sentiments. These, his impressions, must be rendered still more forcible by the recollection that a suitable redress for similar wrongs has never been altogether withheld by any of the belligerent Powers, with which the United States have occasionally found themselves in collision; but, on the contrary, that each of the chief belligerents has heretofore furnished a signal example, wherein the firm and temperate voice of justice has prevailed over an erroneous policy; each has attended to and respected the remonstrances of the United States, satisfied with their demands, and amply compensated the losses which the temporary adoption of false principles, or the misconstruction, or malapplication of acknowledged principles had brought upon their citizens; thus recognising the sovereignty of just laws and the indefectibility of the neutral rights which spring from them: nor can the President be now reconciled to any infringement of these, to the cruising regulations of Denmark in those points which may offend them, or to the decisions of any tribunals, in as far as they may have the same tendency, by the only apology which His Majesty has authorized the Minister of State to offer for the wrongs complained of, viz: that these decisions are founded upon the same principles which direct the conduct of Denmark towards neutral European Powers, and that in cases wherein those Powers have been thereby affected, no revision or retrospect has taken place; for, without entering into the inquiry, whether there does, or does not, exist an European Power neutral with regard to Denmark, and with which she can possibly come into collision on such subjects, without pointing out the difference between the neutral position of the United States, and that of any European Power, or examining in any degree the conduct of Denmark towards the European Powers, neutral or otherwise; it is sufficient to observe, that the United States have not made common cause with any other neutral Power; they have not bound up their fate with, nor do they mean to submit their rights to the arbitration of, or to pare them down so as to suit the convenience of any Power whatever—these rights are clear, pronounced, and unequivocal, they are found in the great code of public law; if other Powers have not the same interest in defending, if they find it convenient to relinquish, or, for any reasons whatever, cease to assert such rights, no obligation to abandon them is thereby imposed on America; but to the contrary, standing alone amidst the great struggle of nations, her obligation to protect that sacred deposit is strengthened, and she becomes doubly responsible to posterity for this great inheritance, since she is not deficient in the power and means of preserving it.

His Excellency the Minister of State seems to suppose that the principal object of the undersigned is to obtain the "revision" of the sentences of the tribunal specified in his note of November 4th. It is proper, therefore, to consider this part of the subject, though he must premise by observing, and he begs His Excellency to understand, that the object of that note, which embraced various subjects of complaint, was to obtain satisfaction and compensation, leaving the "mode" and the "means" to be adjusted by mutual accord, for he is entirely unwilling to rest the claims of the United States, or to make them in any wise dependent on an abstract discussion as to the course which may be taken to produce the satisfaction required.

The undersigned, in his note of November 4th, has shown, as he trusts, most clearly and indisputably that the rights of the United States, as a neutral nation, have been violated by the decisions therein referred to; if not, he has invited the Minister of State to discuss the principles on which his reclamation is founded. Can it be deemed to be a satisfactory answer to such a reclamation, that other nations have submitted to similar decisions? Can it be imagined that the term "definitive" as applied to such decisions is conclusive against the United States? Can it be expected that they will acquiesce in a decision as just, because it is termed "definitive?" The Constitution, the faculties, and the police of Admiralty tribunals, in this as in every other country, are formed by and depend on the will of the Sovereign, and is strictly responsible to foreign nations in all cases affecting their rights for a correct administration of justice, on the principles of public law which form the basis of those rights. No foreign nation submits its cause to the arbitrary or capricious decisions of such tribunals, or respects their decisions in any degree, further than as these may be found to conform to its own sense of its own rights. The tribunal is the mere instrument of the Sovereign, with which he operates, and it is his duty so to direct the use of it, that it may not do injury to the rights of others; the foreign nation therefore looks with reason to the tribunal only as indicative of the temper of the Sovereign by whom it is appointed, and under whose authority it acts, and not as the arbitrator of its own destiny. When a foreign Government complains of the conduct of such tribunals, it calls upon the good faith of the Sovereign to repair the wrong which he ought to have restrained.

Shall it be competent for the Sovereign to refer the offended party for satisfaction to the very cause of complaint? What is this but to adopt the injustice complained of? Since when has it been agreed that the belligerents shall give law to neutral nations? Does the "ancient faith" which in peace, augmenting confidence, removed the probabilities of war, and in war mitigated its horrors; does it no longer subsist? Or, in a merely political calculation, does it not occur that the belligerent may hereafter become neutral? However these questions may be answered, it is certain that there is a self-conserving principle in truth and right which insures their vindication, so that a nation may be said to be deceiving itself when it refuses what is due to the just demands of others.

His Excellency the Minister of State has been instructed to observe, that if His Majesty could consent to a revision of the sentences of his tribunals, in favor of those whose property has been condemned he ought to extend such revision to the sentences, by which captured property has been acquitted.

The undersigned takes the liberty of remarking, that the reclamation which he has made is the reclamation of the American Government against certain sentences of condemnation, passed on American property by tribunals appointed by His Danish Majesty and acting under his authority. The American Government finds itself aggrieved by such decisions. Is His Majesty dissatisfied with the decisions of a contrary character, by which American property has been acquitted? Certainly not: yet only upon that ground could His Majesty desire a revision of the sentences of acquittal, for no question now exists between the captor and the captured; the question is between Government and Government; nor is it readily to be conceived, that tribunals whose decisions the Government of the United States has found such ample and solid reasons to complain of, can in other cases, have done injustice to His Majesty's subjects. It is because the tribunals have been partial to His Majesty's subjects; because they are not courts of arbitration, in which the United States has its equal representation, and hence have acted on principles the justice of which the United States does not acknowledge, that a revision of their sentences against the property of American citizens may be reasonably proposed by the American Government, and may be acceded to by His Majesty, without this plan contemplating any injury to his subjects. These are the grounds on which similar revisions have been demanded in other countries, and have been granted, and compensation obtained, without its ever having been proposed that sentences of acquittal, which have only tended to diminish the amount of the injuries complained of, should also be revised.

The undersigned cannot, therefore, but hope that His Danish Majesty, on a reconsideration of this important subject, will see fit to adopt some plan with respect to the matters complained of, which may satisfy the just expectations of the United States. He has thought that it best comported with the friendly and conciliatory dispositions of his Government, not to propose any which should interfere with such arrangements, as having due regard to the object it might be most convenient to His Majesty to make, and therefore in his note of November 4th, stated, what he will here repeat, "that the mode, the means, and, to a certain extent, even the time may be subjected to considerations of mutual convenience and accord." He requests that the Minister of State will be pleased to lay this note before His Majesty; a correct translation of it in Danish is herewith enclosed.

He renews to His Excellency the Minister of State, assurances of his distinguished consideration.

Mr Erving to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State.

COPENHAGEN, April 20, 1812.

SIR: With my despatch No. 8 (of September 8th) I had the honor to submit to you copies of my correspondence with Mr. Desaugiers, then Chargé d'Affaires of France, which I had previously laid before the Minister of State here, and which was also transmitted by Mr. Desaugiers to his Government. In my notes to Mr. Desaugiers were particularized the various excesses of the French corsairs in these waters, which appeared to me contrary to the spirit and intention of that Government, as well as injurious to our commerce; it is with great satisfaction that I now transmit to you the new instructions which Mr. Desaugiers has been ordered to give to the captain of the corsairs.

With the most perfect respect, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving to Mr. Monroe Secretary of State.

COPENHAGEN, May 9, 1812.

I have the honor herewith to transmit to you duplicate of my letter No. 20, (by Mr. Lewis,) dated April 18th. The note of the same date to which it refers, with the few alterations which will be found in this duplicate, was sent to Mr. de Rosenkrantz on the 21st, and was laid by him before the King on the 1st instant; in the meantime I had several conversations with that Minister upon the subject of it, in which I did not fail to urge whatever might contribute to a favorable answer on the part of His Majesty; finally, on the 8th instant (yesterday) he sent to me the note of which the enclosed is a copy. You will observe, sir, the new position which our claims assume under this communication, and the reasonable expectation which it affords of a settlement hereafter. I have endeavored to have this point placed in a more formal and explicit shape

Relations with Algiers.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. de Rosenkrantz to Mr. Erving.

COPENHAGEN, May 8, 1812.

The undersigned, Minister of State, and of Foreign Affairs, has had to explain to Mr. Erving, special Minister of the United States of America, in his note of the 9th of last month, the motives which have influenced the King, his master, not to grant the revision of the sentences of the Supreme Tribunal of Admiralty definitively terminating the causes brought before this tribunal, arising from the captures made by Danish cruisers of vessels sailing under the flag of the United States, and that for this reason he could not persuade himself that the ulterior representations which the Special Minister had thought proper still to address him could produce any change in the determination of His Majesty. The Minister of Foreign Relations has, however, prevailed on the King, his master, to be pleased to examine the note which Mr. Erving addressed to him, under date of the 18th of last month, reiterating the claim to redress for the wrongs previously recited, and satisfaction for which he considers it his duty still to insist upon.

The undersigned hastens to have the honor to inform the Special Minister that it has been enjoined on him by his Sovereign to answer the abovementioned note of the Special Minister, by referring to the contents of his preceding note of the 9th, as to the friendly dispositions of His Majesty towards the Government of the United States; to add the expression of his extreme regret that he cannot agree to the opinion expressed by Mr. Erving, as being that of his Government, in regard to the conduct observed towards vessels under American flags, brought into the ports of his dominions by his armed vessels or by those provided with letters of marque.

The war in which the Danish nation is engaged with Great Britain, who employs every means to conceal from observation the enterprises of its merchants, in making use of foreign flags and merchants, have caused those measures, the object of which is to preclude English commerce from the advantage growing out of the disposition it has always found in the merchants of other nations to become the agents of prohibited trade. It is too well known to Mr. Erving, and it ought to be to his Government, that American merchants and mariners have frequently lent themselves to enterprises of this nature, for the Danish Government to consider it necessary to multiply the proofs which it has on the subject.

It is well known to the Danish Government that the United States do not pretend either to approve or defend the conduct of American citizens who, from the thirst of gain, are engaged in enterprises which expose them to loss, if the fraud is discovered. Proofs are not wanting to show that they have frequently succeeded in imposing both on the officers empowered to examine captured vessels and on the tribunals of prizes. The subterfuges to which they resort, to prevent the discovery of the enemy character of the expedition have necessarily induced those intrusted by the King with the examination, as well as the tribunal, to redouble their activity, in order to fulfil the views of His Majesty; but it never has been conformable with these, to suffer that any injury should be sustained by the mariners and merchants of friendly nations who carry on a licit and unsuspecting commerce.

The persevering struggle of the Danish Government in favor of the principles upon which they repose the liberty of the commerce and navigation of neutral nations, forbids the supposition that it would wish to derogate from them; but it has a complete right to tear the mask from the commerce of its enemy, who recognises no law in regard to navigation as soon as neutral Powers are in question. The King will not renounce the exercise of this right. If His Majesty could be persuaded that in particular cases it should happen that appearances might have prevailed in the examination of some causes to the detriment of some American citizens, who might not have been able to demonstrate sufficiently that their enterprises of commerce were legitimate, he would assuredly be led to address just complaints, as he has on several particular occasions given proofs of his favorable dispositions towards the American vessels which circumstances have conducted to the ports of his Kingdom.

The King wishes therefore, to give, himself, proofs to the Government of the United States of the sentiments of justice with which he is animated.

The undersigned flatters himself that the President of the United States will be easily persuaded, that, during so hard a contest as that with which Denmark now sustains against the Government who so evidently disavows the rights of nations engaged in navigation, the moment is not favorable to bring anew under consideration the reclamations which the Government of the United States may find it convenient to make at that period, in relation to the objects of discussion.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to the Special Minister the assurance of his high consideration.

ROSENKRANTZ.

ALGIERS.

[Communicated to the House, November 17, 1812.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of a letter from the Consul General of the United States to Algiers, stating the circumstances preceding and attending his departure from that Regency.

JAMES MADISON.

NOVEMBER 17, 1812.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Lear, Consul General at Algiers, to the Secretary of State. On board the American ship Allegany, at sea, July 29, 1812.

"On the 17th instant, I had the honor to receive your respected favors of the 6th of February and 29th of April, 1812, by Captain Ebenezer Eveleth, of the ship Allegany, which arrived at Algiers on that day, with the four new Mediterranean passports, two hundred tops, and the several packages containing messages, reports, newspapers, &c., together with the letter of Richard Forrest, Esq., covering the invoice and bill of lading of the ship Allegany, sent from the United States with a cargo of naval and military stores for the Regency of Algiers, in fulfilment of treaty stipulations.

"I must delay replying to the particular points in your letter of the 29th of April, until I shall have given an account of the most unexpected and extraordinary event which I believe has ever taken place, even in the extraordinary events of Algiers, in order that I may have it ready to transmit, in case I should meet any vessel bound to the United States.

"On the arrival of the Allegany, the Dey and the officers of the Regency expressed the most entire and complete satisfaction; and until the 20th instant, when they began to discharge the cargo, there was no appearance of any other sentiment. On that day a large quantity of spars and plank were taken on board a lighter, by the people of the marine, to be carried on shore, by order of the Minister of Marine, but they were not landed. At noon the Minister sent to request a note of the articles, and their quantity, which were on board the ship for the Regency, that he might lay it before the Dey in the evening, agreeably to his orders. I accordingly sent the note, taken from the invoice, but without affixing the prices. At six P. M., I received a message by my dragoman, from the Minister of Marine, informing me that when he laid my note of articles before the Dey, he became very outrageous on finding there was only fifty small barrels of gunpowder, and four cables on board; when the note sent to the United States in 1810, as furnished by the Minister of Marine, demanded five hundred quintals of gunpowder, and twenty-seven large cables, besides a very large quantity of cordage and other articles, as may be seen by said note, forwarded in my letter of August, 1810, to the honorable the Secretary of State; and told the Minister that he would not receive the cargo, but would send the ship away from Algiers, and that I must depart in her, as he would not have a Consul in his Regency who did not cause everything to be brought exactly as he (the Dey) ordered.

"Early on the morning of the 21st, I waited on the Minister of Marine to inquire into this procedure, when he confirmed all that had been told me by the dragoman, and added many other expressions of anger and disgust of the Dey.

"I reasoned with him on the subject, stating that it had never been usual to send the whole of such large orders at one time; that we had been very punctual in our payments, and that the cargo of this vessel would probably pay all that we owed; that cargoes had always come in this manner, assorted, with a part of each article, and that I had never before found any difficulty, that powder and cables were articles of which we did not make enough for our own use in the United States, and that it was almost impracticable, at this time, to bring them from other countries, as was well known to himself and all the world; that, in the present distracted state of nations, it was possible the United States might be forced into a war, and that it behooved our Government not to be destitute of so essential an article of defence as gunpowder; but that on a future occasion we might be able to send more; with many other remarks, which he allowed to be reasonable, but said that the Dey was determined; and that when he had once fixed a resolution he never departed from it. And added, that the Dey insisted upon having everything brought which he ordered, without regarding whether it amounted to more than the sum stipulated in the treaty or not; and that I must depart on Thursday the 23d instant, on board the Allegany, with all the Americans now in Algiers.

"I wished to see the Dey, and for that purpose desired an audience, which was denied me.

"I then requested that a few more days might be allowed for my remaining, that I might prepare myself, as it was impossible to make any arrangement of my affairs in so short a time, hoping in the mean time, to make some accommodation of this business. The answer was that the Dey would not allow an hour.

"I wrote a circular to the Christian Consuls in Algiers, informing them of my ordered departure.

"The spars and plank which were taken out of the vessel yesterday, were returned on board this morning. In the morning of the 22d, I sent my dragoman to the palace to say that I wished to make a settlement of the cargo of the brig Paul Hamilton, which had been delayed by a request from the palace until the Allegany should arrive, when a settlement could be made for both vessels at the same time.

"The request was granted, and the dragoman informed me that the Dey wished me to bring our treaty with me, that we might see the time when it commenced, the terms, &c., in order to make a final settlement of our accounts. This I did, and while I was settling the account of the Paul Hamilton's cargo with the Prime Minister and Secretaries, in the usual manner, the Dey's dragoman came down, and said, the Dey wished to see the treaty which I had brought. I gave it to him without hesitation, supposing that the Dey might wish to see something in it, or that he might compare it with that which was in the palace. But when I demanded the treaty again the Dey refused to deliver it, saying, by his dragoman, that when a Consul was sent away, he, the Dey, should always keep his treaty, and that such had ever been the custom at Algiers.

"After settling the account of the cargo of the Paul Hamilton, which amounted to $12,109, and producing a tiscary or acknowledgment of a balance due to the United States, which had been given in February, 1810, at the settlement of the cargoes of the ship Resource and brig Blanchy, for $26,065; the Minister and Secretaries said there was still $27,000 due to the present time. This I denied, as I had the receipts of the Regency for the payment of annuities for fourteen and a half years, exclusive of the amount of the cargo of the Paul Hamilton and the tiscary, for $26,065, and as our treaty was concluded on the 5th of September, 1795, it would be only seventeen years in the whole, from which the fourteen and a half years were to be deducted, leaving two and a half years ending the 5th of September next, and amounting to $54,000, from which deducting the cargo of the Paul Hamilton, and the tiscary before mentioned, would leave but $15,826; and which I had no doubt but the cargo of the ship Alleghany would fully pay, if it should be received.

"The Minister then observed, that they counted the year by the Mahometan calendar consisting of three hundred and fifty-four days, so that the difference in seventeen years would make it one-half year more than we counted. I told him that I had always reckoned the years in the Christian manner of three hundred and sixty-five days; and that I presumed the same was done by all other Consuls having accounts of a similar nature with the Regency. He said it was never so done, or allowed by the Regency, and immediately sent up a note to the Dey, of the sum due by his account, viz: $27,000.

"After a short time the Dey sent down word by his dragoman, that the balance must be paid immediately in cash, and that the vessel, with myself, &c., must depart to-morrow as he had ordered. I answered that it was impossible for me to comply with the Dey's order, even if I acknowledged the balance to be just, and had every disposition to pay it, as I had not the means of obtaining the money, especially as the cargo of the ship now in port was sent by my Government for the express purpose of paying what might be due to the Regency, and was the strongest possible evidence of our punctuality in fulfilling our engagements.

"The Prime Minister then went up to the Dey, with the dragoman, and soon returned, saying that the Dey persisted in his first order, that the money should be paid immediately; or that I should be sent to the marine in chains, the vessel and cargo confiscated, and all the citizens of the United States now in Algiers be detained in slavery, and war instantly declared against the United States.

"I told the Minister that the matter was now brought to a decision, and that I must go to the marine in chains, for it was not possible for me to obtain the money; and had no more to say on the subject, but would warn them of the evil which they were bringing on themselves, by such unjust and outrageous conduct.

"The Minister went to the Dey a second time, when I demanded to accompany him, but was refused, and soon returned with what he said was the fixed and unalterable resolution of the Dey, viz: that he would allow me till Saturday morning, the 25th instant, to pay the money and depart with the vessel, and all other Americans in Algiers; but, if this was not done, he should confiscate the vessel, detain in slavery all the Americans in Algiers, and declare war against the United States, as he had before determined. The Minister also added, that the Dey had been informed that the ship had brought a large quantity of coffee, for sale, and some other articles not intended for him, (meaning, I suppose, the gun barrels, &c., for the Emperor of Morocco; but whence he could have got information of the latter I know not, for I had never mentioned a syllable of it to any one in Algiers. I have since learned that it was discovered by some means or other, when the planks and spars were taken out of the vessel on Monday;) and that he was, if possible, more highly incensed at this, than on any other account; saying that he considered it an insult offered, by having merchandise embarked on board a vessel which was said to have been sent for the sole purpose of bringing the annuity.

"As I was determined that nothing should be wanting on my part to settle this unpleasant, and to me unaccountable business, I proposed to the Prime Minister that the articles now sent by the Alleghany should be received and passed to our credit, in the usual manner of settling the accounts of cargoes, when they had the power of fixing their own prices, and, that whatever balance might appear due, after such settlement, should be paid in cash, if the Dey desired it; and that he might send a note of such articles as he expected for the next annuity, which I would forward to my Government, with such observations on the propriety or necessity of sending the whole of them, as the Dey should express. By this means, if the proposition should be accepted, time would be given to make preparations for future events, or, at any rate, our commerce in this sea might have been secured by giving timely notice, and putting our vessels on their guard. But the Dey refused to listen to it, and repeated his first orders.

"On leaving the palace, I reflected upon the very critical and alarming situation of our affairs with the Regency, which was not only brought on in the most unexpected manner, but without any reasonable or justifiable cause of complaint on the part of the Dey. It appeared to me that he had determined to take a measure which I had for some time past apprehended, and which I had more than once the honor of intimating to the honorable the Secretary of State, particularly in my letter of the 29th May last, viz: That after having concluded a truce with Portugal, and seeing Sicily under the protection of the British, he must make war upon some other nation, with or without a cause, in order to employ his cruisers; and that the extended and unprotected commerce of the United States offered greater prospects of advantage from plunder and capture than he could expect from any other nation. The ultimate consequence of such conduct he would never calculate; neither would he be restrained by any sense of shame, or of the flagrant injustice of the act.

"In this state of embarrassment, and with these reflections, I was still determined to try all possible means to accommodate the present difficulties, before the ultimate period fixed by the Dey should arrive; but if that could not be effected, I should prepare, if possible, to pay the balance demanded in money, to prevent the loss of the ship and cargo, the detention of all Americans in Algiers, and the immediate capture of others.

"In order to raise the money I proposed to sell the cargo of the ship, as the Dey would not receive it, and pay him the proceeds in cash towards the balance, but he absolutely forbid the sale of any article on board her. Thus situated, I had no other means left but to endeavor to obtain the money on my bills, and while I was using every means in my power, and through every channel that could be devised, to have matters accommodated before they came to the last extremity, I was not inattentive to the necessity I might be under of procuring the money in the last moment.

"As the discussions on our business had taken place either at the marine or in the palace, in presence of all those usually attending there, it was no secret; and I had the satisfaction of hearing a general sentiment of disapprobation expressed on account of the Dey's conduct, more strongly than I could have supposed it would have been done, when it was known in what awe and dread every one beheld the present Dey, whose severity is almost without example.

"The only quarter from which money could be obtained at any rate was the house of Bacri, and upon application to him to know if I could depend upon him in the last extremity, he raised many difficulties on account of the limited time, of the many very heavy payments which they had been obliged to make lately for the cargoes of the Greek prizes purchased by them, which had entirely absorbed their cash, &c. He also made some objection to the security of such bills on account of my being obliged to leave the Regency; to that I answered, that I should not desire any one to become my security, as the same objection would naturally occur to them, and that if I should give bills, I must candidly say that, if the vessel should not afterwards be permitted to depart with her cargo, (as I had some apprehensions, from the shameful conduct of the Dey, might be the case, in violation of his word,) the bills would not be paid, as the proceeds of the cargo, at the place to which she might go, must be depended upon towards discharging such bills. He said he would consider the subject, and give me an answer on Friday as to the practicability of getting the money, if it must be had, and the terms which would be expected for it.

"On Friday I made the last effort to effect an accommodation, and flattered myself with some little prospect of success, as the Minister of the Marine, and some others of the principal officers of the Regency, had expressed their regret at what had happened, and had promised to do everything in their power to induce the Dey to alter his determination, if the Dey should introduce the subject before them, on this day, when they all met him at the palace to go with him to the mosque, it being the Mahomedan sabbath; but they candidly acknowledged that if he did not bring the matter forward, no one would dare to introduce it, as they knew the obstinacy of his temper, and dreaded the effects of his resentment.

"I had communicated to the Minister of the Marine the proposition which I made in the palace on Wednesday, for the Dey to take this cargo on account, and to pay the balance, if any, in cash, &c., which he did not hesitate to declare he thought highly reasonable, and such as should be satisfactory; but, at the same time, remarked on the inflexible obstinacy of the Dey, when he had once taken his resolution.

"At one o'clock my dragoman brought me a message from the Dey, which he said was his last, and irrevocably fixed, viz: that I should tomorrow morning pay into the treasury twenty-seven thousand Spanish dollars, which he claimed as the balance of annuities from the United States, and then depart from the Regency with my family, and all other citizens of the United States in Algiers, in the ship which had brought the stores, in fulfillment of treaty stipulations, and which he had refused to receive; or that the ship and cargo, with all other Americans now in Algiers, should be detained, the former confiscated, the latter kept in slavery, and that war should be instantly declared against the United States.

"This message determined the business and closed every door of hope for an accommodation. It was confirmed by the Minister of Marine, who said that the subject having been introduced by the Dey in their presence, he and the other Ministers had urged everything they dared, to induce the Dey to alter his determination, and to accept my proposition, but in vain. He was inflexible, and the alternative must be taken immediately.

"I had now my ultimate choice to make between the payment of the money, if it could be obtained, and the certain loss of the vessel and cargo, worth much more than the sum claimed by the Dey, and the immediate slavery of more than twenty American citizens (including myself and family) now in Algiers, with the highest probability of many American vessels and their crews being captured before it would be possible to give notice of what had happened, to enable them to consult their safety by remaining in port, as the port of Algiers had been shut since the sailing of their cruisers on the 13th instant, and of course no opportunity had offered to communicate an account of these transactions to any of our Consuls in the Mediterranean.

"I therefore made my election to pay the money, if it could be obtained, especially as the departure of the Allegany would afford an opportunity of giving the most speedy information to every part of this sea, and guard American vessels against falling into the hands of the Algerine cruisers now out; as I can now have but little doubt of the Dey's having given orders to his cruisers, on their sailing, to detain and send in such American vessels as they may find. For it must clearly be seen that he has no reasonable or justifiable ground for his present demand and conduct, and I am in a great measure confirmed in my apprehensions entertained and expressed in my last letters to the honorable the Secretary of State, that after the truce with Portugal and the protection of the Sicilians by the English, he would make war upon some nation to employ his cruisers; and that none offered a better prospect than the vessels of the United States.

"The present posture of affairs between the United States and Great Britain, just on the point of open hostilities, would afford another guard and security against our sending a force into this sea to protect our commerce now here, or revenge the insult and injury inflicted on us; especially, too, as under present circumstances, he must suppose, that it would be gratifying to the British, with whom, there is every reason to believe, he has a treaty offensive and defensive.

"I sent for Mr. Bacri, and informed him of my determination to pay the money and depart from Algiers, and should depend upon him for it. But that if, after paying the money, the vessel and Americans should not be allowed to depart from Algiers (which I had reason to apprehend from the Dey's outrageous and extraordinary conduct might happen notwithstanding his declaration) the bills which I might draw would not be paid at Gibraltar; for, that I must depend upon the sale of the cargo of this vessel to meet the bills as far as it would go; and that I gave him this information, that he might know the ground on which he stood. He replied that he should have full faith in the bills on that condition, and then observed that the sacrifice which must be made to obtain the money at the moment, could not be less than twenty-five per cent. After some further discussion of the subject, and knowing the impossibility of obtaining the money from any other quarter, (about which I had made inquiry for two days past,) I agreed to give him the advance, which brought the amount to $33,750; and in the evening gave him a bill, at thirty days sight, on John Gavino, Esq., Consul of the United States at Gibraltar, in favor of Moise Levy Valensen, of Gibraltar, value received of Jacob Cain Bacri, of Algiers, on account of the United States of America, to pay a balance claimed by the Day of Algiers, for annuities from the United States, the Dey having refused to receive the naval and military stores sent from the United States, agreeably to treaty stipulation, to pay such balance as might be due. I also stipulated with Mr. Bacri, that he should cause the money to be paid into the Treasury to-morrow morning, so as not to give any ground for detaining the vessel, or raising any new difficulties on that account, which he promised to do.

"I gave to John Norderling, Esq., his Swedish Majesty's Agent General at Algiers, a letter accepting his friendly offer to take care of my property left at Algiers, and also requesting his kindness to be extended to any American citizens who might arrive in Algiers after my departure, or be unhappily brought in by the cruisers of the Regency.

"The following is an extract from my letter to Mr. Norderling.

"As my departure from Algiers is compulsive, I leave no person directly charged with the affairs of the United States of America in this Regency. But should any of our citizens arrive here, or be unhappily brought in, your kindness to them will be gratefully acknowledged, and the necessary and reasonable expenses for the support of such as are destitute will be paid by the Government of the United States."

"Through the day of Friday, and in the evening, my acquaintance of all descriptions called upon me, and the unfeigned sorrow expressed by all of them of every denomination, sufficiently evinced the regard they had for us. And the undisguised disapprobation and disgust expressed by all classes at the Dey's conduct, must, I think, end in some disastrous event for him.

"Very early on Saturday morning the dragoman came to my house, and informed me that Jacob Bacri had paid the money to the Regency, and soon after the Minister of the Marine sent for me to go to the Marine, where he informed me it was the Dey's order that myself and all the other Americans should embark immediately, and depart from Algiers. He expressed his regret at what had happened, and declared that it was against his strong advice and wishes, and hoped that everything might yet be accommodated after the Dey's phantasy should have passed, &c. I intimated to him my suspicions and apprehensions that orders had been given to the cruisers, which sailed on the 13th instant, to capture American vessels. He assured me that if such orders had been given by the Dey to the commander of the squadron, he was ignorant of it, and that he hoped it was not the case. How far his reply is to be relied on I am not able to say.

"I requested the Minister to give me a certificate of the ship Allegany having been sent away by order of the Dey, that in case she should be met by any of the cruisers now out, they might not molest or stop her. This he declined, saying that their cruisers were all at the east of Algiers, and that if any one should molest or detain the vessel, the Dey would punish the commander most severely, &c. This did not satisfy me; but I could not prevail upon him to give the passport.

"When I parted from the Minister I was about to return to my own house to accompany my wife on board the vessel; but he said I must not return there again, but must go on board, as the vessel was getting under way, and that the dragoman would go up to conduct my family down and on board, which was accordingly done, and the vessel got out of the port about 7 o'clock, A. M.

"The persons embarked on board the Allegany, besides the captain and crew, (consisting of seven persons,) are myself, my wife, and my son, (who arrived from the United States via Gibraltar, on the 15th instant,) Mr. Jonathan S. Smith, of Philadelphia, who has been in Algiers these two years past, with some coffee for sale, which he has thought proper to abandon, and says he shall seek for indemnification from the United States. I advised him to sell it, as it was not possible for the ship to take it on board, as she was entirely filled with the cargo which she brought out, but he did not think proper to comply with my advice; Mr. John Vallet, a naturalized citizen of the United States, whom I have mentioned in my letter of the 29th May, a copy of which I have now the honor to enclose, as well as that of the 30th of April, and a Mr. Pinto, also a naturalized citizen of the United States, certificate from South Carolina.

"On the evening of our leaving Algiers we spoke a British letter of marque, bound to Malta, and as the weather did not admit of sending a letter on board, I desired the captain to inform the American Consul at that place that I had been ordered from Algiers, and, as there was no doubt but that the Algerine cruisers would capture any American vessels they might meet, desired that he would give notice thereof to all American vessels in Malta, and extend the information in every direction possible.

"Yesterday we were boarded by His Britannic Majesty's brig Goshawk, which was going with a convoy to Alicant and Majorca, to the commander of which brig I gave letters to our Consuls in those places, a copy of which I have the honor to enclose, and requested the said commander to give the notice of my being ordered from Algiers, &c., to any American vessels he might meet at sea, and make the same known wherever he might go. I shall forward my circular to any places to which we may meet vessels going, until I reach Gibraltar, whence I shall disperse my circulars by every opportunity which may offer, to all ports of this sea, as well as to the ports in the Atlantic.

"The officers of the Goshawk who boarded us, gave information that the British Orders in Council, laying restraints on neutral commerce, had been revoked, and that the British cruisers had orders not to molest American vessels, as an evidence of which he did not even ask for a sight of the Allegany's papers.

"I took passports for the ship from the French and Spanish Consuls before I left Algiers. The English Consul did not furnish any, although I applied to him for that purpose. I did not ask them from the Swede or the Dane, as they have no vessels in this sea.

"I have now, sir, given you a faithful and detailed account of this extraordinary and unexpected transaction. While I feel conscious that no exertion was wanting on my part, and no means in my power left unattempted to make an accommodation, when the difficulties were first brought forward, and during the whole course of this unexampled proceeding; and that my ultimate decision was made on the ground of necessity, to prevent a greater evil to my country; I trust that the President and our Government will approve my conduct. The law passed on the 1st of May, 1810, restricting the Consuls in Barbary to the sum of three thousand dollars annually, to be employed in presents, &c., without the special permission of the President first obtained, prevented my making those attempts in a pecuniary way, for opening a door to accommodation, which I should otherwise have done; but, upon a review of the whole of the circumstances attending this business, I have now my doubts whether any sum which the United States might have thought proper to bestow, would have answered the purpose. I thought it my duty, however, to make some attempts in that way, upon the scale to which I was limited; but it had not the desired effect.

"The character of the present Dey, Hadge Alli Bashaw, is that of a severe, obstinate, and cruel man. He is said to be inflexible in his resolutions, and will bear no contradiction or reasoning. He has kept the soldiers in more subjection during his reign than they have been accustomed to for many reigns before, and no one dares approach him, but those whose duty calls them into his presence, or who are sent for by him. He has not granted an audience to any Consul for nearly a year past, except to a new English Consul who arrived in April last: and would not see the old Consul before his departure. The tales told of his personal conduct in the palace, bespeak him a man deprived, at times, of his reason. His conduct with respect to our affairs is almost an evidence of his insanity; and I am very much mistaken if it does not hasten his exit from this world; but while he reigns he is most absolute. And I have very little hopes of his refraining from making war upon the United States. There is every reason to apprehend, from what has taken place, as before detailed, that the cruisers had orders to capture American vessels, before their departure from Algiers, on the 13th instant. In which case some vessels will undoubtedly fall into their hands before the notice I have given, or may give, can reach the ports where they may be, and prevent their sailing. It therefore behooves the Government to prepare for such an event, and to determine in what manner they will meet it. Should our differences with Great Britain be so accommodated as to admit of sending a naval force into this sea, I am sure there is only one course which the Government will pursue, and what has now taken place may be a happy and fortunate event for the United States, by relieving them from a disgraceful tribute, and an imperious and piratical depredation on their commerce. If our small naval force can operate freely in this sea, Algiers will be humbled to the dust.

"Spain would undoubtedly be ready and willing, as far as she might be able, to co-operate with any nation against Algiers; for the enormous demands made upon the former by the latter not having been complied with, the Algerines have lately taken vessels and property from the Spaniards to the amount of more than one hundred thousand dollars, and have upwards of fifty of the subjects of that nation in slavery. They still permit, or rather compel the Consul to remain at Algiers, and have not declared war against Spain, whose ally seems to view these depredations with indifference. The French may be nearly in a state of open hostility with them; and the Algerines know, that in the event of a peace between Great Britain and France, they must submit to the will of the latter Power. Sweden and Denmark are in arrears for four or five annuities, and nothing but a knowledge that these Powers have no commerce in this sea, on which they can depredate, prevents their making war upon them. In the mean time, the Consuls of these nations pay annually a considerable sum in money for their forbearance, while the account of annuities is accumulating. All the Sicilians have been released, through the interference of the English, from Tunis and Tripoli; and at my departure from Algiers, Lord William Bentinck was daily at that place, to treat for the Sicilians in slavery there. The Portuguese have redeemed all their subjects in slavery at Algiers, and extended their truce with the Regency for one year.

"I shall proceed in the Allegany to Gibraltar, where I shall dispose of her cargo which has been refused by the Dey of Algiers, to meet, as far as it will go, the bill beforementioned, and for the remainder shall draw upon the honorable the Secretary of State. At the same time, I shall send to Mr. Simpson, our Consul at Tangier, the gun barrels intended for the Emperor of Morocco, as well as a copy of your letter respecting the change of passports, with a proportion of the tops, and one of the new passports. The same will be done to Tunis and Tripoli, from which places I have heard nothing since I had last the honor of writing to you. I shall also from thence dispense information of what happened at Algiers, to all ports of this sea, as beforementioned, and shall add to this letter (if an opportunity should not offer of forwarding it before my arrival) such occurrences or information as I may meet there.

"On the 13th instant, the whole naval force of Algiers sailed on a cruise to the eastward, supposed to be destined against Tunis, or to make a descent on some part of Sardinia, for the purpose of getting slaves. It consisted of the following vessels:

1 frigate of 50 guns and	500 men.
1 do. 46	460
2 do. 44	450 men each, 900
1 do. (new) 38	400
2 corvettes, 24 guns each,	500
1 do. 22	230
2 brigs, 22 guns each,	450
1 xebec, 20	200
1 schooner, 4	40
1 row galley,	50
6 gunboats, sloop rigged, carrying one 24 pounder and one 11 inch mortar each.

"The heaviest cannon in their frigates are eighteen pounders, but these do not extend through the whole battery, having some twelve pounders among them; the other guns are nine and six pounders. The corvettes and brigs carry twelve, nine, and six pounders; none of them have carronades.

"The large frigate is about six years old, and the best of the squadron. She is about the size of our 36 gun frigates. Three of the others are very old ships, hardly seaworthy, about the size of our 32 gun frigates. That of 38 guns is a new ship, launched at Algiers about two months since and is about 500 tons burden. The two corvettes of 24 guns are Greek prizes, converted into cruisers, about 400 tons burden each. The corvette of the 22 guns is an old vessel of about 350 tons. The two brigs are about 250, and the xebec 200 tons. Four of the frigates, one corvette, and the two brigs, are coppered.

"The Algerines have not another vessel of war, beside those mentioned, excepting three gunboats, of the size of those sent out, which are unfit for service. All their small open gunboats, for the defence of the bay, are either broken up or entirely unfit for service.

"The squadron beforementioned is commanded by their famous captain Rais Hammida, who bears the title of Admiral. He is a bold, active, enterprising commander, but entirely unacquainted with any regular mode of fighting; he has not the advantage of being a Turk, or even an Algerine by birth, and his advancement, which has been owing entirely to his activity, enterprise, and singular good fortune, has excited the jealousy and hatred of the other commanders, who are far inferior to him in point of talents; but he is much beloved by the sailors (if such they may be called who go out in their cruisers.) He is an Arab of the mountains, of one of the tribe of Carbiles; he came to Algiers when a boy, to seek a livelihood, as is the custom of those people, and going out in one of the cruisers, became attached to that mode of life, and has risen to his present rank. He is about 40 years old.

"The crews of their cruisers consist principally of the lowest and most miserable order of people in Algiers, known by the name of Biscaries, and Carbiles, from the tribes to which they belong. They are either taken from the streets at the moment when a cruiser is about to sail, or, if a previous cruise has been fortunate, they go on board voluntarily in great numbers, hoping to obtain plunder or prize money. As the last cruise of their corsairs was esteemed fortunate by the capture of a number of Greek vessels loaded with wheat, and each man shared about fifty dollars, the vessels have been crowded with volunteers on the present cruise. Besides these, there are a few who may be called good seamen for Algerines; and about ten or twelve Turkish soldiers to every one hundred men on board the vessel.

"They know nothing of regular combat at sea, and, if kept from boarding distance, they could not withstand one-half their own force on board another vessel, which should be tolerably well managed in the usual mode of sea-fighting. It is on boarding, that they depend entirely to overcome an equal or any force that will contend with them. These attempts they sometimes make with a desperation bordering on madness; but, if foiled in that, they have no other resource.

"After this account of the Algerine cruisers and their crews, which is faithful and correct, I am sure that our brave officers and seamen would rejoice to meet them with one-half their force, if circumstances should make a recurrence to arms necessary on our part, and our ships could come freely into this sea.

Enclosed is the account of the settlement of the cargo of the brig Paul Hamilton, made at the Palace on the 22d instant; and, although the prices allowed for the cordage and cables are at a great loss to the United States, yet, those given for the plank and turpentine, &c., make the settlement, upon the whole, as good as usual. And, had the cargo of the ship Allegany been received at the same rate, it would have paid the balance up to September next, which completes the seventeenth year of our treaty, according to our computation of time. The account of annuities between the United States and Algiers, as per treaty, stands simply thus:

The U. States to the Dey and Regency of Algiers, Dr.
To 17 annuities, ending September 5, 1812, at $21,600 per year - - - - $367,200

"The Regency of Algiers, counting the time by the Mahometan computation of 354 days to the year, make 17½ years, which is an addition of half a year, or $10,800 to the above balance; which makes their balance $26,637 to the 5th September, 1812, for which the Dey demands $27,000, in round numbers."

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, complying with the resolution of the 9th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 21, 1812.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 19, 1812.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, requesting information touching the conduct of British officers towards persons taken in American armed ships, has the honor to lay before the President the accompanying papers, marked A, B, C, from which it appears that certain persons, some of whom are said to be native, and others naturalized citizens of the United States, being parts of the crews of the United States' armed vessels the Nautilus and the Wasp, and the private armed vessel the Sarah Ann, have been seized, under the pretext of their being British subjects, by British officers, for the avowed purpose, as is understood, of having them brought to trial for their lives; and that others, being part of the crew of the Nautilus, have been taken into the British service.

The Secretary of State begs leave, also, to lay before the President the papers marked D and E. From these it will be seen that whilst the British naval officers arrest as criminals such persons taken on board American armed vessels as they may consider British subjects, they claim a right to retain on board British ships of war American citizens who may have married in England, or been impressed from on board British merchant vessels; and that they consider an impressed American, when he is discharged from one of their ships, as a prisoner of war.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant F. H. Babbitt to Master Commandant William H. Crane, of the United States' Navy, (late of the United States' brig Nautilus,) dated

BOSTON, MASS., Sept. 13, 1813.

Enclosed I send you a description of the proportion of our little crew who have been so debased and traitorous as to enter the service of our enemy: also, a list of those gallant fellows, whose glory it would have been to have lost their lives in the service of their country, and whose misfortune it has been to cross the Atlantic on suspicion of their being British subjects; four of them native born Americans, and two naturalized citizens. On their parting with me, and removal from the Africa of sixty-four guns to the Thetis frigate, (the latter with a convoy from England, then in 43° 30' north, and 46° 30' west,) their last request and desire was that I would particularly acquaint you with their situation, with their determination never to prove traitors to that country whose flag they were proud to serve under, and whose welfare and prosperity they equally hoped and anticipated to realize.

A, No. 2.

Sir John Borlase Warren to Mr. Monroe,
HALIFAX, 30th Sept., 1812.

SIR: Having received information that a most unauthorized act has been committed by Commodore Rodgers, in forcibly seizing twelve British seamen, prisoners of war, late belonging to the Guerriere, and taking them out of the English cartel brig Endeavor, on her passage down the harbor of Boston, after they had been regularly embarked on board of her for an exchange, agreeably to the arrangements settled between the two countries, and that the said British seamen, so seized, are now detained on board the United States' frigate President as hostages; I feel myself called upon to request, sir, your most serious attention to a measure so fraught with mischief and inconvenience, destructive of the good faith of a flag of truce and the sacred protection of a cartel. I should be extremely sorry that the imprudent act of any officer should involve consequences so particularly severe as the present instance must naturally produce, if repeated; and although it is very much my wish, during the continuance of the difference existing between the two countries, to adopt every measure that might render the effect of war less rigorous, yet, in another point of view, the conviction of the duty I owe my country would, in the event of such grievances as I have already stated being continued, not admit of any hesitation in retaliatory decisions; but as I am strongly persuaded of the high liberality of your sentiments, and that the act complained of has originated entirely with the officer who committed it, and that it will be as censurable in your consideration as it deserves, I rely upon your taking such steps as will prevent a recurrence of conduct so extremely reprehensible in every shape. I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN BORLASE WARREN,
Admiral of the Blue, &c.

His Exc'y JAMES MONROE, Esq.

Mr. Monroe to Sir John Borlase Warren.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
October 28, 1812.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 30th September, complaining that Commodore Rodgers, commanding a squadron of the United States' Navy at the port of Boston, had taken twelve British seamen, lately belonging to His Britannic Majesty's ship the Guerriere, from a cartel in the harbor of Boston, and that he detained them on board the President, a frigate of the United States, as hostages.

I am instructed to inform you that inquiry shall be made into the circumstances attending, and the causes which produced the act of which you complain, and that such measures will be taken, on a knowledge of them, as may comport with the rights of both nations, and may be proper in the case to which they relate.

I beg you, sir, to be assured that it is the sincere desire of the President to see (and to promote, so far as depends on the United States,) that the war which exists between our countries be conducted with the most utmost regard to humanity. I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

SIR JOHN BORLASE WARREN,
Admiral of the Blue, &c.

WASHINGTON, December 17, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to annex a list of twelve of the crew of the United States' sloop of war Wasp, detained by Captain John Beresford, of the British ship Poictiers, under the pretence of their being British subjects.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE S. WISE, Purser.

HON. PAUL HAMILTON, Sec'y Navy.

[List referred to in the preceding note, marked B.]

WASHINGTON CITY, Dec. 17, 1812.

JOHN MCCLLOUD, boatswain, has been in the service since 1804. Married in Norfolk in 1804 or 1805, and has a wife and four children there.

JOHN STEPHENS, boatswain's mate, has been in the service for six years.

GEORGE M. D. READ, quartermaster, has a protection, and has sailed out of New York and Philadelphia for several years.

William Mitchell, James Gothright, John Wright, Thomas Phillips, Peter Barron, seamen; John Connor, John Rose, George Brooks, ordinary seamen; and Dennis Dougherty, marine. The greater number, if not all, had protections at the time of entering and being taken. Two others were detained, John Wade and Thomas Hutchins, but were given up; the former on Captain Jones's assuring Captain Beresford he knew him to be a native citizen; the latter on a like assurance from D. Rogers. William Mitchell was in the service during 1805 and 1806, in the Mediterranean.

Extract of a letter from Major General Pinckney to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQUARTERS, CHARLESTON,
November 4, 1812.

Information having been given upon oath to Lieutenant Grandison, who at present commands in the Naval Department here, that six American seamen, who had been taken prisoners on board of our privateers, had been sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects, for treason, he called upon the marshal to retain double that number of British seamen as hostages. The marshal, in consequence of instructions from the Department of State, asked my advice on the subject, and I have given my opinion that they ought to be detained until the pleasure of the President shall be known. The testimony of Captain Moon is herewith. I hope, sir, you will have the goodness to have this business put in the proper train to have the President's pleasure on this subject communicated to the marshal.

Copy of a letter from Captain Moon, of the privateer Sarah Ann.

NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE,
October 14, 1812.

Six of my crew, claimed as British subjects, were this day taken out of jail and put on board His Majesty's brig the Sappho, and sailed for Jamaica, where, it is said, they are to be tried for their lives; consequently, I questioned each, respectively, as to the place of their nativity, and title to protection by the American Government, when they stated as follows, to wit:

David Dick, seaman, that he was born in the north of Ireland, but has resided in the United States ever since the year 1793; has served ten years in the United States' Navy, viz: on board the frigates Chesapeake, President, Constitution, John Adams, schooner Enterprise, and gunboat No. 2. David Dick, shoemaker, in Alexandria, is his uncle. Dick is about five feet six and a half inches high, dark hair, has a scar on his left elbow and one on each wrist; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

John Gaul, seamen, says he was born in Marblehead, State of Massachusetts, where his parents, brothers, and sisters now reside; is married in New York, and his wife (Mary Gaul) lives in Roosevelt street, No. 37; has a regular discharge from the Navy of the United States, by Captain Hugh G. Campbell, dated at St. Mary's, Georgia, 14th August, 1812; says he has served on board the United States' brig Vixen, and gunboats No. 10 and No. 158, from the last of which he was discharged. Gaul is twenty-seven years of age, about five feet seven inches high, brown hair, light complexion; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

Michael Pluck, ordinary seamen, says he was born in Baltimore; his parents are dead, but he is known by William, Doulan, Thomas Turner, and McDonald, of Baltimore; has a sister in some part of Pennsylvania, whose name is Ann Welsh; was never at sea before; never had a protection. Pluck is twenty-seven years old, five feet six and a half inches high, and has a scar on his left cheek bone; entered on board the Sarah Ann at Baltimore.

Thomas Rodgers, seamen, says he was born in Waterford, Ireland, but has resided many years in the United States, and has been duly naturalized; a copy of which naturalization is filed in the custom-house at Baltimore; is known by Joseph Carey, and Tom Rodgers, cork-cutter, both of Baltimore; has a wife and three children in Baltimore; has lost his protection, but requests Joseph Carey to do all he can to effect his discharge from the British. Rodgers entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

George Roberts, a colored man and seaman. This man I had not an opportunity of questioning, but I know him to be a native born citizen of the United States, of which fact he had every sufficient document, together with free papers. Roberts entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore, where he is married.

Sonty Taylor, boy, says he was born in Hackensack, New Jersey, but has neither friends, relations, nor acquaintance there; says Jane Snowden, of Savannah, Georgia, is his mother; never had a protection. Taylor is fifteen years old, has brown hair and light complexion; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Savannah.

Copy of a letter from Admiral Warren to Mr. Mitchell, agent for the exchange of American prisoners of war, dated HALIFAX, Oct. 21, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to receive your letter and its enclosures, relating to Thomas Dunn,* and beg leave to inform you that it appears the said man is married in England, has been eight years in His Majesty's service, and received a pension from Government; under these circumstances, and the man never having made any application for his discharge from prison, he continues on board the Staira.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant.

Extract of a letter from William H. Savage, late agent for American seamen and commerce at Jamaica, to the Secretary of State, dated

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1, 1812.

I take the liberty to enclose you copies of a correspondence which took place between Vice Admiral Stirling (commanding the Jamaica station) and myself, since the declaration of war. I should have furnished it you at an earlier period, but an accident prevented, which I was not aware of until my arrival at this city.

*The application was made at the request of his father, John Dunn, of Boston, who transmitted a deposition of his birth.

No. 1.

Copy of my letter to Vice Admiral Stirling, commanding on the Jamaica station, on the subject of American seamen, after the declaration of war.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, Aug. 6, 1812.

SIR: Enclosed is a copy of a letter received by me yesterday from on board His Majesty's ship Sappho, purporting to have been written by four American seamen on board that ship, with a view to solicit my aid towards effecting their discharge, in consequence of the declaration of war by the Government of the United States against Great Britain.

In making this application, I am fully aware that my duties ceased as agent for the commerce and seamen of the United States on the knowledge of such declaration being made known here; but, sir, I am led to believe that, at this period, it will not be deemed inadmissible on your part to receive, nor improper on mine to make, the request that you will be pleased to grant an order for the discharge of these seamen, feeling conscious (should they even not be protected with the usual documents afforded to citizens of the United States) that an English seaman would not declare himself otherwise than such under existing circumstances.

I seize the present opportunity, also, to forward to you twenty-one documents, as proofs of the citizenship of that number of seamen, said to have been impressed by ships of war on this station, the greatest number of which have been heretofore unsuccessfully claimed by me on behalf of the United States, and which may still comprise, at this time, some part of the crews of His Majesty's ships on this station.

I beg further to state to you, that I have received numerous applications from on board various of His Majesty's ships on this station, for the relief of seamen, who, I doubt not, are entitled to the protection of the American Government, many of them having with them the proofs of their citizenship, as I am led to believe from the assertions contained in their communications. Applications have also been made for the relief of many, without success; the latter amount in number to forty-six, as per list of names enclosed, several of whom, I understand, have been shifted (since their impressment) on board of other vessels than those they were at first taken on board of. All of which I beg to offer for your consideration, feeling, as I do, anxious to extend my last efforts in behalf of those seamen who are entitled to them, and at the same time being impressed with the idea that it would be foreign to you, sir, to retain any Americans in the service of the navy of Great Britain, contrary to their disposition, during the present conflict. I therefore take the liberty of adding to my former request, that you will be pleased to grant orders that such seamen may be discharged from duty on board His Majesty's ships on this station.

With sentiments of the highest respect, &c.
WILLIAM H. SAVAGE.

No. 2.

Copy of Vice Admiral Stirling's Secretary's letter in answer to mine to the Vice Admiral, of 6th August 1812.

ADMIRAL'S PENN, Aug. 7, 1812.

SIR: I am desired by Vice Admiral Stirling to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, and to acquaint you that directions were given some days ago that all seamen in the squadron under his command, who can prove themselves to be American born subjects, should be sent to the prison-ship until an exchange of prisoners is established between the two countries, in consequence of the late declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain.

I return, herewith, the papers which accompanied your letter, and am, sir, &c.

C. STIRLING, JR., Secretary.

No. 3.

Extract of a letter from William H. Savage, Esq., late agent for American seamen and commerce at Jamaica, to Charles Stirling, Jr., Esq., dated KINGSTON, Sept. 16, 1812.

In answer to my letter of the 6th ultimo, you were pleased to inform me that directions had been given by the Vice Admiral, some days prior to the date of my letter, for the removal of all native Americans (who could prove themselves such) from on board His Majesty's ships to that of the prison-ship; but as some time has now elapsed since you were pleased to give me this information, and learning that some instances of detention at present exist on board His Majesty's schooner Decouverte, I am led to embrace the subject again, as, in one instance, I shall hope to satisfy Vice Admiral Stirling of the man's being entitled to his removal from duty on board His Majesty's schooner of war. The person alluded to is Elijah Stirling, an American seaman, who was impressed from on board the British merchant ship Brilliant, at the bay of Honduras, in the early part of the year 1810, by His Majesty's schooner Flor del Mar, and has since been detained on board of various of His Majesty's ships on this station, although provided with a regular protection, which instrument this man got conveyed to me about the 20th of September following, and which was by me forwarded to Admiral Rowley, accompanied (as usual in like cases) with a request that the man might be discharged. On the receipt of my letter, the Admiral answered, through his secretary, that the nature of Stirling's impressment was such that he could not comply with my request; but which answer was unaccompanied, in return, with the protection in question, and what has become of it I am unable to say.

About this period I was led to understand from

Admiral Rowley, that all American seamen who should be impressed from on board any British merchant vessel would be retained in the service of His Majesty; but that all American seamen who should be impressed from on board of American vessels would, on application, accompanied by proof, be discharged. As this information was received about the period of my application for the discharge of Stirling, I was led to conclude it stamped the nature of his impressment; and what confirmed it in my mind was, that I received similar assurances to various applications made for American seamen, who had, under various circumstances, shipped on board of British ships, and were from thence impressed on board of His Majesty's ships of war, all of which, I hope, the Admiral will be pleased to take into consideration; for, to insist on the service of this man, I think, will be a dereliction to the marked manner of his amiable endeavors to distinguish and relieve American seamen from duty on board the squadron under his command. I beg to enclose a note from Mr. Meek, the late secretary, relative to my application for this man's discharge, and to observe that, if it is possible, the protection may yet be found among the papers of the late secretary, as it has not been usual to return me the protections of those men whose applications for discharge were not complied with.

I beg furthermore to observe, that there appears also to be on board His Majesty's schooner Decouverte two other American seamen, viz: John Englefield and Richard Lauderkin, the former of whom asserts that he served his apprenticeship to the trade of a cooper at Boston, but has lost his protection; the latter declares himself to be a native of Rhode Island, and that his protection has been destroyed by Mr. Oliver, commander of His Majesty's schooner Decouverte. I shall not now animadvert on the impropriety of such a circumstance, but request, should the instance here cited be found correct, that they may meet the attention of the Vice Admiral.

No. 4.

Extract of a letter from Vice Admiral Stirling's Secretary to W. H. Savage, Esq., in answer to his of the 16th September, 1812.

ADMIRAL'S PENN, Sept. 19, 1812.

I have just received your letter of the 16th instant, which I have laid before Vice Admiral Stirling, and I am directed to acquaint you that Elijah Stirling and other persons on board of His Majesty's schooner Decouverte, said to be American seamen, have not, when called upon, produced proof of being subjects of the United States. They do not fall under the description of persons which I informed you in my letter of the 7th ultimo were intended to be discharged from the King's service, and to be detained on board the prison-ship until an exchange of prisoners takes place with America.

The note from Mr. Meek, dated the 21st September, 1810, is returned herewith; and as it appears thereby that Admiral Rowley thought the circumstances under which Elijah Stirling was impressed did not permit him to be discharged, Vice Admiral Stirling does not feel himself justified in attending to the man's wishes on a bare assertion. The protection you allude to is not to be found among Admiral Rowley's papers left in this office.

[The following documents, relating to the same subject, were communicated to Congress by the Message of January 22, 1813.]

Extract of a letter from John Mitchell, Esq., agent for American prisoners of war at Halifax, to the Secretary of State, dated

DECEMBER 5, 1812.

I cover you a copy of a correspondence which took place in consequence of different applications I received, either by letter or personal, from persons detained on board His Britannic Majesty's ships of war in this place.

I formerly mentioned to you that the Admiral had assured me, that he would discharge all the citizens of the United States who were in the fleet, and actually did discharge several. This induced me to think I should be correct, and in the perfect line of my duty, in sending him a list of the applicants to me, and requesting an inquiry to be made, and discharges granted to all who were citizens of the United States. I, therefore, covered him a list of the names now enclosed to you, which produced his letter to me of the same date, (1st December, 1812.)

I read it with surprise, because some of the men had informed me their captains had refused to report them to the Admiral. Now, if no one here was or is allowed to do it, their situation is hopeless.

It is not my place, sir, to reason with you on this business. Proof of nativity, in his first letter, is a strong expression; and how few are in possession of it, and how many who cannot obtain it!

The second paragraph in the second letter prevents my interfering; and I have since been obliged to send a man away, requesting him to apply to his commanding officer.

Copy of a letter from John Mitchell, Esq., agent for American prisoners of war at Halifax, to Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren, dated

DECEMBER 1, 1812.

SIR: Since the sailing of the last cartels, in which you were pleased to send home several Americans who had been in His Britannic Majesty's service, others, who are now on board of the Centurion and Statira, have requested of me to procure their discharge, and to be sent home.

Will you, sir, have the goodness to direct an inquiry, and order the release of such as are citizens of the United States?

Besides the enclosed list, I am told there are others, whose names I have not.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN MITCHELL, Agent, &c.

Relations with France.

Copy of a letter from Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren, to John Mitchell, Esq., agent for American prisoners of war at Halifax, dated

DECEMBER 1, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, respecting some men therein mentioned on board His Majesty's ships under my command, said to be citizens of the United States; and, in reply, beg to acquaint you, that whenever I have received representations from the captains of His Majesty's ships of any part of their crews being citizens of America, with sufficient proof of their nativity, I have directed their discharge from the service.

I must observe to you, that I cannot permit the interference of any applications from men belonging to His Majesty's ships, but through their commanding officers; and, in your department, of prisoners of war only, I shall at all times be most happy to receive your communications.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN BORLASE WARREN.

Copy of a letter from John Mitchell, Esq., agent for American prisoners of war at Halifax, to Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren, dated

DECEMBER 3, 1812.

SIR: I had yesterday the honor to receive your letter dated the 1st instant, and observe that you cannot permit the interference of any application from men on board His Britannic Majesty's ships of war, but through their commanding officers.

Desirous of conforming, as far as possible, to established regulations, permit me the honor to inquire of your Excellency, if, by your letter, I am to understand that I am not to receive the applications of seamen declaring themselves citizens of the United States, who are on board of His Majesty's ships of war, and communicate the same to you? If this is the meaning, I shall most certainly conform, though I must lament the regulation. I have the honor to be, &c.

Copy of a letter from Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren to John Mitchell, Esquire, agent for American prisoners of war at Halifax, dated

DECEMBER 4, 1812.

SIR: In reply to your letter dated yesterday, I have to acquaint you, that whenever any address is made relative to men on board His Majesty's ships, it must be by the commanders of such vessels direct.

I cannot permit any application by other persons, in time of war, but in the above mode.

It will always afford me pleasure to attend to your wishes in any respect relative to the situation or exchange of prisoners, or to afford any aid or relief in my power. I have, &c.

From Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy.

U. S. FRIGATE PRESIDENT,
Boston, Jan. 14, 1813.

SIR: Herewith you will receive two muster-books of His Britannic Majesty's vessels Moselle and Sappho, found on board the British packet Swallow.

As the British have always denied that they detained on board their ships of war American citizens, knowing them to be such, I send you the enclosed, as a public document of their own, to prove how ill such an assertion accords with their practice.

It will appear by these two muster-books that, so late as August last, about an eighth part of the Moselle and Sappho's crews were Americans; consequently, if there is only a quarter part of that proportion on board their other vessels, that they have an infinitely greater number of Americans in their service than any American has yet had an idea of.

Any further comment of mine on this subject I consider unnecessary, as the enclosed documents speak but too plainly for themselves.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract—Mr. Barlow to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 2, 1812.

I have the honor to transmit herewith the copy of my note of yesterday to the Duke of Bassano. The importance of the objects, and the urgency of the occasion, I hope will justify the solicitude with which I have pressed the propositions.

The result, as far as it may be known within a few days, shall be transmitted by the Wasp. The Hornet sailed from Cherbourg the 26th of April, with orders to land a messenger in England with my despatches for Mr. Russell, but not to wait a return from London.

[Enclosed in the preceding.]

Extract—Mr. Barlow to the Duke of Bassano.

MAY 1, 1812.

In the note I had the honor to address to your Excellency on the 10th November last, the spirit of the English Government was so far noticed as to anticipate the fact, now proved by experience, that its Orders in Council, violating the rights of neutrals would not be revoked. The declaration of the Prince Regent, on the 21st of April, has placed that fact beyond all question. In doing this he has repeated the assertion, so often advanced by his ministers and judges, that the decrees of France of a similar character are likewise unrevoked.

You will notice that he finds a new argument for this conclusion in your Excellency's late report to the Emperor concerning neutral rights, in which you avoid taking notice of any repeal or modification of these decrees, or of their non-application to the United States. We know, indeed, that they do not apply to the United States, because we do not suffer our flag to be denationalized in the manner evidently contemplated by the Emperor in the rule he meant to establish. But it would have been well if your Excellency had noticed their non-application to the United States, since His Majesty has uniformly done it in his decisions of prize causes since November, 1810.

It is much to be desired that the French Government would now make and publish an authentic act declaring the Berlin and Milan decrees, as relative to the United States, to have ceased in November, 1810; declaring that they have not been applied in any instance since that time, and that they shall not be applied in future.

The case is so simple, the demand so just, and the necessity so urgent, that I cannot withhold my confidence in the prompt and complete success of my proposition.

The declaration I solicit, though important in itself, should not be sent to the United States alone. It ought to be accompanied with two other acts of equal or superior moment. These are, a convention of indemnity for past spoiliations on American property, in violation of our mutual rights, and a treaty of commerce, founded on the liberal principle of reciprocal benefit and concession, which I have understood from your Excellency that His Majesty is ready to prescribe.

Extract—Mr. Barlow to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 12, 1812.

After the date of my last, of which I have the honor to enclose you a copy, I found, from a pretty sharp conversation with the Duke of Bassano, that there was a singular reluctance to answering my note of the 1st of May. Some traces of that reluctance you will perceive in the answer that finally came, of which a copy is here enclosed. This, though dated the 10th, did not come to me till last evening. I consider the communication to me so important, in the present crisis of our affairs with England, that I despatch the Wasp immediately to carry it to Mr. Russell, with orders to return with his answer as soon as possible.

I am confident that the President will approve the motive of my solicitude in this affair, and the earnest manner in which I pressed the Minister with it, as soon as my knowledge of the declaration of the Prince Regent enabled me to use the argument that belonged to the subject. When, in the conversation above alluded to, the Duke first produced to me the decree of 28th April, 1811, I made no comment on the strange manner in which it had been so long concealed from me, and probably from you. I only asked him if that decree had been published. He said no; but declared it had been communicated to my predecessor here, and likewise sent to Mr. Serrurier, with orders to communicate it to you. I assured him that it was not among the archives of this Legation; that I never before had heard of it; and since he had consented to answer my note, I desired him to send me, in that official manner, a copy of that decree, and of any other documents that might prove to the incredulous of my country (not to me) that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were in good faith, and unconditionally repealed with regard to the United States. He then promised me he would do it; and he has performed his promise.

I send you a copy of the April decree, as likewise of the letter of the Grand Judge, and that of the Minister of Finance, though the two latter pieces have been before communicated to our Government, and published.

[Enclosed in Mr. Barlow's despatch of May 12, 1812.]
The Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow.

PARIS, May 10, 1812.

SIR: In conversing with you about the note which you did me the honor to address to me on the 1st May, I could not conceal from you my surprise at the doubt which you had expressed in that note respecting the revocation of the decrees of Berlin and Milan. That revocation was proven by many official acts, by all my correspondence with your predecessors and with you, by the decisions in favor of American vessels. You have done me the honor to ask a copy of the letters which the Grand Judge and the Minister of Finance wrote on the 25th of December, 1810, to secure the first effects of that measure; and you have said, sir, that the decree of the 28th April, 1811, which proves definitively the revocation of the decrees of Berlin and Milan in regard to the Americans was not known to you.

I have the honor to send you, as you have desired, a copy of these three acts: you will consider them without doubt, sir, as the plainest answer which I could give to this part of your note. As to the two other questions to which that note relates, I will take care to lay them before the Emperor. You know already, sir, the sentiments which His Majesty has expressed in favor of American commerce, and the good dispositions which have induced him to appoint a Plenipotentiary to treat with you on that important interest.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my high consideration.

THE DUKE OF BASSANO.

PALACE OF ST. CLOUD,
April 28, 1811.

NAPOLEON, Emperor of the French, &c. &c.

On the report of our Minister of Foreign Relations:

Seeing, by a law passed on the 2d of March, 1811, the Congress of the United States has ordered the execution of the provisions of the act of non-intercourse which prohibits the vessels and merchandise of Great Britain, her colonies, and dependencies, from entering into the ports of the United States:

Considering that the said law in an act of resistance to the arbitrary pretensions consecrated by the British Orders in Council, and a formal refusal to adhere to a system invading the independence of neutral Powers, and of their flag, we have decreed, and do decree, as follows:

The decrees of Berlin and Milan are definitively, and to date from the 1st day of November last, considered as not having existed [non avenus] in regard to American vessels.

By the Emperor:

NAPOLEON.

The Minister Secretary of State:

THE COUNT DARU.

B.

Mr. Barlow to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, October 25, 1812.

SIR: By the letter from the Duke of Bassano, and my answer, copies of which are herewith enclosed, you will learn that I am invited to go to Wilna, and that I have accepted the invitation. Though the proposal was totally unexpected, and, on many accounts, disagreeable, it was impossible to refuse it without giving offence, or at least risking a postponement of a negotiation which I have reason to believe is now in a fair way to a speedy and advantageous close.

From the circumstances which have preceded and which accompany this proposition, I am induced to believe that it is made with a view of expediting the business. There may, indeed, be an intention of coupling it with other views not yet brought forward. If so, and they should extend to objects beyond the simplicity of our commercial interests and the indemnities which we claim, I shall not be at a loss how to answer them.

I shall have the honor to write you as soon as possible from Wilna, and shall return to Paris without any unnecessary delay.

I remain, &c.

JOEL BARLOW.

Hon. JAS. MONROE, Secretary of State.

[Enclosed in Mr. Barlow's despatch of October 25.]

The Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow.

WILNA, October 11, 1812.

SIR: I have had the honor to make known to you how much I regretted, in the negotiation commenced between the United States and France, the delays which inevitably attended a correspondence carried on at so great a distance. Your Government has desired to see the epoch of this arrangement draw near. His Majesty is animated by the same dispositions, and willing to assure to the negotiation a result the most prompt; he has thought that it would be expedient to suppress the intermediaries, and to transfer the conference to Wilna. His Majesty has, in consequence, authorized me, sir, to treat directly with you; and, if you will come to this town, I dare hope that, with the desire which animates us both to conciliate such important interests, we will immediately be enabled to remove all the difficulties which, until now, have appeared to impede the progress of the negotiation.

12th CON. 2d Sess.—40

I have apprized the Duke of Dalberg that his mission was thus terminated; and I have laid before His Majesty the actual state of the negotiation, to the end that, when you arrive at Wilna, the different questions being already illustrated [éclaircis] either by your judicious observations, or by the instructions I shall have received, we may, sir, conclude, without delay, an arrangement so desirable, and so conformable to the mutually amicable views of our two Governments. Accept, sir, &c.

THE DUKE OF BASSANO.

[Enclosed in Mr. Barlow's despatch of October 25.]

Extract—Mr. Barlow to the Duke of Bassano.

PARIS, October 25, 1812.

In consequence of the letter you did me the honor to write me on the 11th of this month, I accept your invitation, and leave Paris to-morrow for Wilna, where I hope to arrive in fifteen or eighteen days from this date.

The negotiation on which you have done me the honor to invite me at Wilna is so completely prepared in all its parts between the Duke of Dalberg and myself, and, as I understand, sent on to you for your approbation about the 18th of the present month, that I am persuaded, if it could have arrived before the date of your letter, the necessity of this meeting would not have existed, as I am confident that His Majesty would have found the project reasonable and acceptable in all its parts, and would have ordered that Minister to conclude and sign both the Treaty of Commerce and Convention of Indemnities.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to legislate upon the subject, and that the petitions, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
November 18, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor, in compliance with the request of the Committee of Ways and Means, to submit the following statement of facts, so far as they have come to my knowledge, in relation to the late importations of British manufactures.

By the act of 2d March, 1811, it was enacted that certain provisions of the act "to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," should (until the President's proclamation, authorized by the act, should have been issued) have full force, and be immediately carried into effect against Great Britain, her colonies, and dependencies. The provisions thus re-enacted forbade, under penalty of forfeiting the vessel and cargo, to import into the United States, or to put on board any vessel, in a foreign port, with intent thus to import, any merchandise of British growth or manufacture, from whatever port imported, and any merchandise whatever from a British port.

It was further enacted, by the same act, (of March 2, 1811,) that, in case Great Britain should so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President of the United States should declare the fact by proclamation; that such proclamation should be admitted as evidence, and that no other evidence should be admitted of such revocation or modification, in any suit or prosecution for the recovery of the forfeitures abovementioned; and that the restrictions, above stated, should, from the date of such proclamation, cease, and be discontinued.

By the act of Congress of 18th of June, 1812, war was declared between the United States and Great Britain.

On the 23d of the same month, an Order in Council was issued by the British Government, purporting to be a revocation of the edicts of that Government which violated the neutral commerce of the United States, subject, however, to certain conditions, specified in the said order.

Immediately after promulgation of that order, British merchandise was laden on board the American vessels, then in the harbors of Great Britain, with intent to import the same into the United States. It has been stated, and it is believed, that by far the greater part of those shipments were made in conformity with previous orders from merchants in America to their correspondents in England, by which these had been instructed to make such shipments whenever a revocation of the former British Orders in Council should take place; it having been presumed by the American merchants that such a revocation would, by virtue of the abovementioned act of Congress, of 2d March, 1811, produce a discontinuance of the prohibitions to import British merchandise into the United States.

On the 30th day of July following, the account of the declaration of war having reached England, a temporary embargo was laid on American vessels; but, on the ensuing day, they were, by order of Council, permitted to continue to take cargoes of British merchandise, and to proceed to the United States, being for that purpose provided with licenses protecting them, notwithstanding the existing hostilities, against capture by British cruisers. It has been stated that the time for obtaining such licenses was, with respect to American vessels then in England, limited to the fifteenth of September last; and, if that be correct, all the vessels of that description (with the exception of some, which, having been captured by American cruisers, retaken by the British, and sent into Halifax, have not yet been released, and perhaps of some which may have had very long voyages) may be presumed to have arrived in the United States.

It appearing that, however reasonable the expectation of the discontinuance of the non-importation act might have been, yet, not only the act had made the President's proclamation the only evidence of the fact, but that the restrictions were to cease, not from the date of the revocation of the Orders in Council, but from the date of the proclamation; that the act to put merchandise on board a vessel, with intent to import, was forbidden by those restrictions; and that (all the merchandise having been thus laden, either prematurely, and before a proclamation could, in point of time, be issued by the President, or after the knowledge of war) all the shipments were therefore made in direct contravention of an existing provision; the collectors were instructed to seize and libel all such vessels and cargoes, without discrimination. No exception was made with respect to vessels captured and sent in by American privateers, because, if American property, their right to make prizes was, by law, confined to enemies' property, and, whether American or enemies', the forfeiture to the United States had been incurred from the date of the shipment, and could not be superseded by a subsequent capture. Instructions to prevent any interference in that respect, by either public or private armed vessels, were also issued by the President, such interference being considered wholly unnecessary, since the vessels from England were of their own accord coming into the ports of the United States. It appears, however, that in some cases, the owners of privateers, that have made captures of that description, intend to contest the prior claim to forfeiture of the United States; and that, in those cases, the question must be decided by the courts.

Previous to the time when those importations took place, it being understood that the judges of some of the district courts had restored to the claimants prohibited merchandise, under seizure, on their giving bond for the appraised value thereof, the district attorneys were, on the 15th day of May, 1812, instructed by the Comptroller to oppose every motion to that effect, for the reasons stated in his letter. It appearing afterwards that the judges of some of the most commercial districts had, notwithstanding that opposition on the part of the United States, continued to order the restoration of British merchandise, no appeal being practicable, since the orders were immediately executed, and the commercial interest of those districts where the restoration was refused, being deeply affected by the want of uniformity in the decisions, the Comptroller did, on the 5th day of October last, authorize the district attorneys to withdraw their opposition in all cases of bona fide American property. Copies of his two circulars on that subject are enclosed. All the prohibited merchandise restored to the claimants has been so restored by order of court, without any interference other than a forced acquiescence on the part of the Executive officers of Government. With respect to the mode of appraisal, it appears that the merchandise has generally been valued at its prime cost, adding thereto only the amount of duties, for which separate bonds have, in most cases, been taken. To this there are some exceptions, the valuation being, in Rhode Island, below, and in Connecticut, probably above the prime cost of the goods.

From returns transmitted by the collectors, some of which are in part on estimate, it appears that the prime cost of all the British merchandise imported as above stated, subsequent to the alleged revocation of the British Orders in Council, amounts to about four millions sterling; and that the bonds given for the value will fall short of eighteen million of dollars, exclusively of the bonds given for duties, and which may be estimated at five millions of dollars. This embraces all the importations already made, and will not be materially increased by vessels still on their way, unless it be true, as has been asserted, that American vessels, which had sailed to the Baltic, under certain British licenses, will, on their arrival in England, be provided with new licenses for their return to the United States, with cargoes of British merchandise. Such importations would form a class distinct from those now under consideration. Of the importations heretofore made, about three-eighths in value were in vessels which sailed from England between the 23d of June and 1st of August last, and the residue in vessels which sailed subsequent to the month of July. The whole may be arranged under the following heads, viz:

1. Merchandise purchased prior to the non-importation act, of 2d March, 1811, and which had remained warehoused in England at the risk of the American owners.

2. Merchandise purchased subsequent to the act of 2d March, 1811, and prior to the 23d of June, 1812, and which, since its purchase, had remained in the same manner in England.

3. Merchandise shipped on American account and risk, in pursuance of orders given prior to the 23d June, 1812, but not paid for till after the execution of such orders, and on different terms of credit.

4. Merchandise shipped in pursuance of similar orders, but consigned, in the first instance, to the order of the American correspondent of the British merchants, to be delivered, according to contingent instructions, to the real purchaser; which merchandise becomes American property when thus delivered, but remains till then on British account and risk.

5. Merchandise shipped entirely on British account.

There are no data from which, without further investigation, the amount of each class can be estimated.

The advance on the prime cost at which the merchandise thus imported has been, or can be sold, is not precisely known, and will undoubtedly vary according to the species of the goods. It has been asserted that, in some sales, the advance was sufficient to cover not only the prime cost, charges, and duties, but even the whole of the amount of the bonds. That this may have actually taken place in some particular instances, may be true; and it is probable that the importers would, so far as they could, cover, in their sales, the estimated risk of being obliged to pay those bonds. But, so far as can be judged from the current price of goods, and from some sales said to have taken place, the supposition that they have been, or can be, generally, made so as to cover the whole amount of the bonds, is believed to be greatly exaggerated.

It is, however, an indisputable fact that the importation falls generally far short of the ordinary former annual importations from Great Britain, and of the actual demand for most species of the merchandise imported; and that the goods are accordingly generally sold at an advance greater than the usual profits of importers. The difference constitutes an extraordinary profit, and is a tax levied on the community by the persons who have imported the merchandise contrary to law; which extra profit or tax is solely due to the non-importation act continuing in force with respect to all other persons and importations.

Of the forfeitures accrued, one-half is by law vested in the custom-house officers, or informers, and the other half in the United States. The power to remit the share of the United States, and of all other persons, in whole or in part, and on such terms and conditions as may be deemed reasonable and just, is by law vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. But, considering the magnitude and unforeseen nature of the case, it was thought proper not to exercise that authority until Congress had taken the subject into consideration, and prescribed, if they thought proper, the course to be pursued. All the petitions already received remain therefore suspended; and, in order to avoid useless expenses, the parties have been generally advised to delay making their applications in the manner directed by law, until the decision of Congress should be ascertained.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

[Circular.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

Comptroller's Office, May 15, 1812.

SIR: As it may be supposed that, on a seizure under the law of March, 1, 1809, commonly called the non-importation law, the claimant has a right to the repossession of the property seized, by giving bond as pointed out by the 89th section of the collection law, it is deemed proper to submit to you, respectfully, the views taken of this subject at this Department. If such be a correct construction of it, it is plain that it will go far towards defeating the ends contemplated by its passage.

The policy and intention of this act evidently was to shut the door as effectually as possible against the introduction of British manufactures. The motive of taking bond from a claimant under the 89th section of the collection law, as in all similar or analogous cases, unquestionably is, not that it may be received in lieu of the thing surrendered, but to compel or insure the forthcoming of the thing itself. But, the state of things existing, and always liable to exist, under the non-importation act, would hinder the operation of this obvious principle. The enhanced value of the British commodity, arising from a general scarcity, may make it, in most cases, the interest of the illicit importer to forfeit his bond, the penalty being regulated by the nominal or invoice price of the goods, or a sufficient intermediate rise taking place before the trial, although the penalty was fixed according to the market value at the time of seizure. The act, in its foundation, its objects, and entire scope, aims at the total exclusion from the country of all British goods. If thwarted in that object, its next is to transfer them, when unlawfully introduced, to the hands of the Government. To suffer them, when seized for an apparent breach of this law, to pass to the immediate and virtual ownership of the claimant, and be subject to his disposition, would, in a great degree, have the effect to turn it aside from all its original intentions.

As the design of the act would thus be liable to frustration, it may be asked where the authority is found for this alleged right in the importer? Its allowance, if it would endanger the primary objects of the Legislature, should rest on express words, or implication as imperious. The 18th section of the act of the first of March, 1809, in referring to the collection law as the rule of proceeding, does so, it is apprehended, only in relation to the distribution of the forfeitures. The first clause of that section stands as an integral provision, relying upon no other law for its support, and capable of being executed as to all the purposes of a civil or criminal suit, merely on its own footing, with the aid, indeed, of the incidental powers of the court. It is not seen that this general or resulting power, often inherent in courts, to order the repossession of a thing claimed on stipulation, or caution being given, either where it was for the benefit of all concerned, or where the thing itself was perishable, or where hardships was feared to an innocent owner, would be applicable under this law. But, if this be the ground of the importer's claim, it, of course, leaves out of sight, in every relation to the point, the 89th section of the collection law. If he cannot, then, stand upon the faith of any imperative injunction put upon the court, it will follow that his application must be addressed to its discretion; and you are, in such case, requested to resist the application, as opposed to the demonstrable policy of every part of the act. That a redelivery to the party should have been made to take place, by special provision, under the collection law, is reconcileable with the system of which it is a part, which looks only at a derivative offence against the revenue, without anywhere contemplating an original exclusion of the article seized. But, a similar course must be essentially repugnant to the spirit of a law which addresses itself to the interests of a foreign Power, declaring that that Power shall be debarred all benefit of transporting her wares to the United States, and seeks to close, with penal sanctions, the very threshold to their entrance. The concluding part of the eighth section of the law further distinguishes it from the collection act, and by prohibiting, under a penalty, the purchase of British goods, knowing them to be liable to seizure, holds out an intimation that every practicability to their sale should be foreclosed, while their liability to condemnation remains undecided.

I beg leave to call your attention to the third section of the act, in pari materia, of the 2d of March, 1811. The first proviso of this section, by pointing out a specific case in which British goods, unlawfully introduced, may be delivered to the owner upon bond, furnishes, it is conceived, an argument of weight, that in no other state of things ought it to be done.

These suggestions are respectfully submitted for your consideration and government. You will, doubtless, be able to extend them, and will superadd such other views in elucidation of the meaning ascribed to the law at this Department; as your own reflections may supply. Under a conviction of its importance to the genuine intentions of the Government, it is particularly wished that you would resist, in every instance, a restoration to the claimant of the property seized, and never part, unless by the express order of the court, with the substantial security of a lien for the inferior and precarious safeguard of personal responsibility.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

[Circular to District Attorneys.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Comptroller's Office, October 5, 1812.

SIR: Since the circular of the 15th of May, addressed to you from this office, it appears, from information received, that, in some of the districts, the courts hold themselves bound to deliver up the vessel and goods, seized in violation of the non-importation law, on satisfactory bond given by the claimant, while, in others, the opposition made to this course by the attorneys of the United States, has been found to avail with the court to refuse such delivery.

It is desirable that the law in question, whatever views may still be entertained of its original intention, should operate equally on the merchants or other owners of property seized, in every part of the Union.

Seeing, therefore, that a different line of practice is found to govern the courts in different districts, upon this point, and in order to prevent, as far as possible, any inconvenience or supposed injustice to individuals, resulting from such difference, you are hereby requested to withhold the opposition you were requested to make to the delivery of the property to the claimant, on his giving bond; the object being, that, as the decisions of the courts are not to be controlled by this Department, you may thus lend your aid, negatively at least, towards the uniform execution of the law. You will be pleased, however, to consider this relaxation as extended to property owned by American citizens only, and to urge, in all cases, a true and adequate appraisement.

I have the honor to be, &c.

RICHARD RUSH.

— — —, Attorney of the U. S. for — — —.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 23, 1812.

SIR: I had already transmitted an answer to your letter of the 18th instant, when I had the honor to receive that of the 20th, requesting, in addition to the statement of facts, such further and other views of the subject of the late importations of British manufactures, as I might think proper, and particularly, whether, in my opinion, their importation has not been actually and materially advantageous to the Government.

Having, in the answer already transmitted, stated all the important facts within my knowledge, I cannot present the subject in any new or other view than that exhibited by those facts.

The payment of five millions of dollars for duties on those importations, had been stated, and is, advantageous to Government. Indirect aid may also, perhaps, have been derived from the increase of supplies, and from the return of American capital, produced by that event. But these advantages, whatever they may be, have been forced upon Government, and cannot be urged as a service rendered by these importers. Had those advantages been supposed sufficient to outweigh other political considerations, the importations might have been, and still might be, permitted and regulated by law. In the case of the Calcutta vessels, whose cargoes (for the landing of which in the United States bond had been given in India) have, by the act of 5th of July last, been admitted to entry, this was done on the express condition of the merchandise being warehoused, and remaining subject to the future disposition of Government—thus reserving the power to fix the terms on which those cargoes should be restored to the owners and their sale be permitted. In the case now under consideration, the persons who have imported contrary to law, do not seem entitled to more advantageous terms than would probably have been imposed, had a previous permission been granted.

Upon the whole, I continue in the opinion, submitted with great deference to the committee, that the one half of the forfeitures, which would otherwise fall to the share of collectors, ought to be remitted; but that, with respect to the one-half belonging to the United States, justice to the community requires that, when remitted, at least an equivalent may be secured to the public for extra profit beyond that on common importations, which arises from the continuance of the non-importation act.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

HON. LANGDON CHEVES, Chairman, &c.

Remission of Forfeitures.Examination of Committees of Merchants, &c.

Several committees of the petitioners and other merchants interested in these importations, attended your committee: these were, John G. Coster, John Mason, Washington Irving, and Abraham R. Laurence, from New York; Nathan Appleton, from Boston; Caleb Cresson, junior, William Schlatter, and Samuel Harvey, from Philadelphia; and Luke Tiernan, Philip E. Thomas, and Evan Thomas, from Baltimore.

The statements made by these gentlemen, who are men of character and respectability, were delivered, apparently, with such fairness and candor, as induced your committee to give much credit to them. The statements made by the committee from New York have been corroborated and confirmed by declarations made on oath, by persons disinterested, as well as those interested in these importations.

NEW YORK.—The committee from New York stated, that the current reports of enormous advances obtained by them, were not well founded; that some of them were entirely unfounded; that they had, for example, heard it stated that three hundred per cent. had been obtained in New York; that a local mode of selling English goods in New York, must have laid the foundation of this misstatement; that it is usual in that city to demand and obtain three for one, in the sale of such goods: which means £3 New York currency for £1 sterling, which really yields but sixty-eight and two-thirds per cent. advance on the prime cost. They admitted that particular articles had been sold for very high prices; that these prices, however, were not exacted from a desire or determination to include in them the penalties which might be enforced by the Government, but from the great competition which existed in the market for the articles; that, for these articles, there was, to use the words of Mr. Irving, one of the committee, "a ravenous demand;" that it was understood that there were three army contractors, at one time, bidding upon each other; that these articles were few in number, and formed but a small part of the amount imported; that they did not exceed one-eighth part of that amount; that there were none of them in the invoices of some importers; that Mr. Coster, one of the petitioners, had imported to the amount of nearly £20,000 sterling, prime cost, and had not received an article of this description; that the goods which commanded such high prices consisted, principally, of blankets and coarse woollens; that these were bulky articles, and paid a high freight; that the same circumstance made them liable to an extraordinary portion of other charges; that the very high prices which were obtained, were often received by second and third purchasers, and not by the importers; that there are three descriptions of dealers in these goods in New York: 1st. The large importers. 2dly. Large purchasers, who have money at command, who are well acquainted with the state of the market for every article, and, when there is a scarcity of a particular article, monopolize it and raise the price—these are called jobbers. And, 3dly. The retailers; and they stated, that the very high prices alluded to had frequently been received by the second, and, sometimes, by the last description of persons, and not by the petitioners. Hardware, cotton goods, glass ware, and fine goods, generally, have not been sold at high prices. Some goods have become unsaleable, from change of fashions; some come into disadvantageous competition with American manufactures, which have grown up or increased in quantity, while these goods have been lying in England; some are not worth cost and charges. Goods for the Southern markets (South Carolina and Georgia, for example) are unsaleable, from the expense or impracticability of land carriage, the risk of water conveyance, from the cruisers of the enemy, and other circumstances of war. The occurrence of peace and free intercourse would make the importers great losers on many of those importations. The following were stated as the ordinary charges: four per cent. export duty; two per cent. inland charges on valuable fine dry goods; the same charges on coarse goods are much greater; one per cent. for packing, wrappers, &c.; one per cent. for insurance and storage against fire till shipped; two per cent. freight on the average of fine goods; ten per cent. on coarse goods; on crockery, from two hundred to three hundred per cent. insurance against sea risk, &c; three per cent. on the aggregate amount of value as usually calculated in policies; commission for purchasing, from two and a half to five per cent.; one per cent. for receiving and paying over the remittance. The average of the lowest duties, as calculated at the custom-house, amounts to thirty-three and one-third per cent. on the prime cost; on crockery and glass ware, hardware, plated ware, silks, millinery, &c., fifty per cent. The duty is calculated by adding ten per cent. on the prime cost, and on all charges which precede the shipment, except commission and outside packages.

The following were stated as extraordinary charges and losses: One and a half per cent. for extra storage and insurance against fire. Many of the goods lay in store for more than eighteen months: average storage twelve months; seven per cent. (the legal interest of the State of New York) for the average detention of one year on the purchase money. The goods which have been disposed of, were sold on a credit, without interest, of from six to twelve months; average seven to eight months. A great portion of the goods will remain long on hand; all Spring goods, at least till the Spring. Great charges and embarrassments have been incurred from capture by American privateers. Cargoes have been carried into and delivered in ports distant from those in which they were owned, and to which they were destined. Importers have sustained grievous court charges under the prosecutions directed by the Government. In New York, the courts have authorized a separate libel against the property of every importer, on each of which the costs have been $50 25, though the property may not have consisted of more than a single package. The gross charges will average sixty per cent. on fine goods, and on coarse, they will be greater. They admit that, if the penalties and forfeitures be remitted, the petitioners will have a handsome profit, not much, however, exceeding the usual profits of ordinary trade, and it will be the whole profit of two or three years of embarrassed, and otherwise losing commerce. If the bonds be exacted, it will greatly distress all the importers. Many, it will ruin. The petitioners had given no orders which authorized the shipment of their goods under the actual circumstances which attend their shipment. It was an error of judgment in their agents, though it was a very general error, and one which ought not to prejudice the importer. It was confidently believed in England, that the importation would be permitted, and deemed legal. A printed paper, of which a copy is annexed, was circulated among all those engaged in the American trade, as proof that there was no danger in these shipments. The petitioners knew so little of the actual state of the fact, that they were, at first, greatly afraid of British capture. Those who shipped after the existence of the war was known, did it to get the property out of the hands of the enemy, choosing to rely rather on the justice and the moderation of their own Government, than the forbearance of a foreign Government and an enemy. If the property had lain in England to the end of the war, it would have been ruinous to the owners. A portion of their property was originally invested in British manufactures, because they had no means of getting it home without great sacrifices, and on account of the actual and growing depreciation of the paper credit of Great Britain at the time.

The petitioners have never violated any of the laws of the country, while their particular interests have often been injuriously and deeply affected by them.

Some of the petitioners might, by a compromise, which was offered to them by the American privateers, which had captured their property, have obtained it by the payment of only two and a half per cent.; and though this would not have given them any legal security, it might have enabled them actually to evade the operation of the law, as they believe some persons, dealing less fairly, have done by the same means. These petitioners, incapable of such an act, have relied on the justice of their own Government. They did not believe—the citizens of New York, generally, had no idea, that, under the hard circumstances of their case, their own Government would either forfeit their property, or mulct them where they intended no violation of the laws of the country.

[Copy of the printed paper referred to in the foregoing statement.]

Extract from the present non-importation act of the United States.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in case Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President of the United States shall declare the fact by proclamation, and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence, and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification, in any suit or prosecution, which may be instituted under the fourth section of the act to which this is a supplement. And the restrictions imposed, or which may be imposed, by virtue of the said act, shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Monroe, the American Secretary of State, to His Majesty's Minister, Mr. Foster, dated

WASHINGTON, July 26, 1811.

"It is in the power of the British Government, at this time, to enable the President to set the non-importation aside, by rendering to the United States an act of justice. If Great Britain will cease to violate their neutral rights, by revoking her Orders in Council, on which event alone the President has the power, I am instructed to inform you, that he will, without delay, exercise it, by terminating the operation of this law."

BOSTON.—The gentleman who attended on the part of the merchants of Boston, made a statement, in all important particulars the same as the foregoing statement of the committee from New York, except so far as the following particulars may distinguish them:

He stated that he was in England from June, 1810, to May, 1811. That large quantities of goods were purchased and prepared for shipment, before 2d February, 1811, on account of the merchants of Boston, which arrived at the shipping ports too late to be shipped before the day last mentioned. A portion of these were shipped in the ensuing Spring and Summer to Halifax and Montreal, and the greater part of those thus shipped, have been introduced into the United States since the war.

The remainder of the goods, purchased before the 2d February, 1811, forms part of those which have been lately imported into the United States, directly from Great Britain. Considerable portions of the goods thus imported, were purchased subsequently to the 2d February, 1811, and before the revocation of the British Orders in Council, by those who had funds in England which they could not bring home; and there was a very considerable portion of these importations purchased immediately after the revocation of the Orders in Council. The last description of goods was shipped in pursuance of specific orders previously given, which were to be executed when the shipment of them should be deemed legal, or by confidential agents in England, acting under general powers. The general orders relative to the shipment of the goods on hand, or those ordered, were, to ship when it should be legal to do so.

The goods purchased before 2d February, 1811, were purchased on the usual credit of three and six months. Those purchased between that date and the revocation of the Orders in Council, were almost exclusively purchased with cash, as the only object of the purchase was to invest the money of the purchasers. The greater part of those purchased at the moment of the revocation was purchased with cash which had been placed in England for the purpose.

At the period of the declaration of war, the exchange was at twenty per cent. discount. Afterwards, it was difficult to negotiate exchange at all, and it was thrown something under that depreciation. Since the late importations, it has risen, and is now at from fourteen to fifteen per cent. discount.

The goods which were purchased after the 2d February, 1811, and before the revocation of the Orders in Council, were purchased at a lower than the usual rate. In six months after 2d February, 1811, cotton goods suffered a depression equal to fifteen per cent. After the revocation, there was a small advance.

Generally, the importers of British goods were not the shippers of American produce to the Peninsula, or elsewhere. There are exceptions; many houses, much engaged in the shipments to the Peninsula, are among the late importers. A very large portion of the goods lately imported on account of the merchants of Boston, were imported by those engaged in the exportations to the Peninsula, who never imported British goods before. Probably three-fourths of the importations into Boston have been sold. The extraordinary profit beyond that of peace and free intercourse, is about from five to ten per cent. The late importations are less than the usual Fall importations.

PHILADELPHIA.—The committee from Philadelphia confirmed, in all important particulars, as applicable to that city, the statement of the committee from New York, and added the following particulars: The merchants of Philadelphia send off their orders for English manufactures from nine to twelve months before the period at which they expect the arrival of the goods. A considerable portion of the late importations, which have been made on account of the merchants of Philadelphia, were prepared for shipment by December, 1810. A considerable portion was purchased between February, 1811, and the revocation of the Orders in Council, and a few were purchased immediately after the revocation. Orders were given, in the Summer of 1810, for the bulk of the goods which have been lately imported, and the principal part of these orders were executed by the month of December, 1810; but, on the appearance of the President's proclamation of the 2d November, 1810, the merchants countermanded the shipment of their goods, and the further execution of their orders, and gave instructions that they should be completed, and the shipments made when the Orders in Council should be revoked, and their importation into the United States become legal. A great portion of these goods was paid for at the time they were put up; some of them bought upon the usual credit, but paid for long before the revocation of the Orders in Council.

Dry goods, which were put up prior to 2d February, 1811, and those which were purchased after the revocation of the Orders in Council, were laid in at about the usual prices. Those purchased in the intervening time, were from ten to fifteen per cent. lower. Some articles of hardware cost rather an increased price, and none were purchased at reduced prices.

The importers of British manufactures are not, in Philadelphia, exporters of produce. The trade of that city is divided among two classes of merchants; one class imports, and the other exports. The importer almost universally makes his remittances in bills. The rate of exchange in Philadelphia varied, in 1811, from ten to twenty-two and a half per cent. discount. In 1812, it has varied from ten to twenty per cent. discount. Two weeks ago, it was at sixteen. In the Fall of 1810, it was at about five per cent. discount. The merchant does not consider as a part of his profit the advantage gained from a temporary depression of exchange, because, on other occasions, he has to pay a corresponding advance. It will be found, in twenty years, or other considerable given periods, to be balanced. When it has been above par, they have not increased the usual advance on their goods. They have never, before late periods, known exchange on England to be so low; never knew it, before these periods, to be lower than ten per cent.

Generally speaking, about one-third of the late importations remains on hand. The profits have been rather greater than formerly; from five to ten per cent. greater. But the merchants have been idle for almost two years, paying house rent, and all the other expenses of their establishments, without any gain, and, considering these disadvantages, they will, notwithstanding this profit, be losers, not gainers, on their business.

The quantity imported is not a full importation.

BALTIMORE.—The committee from Baltimore confirmed, as applicable generally to that city, the statement of the committee from New York, except so far as the following particulars may be variant from it:

They stated that Mr Russell, late Chargé des Affaires of the United States at London, had been applied to for his opinion and advice, and that he did advise these shipments, and gave it as his opinion, that the shippers would be safe; that the original importers of Baltimore had sold nearly all their goods; that they have not more than one-fifteenth or one-twentieth of their importations on hand; they have passed into the hands of jobbers and speculators; the average profit which the importers have obtained, beyond that of ordinary years, is between 5 and 10 per cent.

The usual practice, under the late restrictions, has been to give orders for goods to be executed on the contingency of a remission of these restrictions. It is believed that many of the goods lately imported, were purchased before the revocation of the Orders in Council, and many before 2d February, 1811. The hardware importations were all of this description. One of the committee, in October and November, 1811, passed through the great manufacturing towns in England, and saw the warehouses full of goods, packed up, which were said to be there on American account.

A great many of these goods were paid for before their shipment, others were remitted for before their arrival, and others have been obtained on the usual credit. It has not been the general practice to pay for goods at the time of purchase; but merchants have had much more the means of paying for the late importations, than they had to pay some years ago; this increased ability has arisen from the circumstance that this description of merchants have done no business for nearly two years past. There will be always some not wholly paid for; but, whether paid for or not, whenever they are out of the warehouse, they are considered as on account of the importer.

The importers of these goods are not the same persons who have shipped American produce to the Peninsula. It is usual for these importers to place funds in England, in anticipation of their orders for the purchase of goods; the usual operation is, by the purchase of bills of exchange.

Dry goods have been purchased lately, at a lower rate than formerly, in England; those purchased in March, April, and May, were obtained at a lower rate than the same goods have been purchased at, at any other time. It was only at these periods that goods were purchased at an unusually low rate.

They have not taken into the calculation of the profit of these importations, the advantage on the purchase of bills; this is not included, because, if, on an average, the merchant pays no more than par for the bills he remits, he is satisfied, and the experience of merchants proves, that no material advantage results to them in a course of years. There are cases in which persons went to England, provided with extensive funds, and have speculated on the low prices of the last Spring; but the great bulk of the goods imported were shipped in consequence of orders long before given. The importations have effected the return to this country of so much American capital. These importations have not exceeded the orders given—they have been less. Five ships were carried into Norfolk, three of which belonged to Baltimore, and one merchant gave bonds for nearly the whole of their cargoes, which averaged £100,000 sterling each. One vessel, belonging to Baltimore, the Eliza Ann, was carried into Boston; the value of the cargo exceeded £100,000 sterling, and one man gave bonds for the whole cargo; these bonds were sometimes given in the expectation of a commission, without any authority from the owners of the property.

NEW YORK.—The committee from New York, in a subsequent communication, stated further, that the late importations into that city included purchases which were made after the revocation of the Orders in Council, as well as those which were made before the 2d February, 1811, and at intervening periods, but that the great mass had been purchased, and was on hand, remaining on American account, from the latter end of the year 1810. They did not think, they said, on being interrogated to that point, that this was a large calculation, notwithstanding the relaxation introduced by the law of March, 1811; because the merchants had asked information of the Secretary of the Treasury, before the passage of that law, as to the construction of the act of the 1st May, 1810, and the President's proclamation of 2d November, 1810, and were informed by that officer, that all goods which should not arrive in the United States prior to the 2d February, 1811, would be liable to forfeiture; that they therefore countermanded their orders, and did not enjoy the advantage which was granted by the act of March, 1811.

Orders, which are to be executed in the Fall, are usually given by the first January preceding, but the merchant frequently revises his orders in the Spring.

Some of the goods lately imported have been purchased at a low rate, but a great part of them has not; as many of them have been long laid in, the purchases have been made at lower than former prices.

The importers of British manufactures in New York, are a separate class of men from the shippers of American produce; they had no interest in the shipments to the Peninsula; there is scarce an exception within the knowledge of the committee, except Mr. Coster, one of themselves, whose trade was not to the Peninsula, but to the North of Europe; not one-half of the American property in England, has been brought home; there were but twenty days in which to make shipments; 23d June, the Orders in Council were revoked. On the 13th July, news of the declaration of war reached Liverpool, and it is believed no licenses were granted afterwards. The late importations are not equal to one-half of the usual supply, perhaps not one-third.

There has been an advantage obtained by the shippers to the Peninsula, by the depreciation of exchange in England; when they took bills, they were obliged to take bills. The exportation of specie was not generally permitted, and where not specially permitted, the attempt to export, if discovered, was coupled with forfeiture.

The course of trade practised by importers of British manufactures, as to payments, has been changed; formerly, the shipments were made on credit; the purchases are made with cash; the merchant who wants goods, and has not money, obtains his credit here, instead of obtaining it in England, as formerly; this country is, and has been for some time, the creditor of England; those who have imported on credit, for some time past, have been ruined. It is believed that the greater part of the goods, the orders for which were executed in the Fall of 1810, was paid at the time of purchase. There are, it is believed, cases in which the goods have been shipped to order, and were deliverable on contingencies to the American merchant, but they are probably few in number, because it cannot be presumed that, in the hostile attitude which the countries have presented, many men would be found who were disposed to place their property in a situation so precarious.

Mr. Russell stated, that, after the revocation of the Orders in Council, many of the American merchants did apply to him to obtain his opinion, whether they could ship British manufactures to the United States with safety or not? That, before the revocation of the orders, upon considering the whole circumstances of the case, examining the words of the law, and perceiving that its operation depended solely on the revocation of the Orders in Council—considering the evident bearing of the examinations in Parliament, and the ground on which the opposition contended for the revocation of the orders, which was not so much an act of justice to the United States as the advantage that was promised to their own manufacturers, he thought it his duty to countenance the idea that shipments made after the revocation of the orders, would be admitted into the United States; that this ground was taken by the advocates of a revocation of the orders, who declared that they would advise their friends to ship, as they believed shipments, in the event of a revocation, might be made with safety, and that he thought good policy required him to countenance the idea, in order to co-operate as far as possible, with the advocates of the revocation of the orders.

That, after the revocation of the orders, he continued to declare, and did declare, to the merchants who applied to him, as his opinion, that they might make shipments with safety. This opinion applied only to the cases where shipments were made before war. After a knowledge of the war had reached England, he declared distinctly to the merchants, that the ground of a probable annulment of the non-importation act, by the Government of the United States, had ceased.

Mr. Russell stated, however, that, after the knowledge of the declaration of war had reached England, he did still advise the American merchants to ship, because, if the property remained in England during the war, it would be ruinous to the holders. Many persons, after the revocation of the orders, and before the news of war arrived, had made purchases. He would not be understood to say that he advised the merchants that, in case the law should not be repealed, they would be permitted to enjoy the advantages of a monopoly, and the consequent ordinary profits, but merely that the property would not be confiscated. This, however, he said, was not at all a subject of conversation. His opinion that shipments might be made with safety, was founded as well on a presumption that the law would be annulled, as that the shippers would, in any event be placed, as nearly as possible, on the footing on which they would have stood had the law been annulled. That, if the law should not be annulled, the special circumstances under which the shipments were made would entitle them to an exemption from its penalties. He believed that, before the revocation of the orders, and after the interdiction, purchases were made under an expectation of a revocation, and these were made at reduced prices. The depression was not very material. After the revocation there was a rise, but they remained, throughout, lower than in common times, when the trade was assuredly free. He did not, however, pretend to be very conversant in these matters.

Some of the goods were purchased before the 2d February, 1811; but, he would suppose they formed a very small portion of the importations. In the period intervening between that date and the revocation of the orders, there had been more considerable investments, but he believed the greatest portion were purchased after the revocation. There was then great activity in investments, but he thinks it probable they were purchased with funds which had been remaining there for the purpose, and which were appropriated agreeably to orders which had been previously given, to be executed in the event of the revocation of the Orders in Council.

The knowledge of the declaration of war reached England about the 25th or 26th of July. Official information was not so soon received, and therefore the embargo which was laid by the British Government was not imposed till the 20th July. The order, subsequently issued, permitting the departure of licensed vessels, but limiting their departure to the 15th of —, was extended in some special cases, but not generally.

The subscribers, importers of hardware, in the city and county of New York, and merchants there resident, being severally duly sworn and affirmed, severally say:

That they have severally received importations of British manufactures, in their line, since the revocation of the Orders in Council by Great Britain; that, of these importations, they believe not more than one-third have been sold; that sales by the package, or wholesale, have been made at an average advance of about ninety per centum on the invoice; that the average charges of inland carriage, export duty, shipping commissions, insurance, freight, duties of import, &c., amount to sixty-five per centum, of course not leaving a profit on their investments of more than sixteen per cent., or of twenty-five per cent. on the invoice cost, exclusive of any accidental benefit arising from exchange; that this benefit has been much less than would appear, by reason of many of the importers having remitted their funds, twelve, eighteen, and even twenty-four months ago, at which period exchange was not more than from six to ten per cent. under par; and against whatever gain may have been so made the loss of interest, with the expense of storage, insurance from fire, &c., in England, may be considered as nearly a counterbalance. And these deponents and affirmants severally further say, that the said sales that have been effected by the package have been of the articles most in demand, and therefore most profitable; that the residue consists of many articles less saleable, and some of which, owing to the increase of the manufactures of this country, have been supplanted, and must be sold at little or no profit, such as nails, spades and shovels, planes, hollowware, whip thongs, webbing, mill saws, brushes of most descriptions, &c.

I, David Dunham, of the city of New York, auctioneer, do hereby certify and declare, that I am in daily practice of vending, at public sale, goods of the late importations from Great Britain, &c.; that my sales embrace almost a general assortment of British manufactures, and that, for the present week alone, I have sold to the amount of nearly forty thousand dollars; that, with very few exceptions, the said goods have not brought above seventy to eighty per cent. upon the original costs; that the few instances where they have brought above that advance, it has more frequently occurred that they have not brought cost and charges, and, in some instances, that there has been from ten to twenty per cent. loss on goods. And I do further certify and declare, that, in the importations of goods, in which I have been interested, I have found a number of packages that it has been with difficulty that more than cost and charges have been obtained; and that I have now on hand an entire importation, that (owing to the long detention of said goods at New London, at which port they have been wrongfully detained) I am willing to sell for cost and charges; and further, that, when the whole of the goods now under detention, shall be brought into market, that the prospect is, that they will be considerably lower. And I do further declare, that I have been interested (under the firm of Dunham and Randolph) in the purchase of a very large amount of British manufactured goods, associated with three or four other houses, say upwards of half a million of dollars, and a great proportion of which have been purchased at a bare mercantile profit, after deducting all the contingent expenses attending the same; and lastly, that, in speaking of the cost and charges of all goods, the several penal bonds to the United States are never taken into calculation as composing any part thereof. To all these facts I subscribe, and stand ready to testify with my corporeal oath, if necessary.

DAVID DUNHAM.

I, Matthias B. Edgar, a partner in trade with Mr. Dunham, the annexed named J. Valentine Van De Water, and I, Edward D. Burke, clerks in the employ of the said David Dunham, are privy to the facts set forth in his certificate, so far as relates to his auction sales, and the goods imported by him, and of those now on hand; of the facts relating to the goods in which he has had an interest, with J. F. Randolph, under the firm of Dunham and Randolph, we believe to be true.

The subscribers, commission merchants, and auctioneers, of the city of New York, do certify, that they have sold, both at private and at public sale, large quantities of British manufactured goods, which have been imported here in vessels which left Great Britain subsequently to the Order in Council of the 23d of June last; that, in almost all instances, they had the original invoices of the said goods, and that they are of opinion, from various calculations they have made, the said goods have, upon an average, afforded a profit to the importers, beyond the cost and charges, of about, but not exceeding, twenty per cent. They further certify, that they have sold several separate invoices of goods, which did not produce as much as the cost and charges.

ASA HOYT.

Sworn this 10th day of November, 1812, before me,
C. BOSTWICK,
Notary Public, New York.

NEW YORK, November 14, 1812.

DEAR SIR: Some of my friends and neighbors feel a great interest on a subject now before Congress, in which, having personally but little interest, my views of the subject may perhaps be useful to you, when your attention shall be drawn to its consideration; at any rate, I presume on your friendship to receive with candor the ideas I shall communicate.

Many of our importers of British goods are under immense responsibilities to the Government, for themselves and their friends; the course of my business would, at almost any other season, have placed me under similar circumstances; but not expecting, myself, the repeal of the Orders in Council, I had withdrawn my brother from England last year, and having no other there to act for us, we have not imported a cent on our account this season, although we have pretty large funds there, arising from shipments made a long time since. We have only bonded for three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, amount of a small shipment made to us by an American citizen, in which we have no interest.

I am fully persuaded that Government wish to act with perfect fairness in relation to these bonds, and that the merchants have only to make out their case, as entitled to relief, to receive the full measure of it.

That those American merchants who happened to be in England, or had partners or agents there, on the repeal of the Orders in Council, should venture to make shipments, I presume can surprise no one, who has attended to the correspondence which has passed between the two Governments; at least, I am ready to say that, not knowing or expecting war, I should certainly have done so freely, had I been there. The only objection of any weight, to cancelling the bonds, that I have heard, is the large profits the merchants have realized; it is true, that some of those who were fortunate enough to have their vessels arrive early in the season, without the interruption of private or public cruisers, and who sold off their goods immediately, have secured unusually large profits on some descriptions of goods, say low-priced woollens, &c. These prices have been obtained in consequence of the previous scarcity, and a belief that, in consequence of the war, further supplies were precarious, and not from any idea of indemnity against the risk of the penal bonds to Government. In all our large cities, there are a class of dealers who buy by the package from the importers, and sell by the piece to the country traders; this class of people have probably felt rather unfriendly to the importers, to whom they gave any extra profit, and many of them have represented the importers' profits as extravagant, in order to cover their own extortions on the country merchants. If, however, for this single season, the importers' profits should be unusually large, is it anything more than the fair chance of trade, or an indemnity against the losses of former periods, arising out of the course of measures pursued by the Government for the general good, but which have borne with great severity on the importing dry good and hardware merchants? I do assure you that, although I have conducted my business with my usual industry and judgment, that, for the last three years, I have not made my current expenses; and this I know to be the case with many others; therefore, although I do not share with them the handsome profits of this season, I feel that they are entitled to it, and do not envy them. Thus far, I have only viewed the bright side of the subject; there is, however, probably, a majority of those who have given bonds, who will only make a fair mercantile profit, in consequence of the expenses on, and delay in, the receipt of their goods, arising from detention by the cruisers, who have, in many instances, sent in the merchant ships to distant ports from where they were bound, and thus obliged the consigners of the goods to incur heavy expenses in procuring the release. Under these circumstances, the delay in getting possession of the property, has, in most instances, deprived the merchant of the greater part of his expected profit; and, it is within my own knowledge, that now, when goods have fallen in price, so as to afford, in most instances, little more than the usual small profits, and, in some instances, no profit, many of the importers are but just getting possession of a great portion of their goods, and many are not yet released. We have, ourselves, a ship in the freighting business, which was proceeding from Scotland to this port, with a valuable cargo of dry goods, on account of various merchants in this city; she was captured in August last by a privateer, and carried into Bristol, Rhode Island. The ship is released on bond, but nearly the whole of the cargo is this day in store in Bristol, under charge of the marshal or collector—the privateer (the Yankee) refusing to consent to their release on bond. Are not these cases of hardship? I am, with much respect, &c.

LEWIS CONDUCT, Esq.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 17, 1812.

MY DEAR SIR: In consequence of the death of our mutual and respectable friend, Mr David Armour of this city, as his particular friend, and administrator of his estate, the duty has devolved upon me of stating particularly the transaction as it occurred, and the circumstances under which the goods lately imported by Armour and Jenkins arrived. This subject, I observe, being referred to a committee of the House of Representatives, to make report on, imposes an obligation on me stating such facts and circumstances, relating to this business, as I conceive may be useful. This I should have done at an earlier period, but was prevented by the want of the documents from Norfolk, which came to hand the night before last only. For many years past, as will no doubt appear, by referring to the Treasury Department, Armour & Jenkins, (saddlers of this city,) were in the practice of importing, every Spring and Fall, a small quantity of saddlery. Pursuing their customary plan, on the 30th of June, 1810, they ordered the goods, which have lately arrived, the subject which is now before the committee. Shortly after this period, Mr. D. Armour was taken sick, and died on the 11th of November following, leaving a widow and six children. During the time between the 30th of June, 1810, and his death, part of the money for those goods was paid; the balance, Mr. Jenkins, the surviving partner, paid, by great exertions, in the latter end of March, 1811, having obtained the money, in part, from the Union Bank of Maryland, on loan, to effect this object. The inducements to those exertions were, that Messrs. William Walker & Co., of Philadelphia, who were the agents of the Messrs. Walkers in England, of whom the goods were ordered, gave him a discount of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. for prompt payment. You will please to observe, that, when this money was paid, the goods were expected in a very short time; this opinion was induced by the letter of William Walker & Co., of Philadelphia, dated 13th March, 1811, an extract from which is herewith enclosed. The circular from the Treasury Department, it is presumed, which reached England in the interim, stopped their shipment, as, by that instrument, no goods were allowed to be landed in this country, which should arrive after the 2d of February; although it so turned out, that, had they been shipped, by a subsequent law of Congress they would have been legally imported, as the law admitted all goods that should leave England before the 2d of February. In the midst of those difficulties, and believing, from the declaration of our Government, that the non-importation act would be repealed, as soon as the British Government should revoke their Orders in Council, Mr. Jenkins, the surviving partner, with, I believe, almost every other importer, ordered the goods shipped as soon as the Orders in Council should be removed. This event having taken place, and the shippers in England not knowing of war being declared by this Government, shipped them under the former orders they had received. I should have mentioned that the goods sold, as heretofore mentioned, by order of the Orphan's Court, were sold on a credit of six months, which time, added to that already elapsed since the money was paid, makes twenty-five months' interest due, or  $12\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; from which, deduct the  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. allowed for prompt payment, and 5 per cent. stands, of course, a proper item in the price of the goods, which would, on the money paid in England, amount to about \$720. From the foregoing, which is founded, not upon speculative suppositions, but upon facts, absolute in themselves, the documents of which can be exhibited, if necessary, it would follow, that, if the Government exacted the bonds taken, Armour & Jenkins would lose \$10,935 03 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; this results from the following facts:

Remission of Forfeitures.

The amount of penal bond, per Tom Hazard, in Norfolk, is	$12,807 88
The amount of penal bond, per brig Ann, in Baltimore	640 33
	$13,448 21
From this sum, deduct the net profits made, as per statement No. 3	- 2,513 17 $\frac{1}{2}$
Absolute loss of Armour & Jenkins	$10,935 03<math>\frac{1}{2}</math>

I am aware that something may be said about the rate of exchange; on this head, I shall adopt the language of Mr. Russell on a late occasion. I have nothing to disguise. The advantage of bills, upon the whole of this transaction, has been about 14 per cent.; but have we not, without any fault of ours, been subjected to great trouble, anxiety, and alarm? Yes, more than any man in his senses would be willing to undergo for such an advantage.

Having, as I conceive, made a fair and honest statement of this business, I would ask, what will Government be likely to do? In coming to this determination, there will be but one object in view—this object is justice. You know me too well to suppose I would not be among the very first to step forward to punish any violation of the laws of our own Government; but it is surely a sound maxim to say, that, where there was no intention to transgress, there can be no crime; and where there has been no crime, I am quite sure, an honest Government like ours will never punish. You may ask how a discrimination can be made. To this I would say, that, if the collected wisdom of the United States cannot devise means to punish the guilty, without involving the innocent, let the whole escape. Adopt the common declaration of law—it is better for ninety-nine guilty persons to escape, than to punish one innocently. Having been thus lengthy, I shall conclude by giving you permission to make what use you please of this letter, and the accompanying documents. I remain, yours, very respectfully,

JOHN HILLEN.

Extract of a letter from William Walker & Co., dated Philadelphia, 13th March, 1811, to Messrs. Armour and Jenkins.

"GENTLEMEN: We have yours of the 11th; the last accounts we have from our friends in England, are of the 22d December, at which time they intended shipping all they could get on board by 2d February. They mention particularly, that the Baltimore orders, having been received early, were in a great state of forwardness, and would be ready for the first vessels. We have, therefore, no doubt, but the greatest part of your goods will be in the Diana."

SINKING FUND.

[Communicated to the Senate, February 8, 1813.]

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1813.

The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund respectfully report to Congress as follows:

That the measures which have been authorized by the Board subsequent to their last report, of the 5th February, 1812, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to this Board, dated the 5th day of the present month, and in the statements therein referred to, which are herewith transmitted, and prayed to be received as part of this report.

W. H. CRAWFORD, Pres. Sen., p. tem.

J. MARSHALL, Chief Justice, U. States.

JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State.

ALBERT GALLATIN, Sec'y Treas'y.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 5, 1813.

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully reports to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund:

That the balance of moneys advanced on account of the public debt, remaining unexpended at the close of the year 1810, and applicable to payments falling due after that year; which balance, as appears by the statement B, annexed to the last annual report, amounted to - $493,174 17

Together with the sums disbursed from the Treasury during the year 1811, on account of the principal and interest of the public debt; which sums, as appears by the statement C, annexed to last annual report, amounted to - 8,148,095 00

Together with a further sum arising from profit in exchange on remittances from America to Europe, purchased during the year 1811, amounting, as appears by the statement D, annexed to the last annual report, to - 56,726 14

And, with the further sum of £4,900 sterling, in bills taken in payment of the principal of an equal sum of protested bills, as appears by the same statement D, and equal, at par, to - 21,777 78

And amounting, together, to - $8,719,773 09

Have been accounted for in the following manner:

I. There was repaid into the Treasury, during the year 1811, on account of the principal of moneys heretofore advanced for the payment of the public debt, including the amount of sundry bills of exchange received in lieu of others previously purchased, which had been protested, as appears by the statement E, annexed to the last annual report - $168,444 45

II. The sums actually applied, during the same year, to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt, as ascertained by accounts rendered to the Treasury Department, amounted, as will appear by the statement A, to eight millions forty-eight thousand eight hundred and fourteen dollars and seventy-nine cents, viz:

1. Paid in reimburse'm't of the principal of the public debt	-	$5,543,606 39
2. Paid on account of interest and charges on the same	-	2,505,208 40
			8,048,814 79

III. The balance remaining unexpended at the close of the year 1811, and applicable to payments falling due after that year, as ascertained by accounts rendered to the Treasury Department, amounted, as will appear by the statement B, to	-		502,513 85
--	---	--	------------

Total	-	-	-	$8,719,773 09
-------	---	---	---	----------------

That, during the year 1812, the following disbursements were made out of the Treasury, on account of the principal and interest of the public debt, viz:

I. On account of the interest and reimbursement of domestic funded debt	-	$3,845,117 34
---	---	----------------

II. On account of the domestic unfunded debt	-	$945 04
And of the debt due to foreign officers	-	1,444 17
		2,389 21

III. On account of the interest on Louisiana stock, and on converted stock, payable in Europe	-	627,051 64
---	---	------------

Amounting, together, as will appear by annexed list of warrants, marked C, to	-	$4,474,558 19
---	---	----------------

Which disbursements were made out of the following funds, viz:

I. From the funds constituting the annual appropriation of eight millions dollars, for the year 1812, viz: From the fund arising from the interest on the debt transferred to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, per statement I	-	$1,899,125 22
--	---	----------------

From the fund arising from the sale of public lands, being the amount received into the Treasury, from the 1st October, 1811, to the 30th September, 1812, per statement K	-	822,599 64
--	---	------------

From the proceeds of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported, and on the tonnage of vessels	-	1,727,906 03
---	---	--------------

Amounting, together, to	-	$4,449,630 89
-------------------------	---	----------------

Which sum of $4,449,630 89, being deducted from the annual appropriation of $8,000,000, leaves an unexpended balance of $3,550,369 11, to be applied during the year 1813, in addition to the appropriation for that year.

II. From repayments into the Treasury, on account of moneys heretofore advanced for the payment of dividends on the domestic funded and unfunded debt, as will appear by the statement E	-	24,927 30
--	---	-----------

Making together	-	-	$4,474,558 19
-----------------	---	---	----------------

Increase of Public Revenue.

That the above-mentioned disbursements, together with the above-stated balance, which remained unexpended at the close of the year 1811, of - -	502,513 85
And, together with a further sum, arising from profits on remittances from America to Europe, purchased during the year 1812, and amounting, as will appear by the statement D, to -	91,532 88
Making together - - -	$5,068,604 92

Will be accounted for in the next annual report, in conformity with the accounts which shall then have been rendered to the Treasury Department.

That, in the meanwhile, the manner in which the said sum has been applied, is estimated as follows:

I. The payments into the Treasury, on account of the principal of moneys advanced for the payment of dividends on the domestic funded and unfunded debt, have during the year 1812 amounted, as by the above-mentioned statement E, to - - -	$24,927 30
II. The sums actually applied, during the year 1812, to the principal and interest of the public debt, are estimated as follows:
1. Paid in reimbursements of the interest of the public debt - -	$2,262,690 01
2. Paid on account of interest and charges on the public debt - -	2,422,060 14
As will appear by the estimate F.	$4,684,750 15

III. The balance which remained unexpended at the close of the year 1812, and applicable to payments falling due after that year, is estimated, per estimate G, at - - -	358,927 47
--	------------

That, in conformity with the resolution of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, of the 19th June, 1812—a copy whereof is hereunto annexed, marked M—the residue of the converted stock was reimbursed at the close of the year 1812; and, that, in conformity with the resolution of the said Commissioners, of the 6th July, 1812—a copy of which is annexed, marked N—$179,300 of Louisiana domestic six per cent. stock, $14,000 (nominal) of deferred six per cent. stock, and $57,000 of six per cent. stock, of 1812, have been purchased previous to the 31st December, 1812, having cost, together, $242,547 39, as will more particularly appear in the statement marked L.

And that the statement H exhibits the amount of stock transferred to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and to the Treasurer of the United States, in trust for said States, and standing on the books of the Treasury on the 31st December, 1812; no stock having been transferred, in payment for lands, during the year 1812.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

INCREASE OF REVENUE.

[Communicated to the House, February 15, 1813.]

COMMITTEE ROOM, Feb. 11, 1813.

SIR: The Committee of Ways and Means are of opinion that it is expedient to raise an internal revenue for the service of the year 1814; but that it is altogether impracticable, within the present session, to pass the necessary laws for that purpose; they have, therefore, directed me to inquire of you, at what time, in your opinion, it will be necessary that such laws should be enacted, in order to raise a revenue, which may be collected in time for the service of that year.

I am also directed to bring to your attention the last paragraph of your letter to the Chairman of this Committee, of the 10th of June, 1812, and to ask whether the opinion therein given is applicable to the present state of things, and to the probable exigencies of the Government, in the year 1814?

As early an answer as shall be consistent with your convenience is requested.

I am, with great respect, &c.

LANGDON CHEVES.

HON. ALBERT GALLATIN, Sec'y Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 12, 1813.

SIR: In answer to your letter of yesterday, I have the honor to state that I still believe it practicable to organize the taxes within three or four months after the passing of the laws in the shape reported. This, however, is only matter of opinion, in which I may be mistaken; and it would certainly be desirable, if other considerations do not oppose it, to prevent the danger of disappointment, by allowing more time for the selection of officers, preparing and transmitting the forms and instructions, and taking all other steps necessary for the organization of a difficult and novel system, which must pervade every part of the extensive territory of the United States. The selection of officers, including the time necessary to ascertain whether they will accept, is perhaps the operation most likely to produce delay.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

HON. LANGDON CHEVES, Chairman, &c.

COMMITTEE ROOM, June 9, 1812.

SIR: I am directed, by the Committee of Ways and Means, to request you to inform them, whether, in your opinion, the non-importation act may not be so modified, or partially suspended, as to afford a revenue equivalent to the estimated amount of the proposed internal taxes, additional tonnage duty, and diminution of drawbacks; and, in such event, whether the last mentioned objects of revenue may not, for the present, be dispensed with.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

LANGDON CHEVES.

HON. ALBERT GALLATIN, Sec'y Treasury.

Fines, Penalties, and Forfeitures.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT; June 10, 1812.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your letter of yesterday, asking whether, in my opinion, the non-importation act may not be so modified, or partially suspended, as to afford a revenue equivalent to the estimated amount of the internal taxes, additional tonnage duty, and diminution of drawbacks; and, in such event, whether the last mentioned objects of revenue may not, for the present, be dispensed with?

All the estimates of revenue, which have been transmitted during this session, having necessarily been made in conformity with the existing laws, were predicated on the supposed absolute prohibition of British produce and manufactures. These, in ordinary times, amounted to more than one-half of the foreign merchandise consumed in the United States. The actual exclusion of the greater part of the articles of our own growth from France, Holland, and Germany, the consequent nullity of our commerce with those countries, and the conquest by Great Britain of their colonies, still more lessens the proportion of foreign articles which may be imported from other countries than the British dominions.

It is, therefore, evident, that the amount of duties on importations will be more than doubled in the event of a suspension of the non-importation, and that they will, whilst that suspension continues, afford a revenue, at least equivalent to the estimated amount of the proposed direct tax, internal duties, additional tonnage, and diminution of drawbacks. All these may be dispensed with, so long as the suspension continues, provided that the contemplated increase of one hundred per cent. on the duties on importations shall take place.

It is not believed that the result would be materially affected by a modification, or partially, instead of an absolute, suspension of the non-importation: for the amount of importations would be principally regulated by the amount of American funds already in England, and by the subsequent consumption of American produce in Great Britain, Spain, and Portugal, and the British West Indies, respectively. If a discrimination be thought eligible, it would seem that the articles entitled to preference are colonial produce, particularly rum, coarse woollens, middle price cotton goods, Irish linens, earthen and glassware, hardware and manufactures of steel, tin, brass, and copper, fine cloths, muslins, plain cotton goods, manufactures of silk, hemp, flax, (with the above exception) and leather, paper, hats, shoes, and millinery, may either be altogether supplied by domestic manufactures or dispensed with.

The annual importations of British colonial and domestic produce and manufactures could not be estimated at less than thirty-five millions of dollars. Supposing (on the same grounds on which the other estimates of duties on importation in time of war were made) that the war and other restrictions should reduce the amount to one-half, the proposed double duties collected on the revenue would produce a net revenue of at least five millions of dollars, and greater, therefore, than all the proposed internal taxes and duties and additional tonnage duty.

Permit me, however, to observe, with respect to this last duty, that, so far as relates to foreign vessels, the proposed addition appears necessary, and is hardly sufficient to compensate the great advantages which war will give them over American vessels, in the American commerce.

It is proper to add, that all the bills for laying and collecting the direct tax and internal duties have been prepared in conformity with the former request of the Committee, so that the whole subject may be taken up at this, or any other time, without any delay on the part of the Treasury. The only detail on which the information is not as complete as might be desired, is that of the quotas of the direct tax intended to be laid on the several counties in each State. It is also believed that the system has been prepared in such manner that it may be organized, and all the taxes be in full operation, in the month of April next, provided the laws are enacted before the commencement of the year 1813.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

HON. LANGDON CHEVES, Chairman, &c.

FINES, PENALTIES, AND FORFEITURES.

[Communicated to the House, February 27, 1813.]

Mr. QUINCY made the following report:

The Committee appointed to inquire into the principles and practice adopted by the Treasury Department in relation to the revenue laws, and to the mitigating or remitting the fines, penalties, and forfeitures, accruing under the same, having, in pursuance of that appointment, had an interview with the Secretary of the Treasury, and examined such papers as they deemed necessary for the due execution of their trust, addressed to him a letter, marked A, and received from him, in reply, the letter marked B, with the accompanying document. All which are annexed to this report.

It appears to your committee, as far as they are enabled to judge, that the remitting and mitigating powers, exercised by the Treasury Department, have been used in a manner liberal and just. Your Committee have not deemed it their duty, from the terms of their authority, to enter into the consideration of the expediency of relieving the Treasury Department from the burden of exercising this discretion. In some commercial communities, a similar discretion is vested in a board of commissioners, whose members form a check upon each other, and the publicity of whose proceedings preserve their decisions, under the scrutiny of the public eye, and the wholesome control of public opinion.

Your Committee report to the House the annexed papers, as the result of their inquiry.

Fines, Penalties, and Forfeitures.

A.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January, 22, 1813.

SIR: The Committee appointed to inquire into the principles and practice adopted by the Treasury Department in relation to the revenue laws, and to the mitigating or remitting the fines, penalties, and forfeitures, accruing under the same, have directed me to request such an elucidation of the general construction given by that Department, of its powers in relation to that subject, as may indicate the principles by which it has been regulated. They particularly have authorized me to desire an answer to the following inquiries:

Whether, in cases of "intention of fraud" existing, the Department deems itself authorized either to remit, or mitigate?

Whether, in cases of "wilful negligence" existing, the Department deems itself authorized either to remit, or mitigate?

Whether, in cases where neither one nor the other exists, the Department deems itself at liberty to inflict the whole penalty, or any part of it?

If the Department has deemed itself at liberty, in cases where no "wilful negligence" and no "fraud" has existed, to inflict the whole penalty, or forfeitures, or any part of either, then the Committee have directed me to inquire by what general principles its decision, in such cases, has been regulated?

Particularly, whether the Department has deemed itself confined, in relation to such cases, to such a mitigation of the penalty, or forfeiture, as might include the mere incidents of the prosecution, and the "terms and conditions" on which, having reference to such incidents, it should be made to cease; or, whether, in relation to such cases, it has deemed itself at liberty to take into consideration other circumstances, such as the profits of the Treasury, the gains of the individual, the like or other considerations, in estimating the amount of the penalty or forfeiture to be exacted.

The Committee having perceived that, in certain cases, where "wilful negligence and fraud" were stated not to exist, the condition of release has been on the payment of "costs and charges, and a certain per centage, for the use of the United States, in addition to the duty established by law," they have directed me to inquire by what principles this levy has been regulated? To what cases it has been applied? And what has been the gain to the United States by such payments of per centage.

The Committee also requests a general statement of the fines, penalties, and forfeitures, received by the Treasury Department since the date of the establishment, and the expenses which have occurred on prosecutions for them.

The Committee will be happy to receive any elucidation which the above inquiries, or any other considerations connected with the subject, may suggest. I am, sir, respectfully, &c.

JOSIAH QUINCY.

HON. ALBERT GALLATIN.

B.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 12, 1812.

SIR: The pressure of current business has prevented an earlier answer to your letter of 22d ultimo. The tenor of some of the queries therein contained, renders it necessary to premise some observations on the object and obvious construction of the law, which authorizes remissions or mitigations of fines, penalties, and forfeitures.

In almost every penal code, the law fixes the maximum of the fine which may be inflicted for offences made punishable by the payment of money, and leaves it discretionary with the court to prescribe, in every case, according to its circumstances, the sum, not exceeding that maximum, which shall be paid by the offender. In the revenue and restrictive laws of the United States, the fines, or forfeitures, which may be incurred by reason of any infraction of those laws, are made absolute; and the power to mitigate, and even to remit the whole amount, has, it is presumed, for the sake of uniformity, been vested, under certain limitations, in the Secretary of the Treasury. It is enacted that he shall have power "to mitigate or remit such fine, forfeiture, or penalty, (or remove such disability,) or any part thereof, if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same; and to direct the prosecution, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease and be discontinued, upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and just."

Since the Secretary of the Treasury is not authorized to remit, or even to mitigate, unless there has been neither intention of fraud, nor wilful negligence, it necessarily follows, that, by the words, wilful negligence, is meant only such flagrant and voluntary infraction of the laws as, though not implying fraud, properly so called, is, by the statute, considered as tantamount to fraud, and therefore precluding any remission, or even mitigation of the penalty incurred.

Since the power to remit in part, or to mitigate, which is precisely the same as a power to enforce a part of the penalty, not only may be exercised in cases which fall short, in the words of the statute, of intention of fraud, or of wilful negligence, but is limited to such cases alone; it necessarily follows that the statute contemplates offences implying a certain degree of guilt, and requiring a punishment less than the whole amount of the penalty incurred, although there has been, in persons incurring such penalty, neither intention of fraud, nor what is there called wilful negligence.

It is evident, from the tenor of the statute, that it describes two classes of offences: 1st, such as imply fraud, or (to use the expression) statute wilful negligence, and which shall be punished by the infliction of the whole amount of the fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred; 2dly, such as imply neither fraud or statute wilful negligence, to which alone the power to remit, or to mitigate, can be applied.

Fines, Penalties, and Forfeitures.

That the last class embraces two species of infractions: such as, falling short of the highest degree of offence, which precludes even a mitigation, must, however, render the party liable to a partial payment of the penalty incurred; 2dly, such as, from involuntary and unimportant omissions, have made the party legally liable to the penalty, but where such penalty should, in equity, and may, without weakening the execution of the laws, be altogether remitted; and that the authority vested in the Secretary of the Treasury is applicable only to that class of offences, which imply neither fraud nor statute wilful negligence, and consists in graduating the amount of penalty which it may still be proper and necessary to enforce, or in granting an unqualified remission, according to the nature of the case.

This exposition of the law affords a ready answer to the general queries proposed by the committee, and was thought necessary, because it was apprehended that some erroneous view of the subject and meaning of the law might result, from not particularly attending to the restricted sense affixed to the words "wilful negligence," by the statute.

It was apprehended that, on a first impression, the position may have been assumed, either, that the power to enforce a part only of the penalty did not exist, although that power be expressly implied in that of mitigating, and remitting in part, or that it could be exercised in cases where there was neither fraud, or statute wilful negligence, although this authority be, by the statute, expressly confined to such cases alone.

To the three first queries of the committee, it is, therefore, answered:

1. That the Secretary of the Treasury does not consider himself authorized, either to remit or to mitigate, in cases where, in his opinion, there has been neither intention of fraud, or (statute) wilful negligence.

2. That he does not consider himself authorized to inflict the whole penalty, in cases where, in his opinion, there has been neither intention of fraud, or (statute) wilful negligence.

3. That he does consider himself authorized, when, in his opinion, necessary and proper, to enforce a part of the penalty in some, and require the payment of costs in all cases where, in his opinion, there has been neither intention of fraud, or (statute) wilful negligence.

The fourth query of the committee is to the following effect:

By what general principles has the decision of the Treasury been regulated in cases where, there being no fraud or (statute) wilful negligence, a part of the penalty or forfeiture has nevertheless been enforced? "Particularly: Whether the Department has deemed itself confined, in such cases, to such a mitigation of the penalty, or forfeiture, as might include the mere incidents of the prosecution, and the 'terms and conditions' on which, having reference to such incidents, it should be made to cease; or, whether, in relation to such cases, it has deemed itself at liberty to take into consideration other circumstances, such as the profits of the Treasury, the gains of the individual the like or other considerations, in estimating the amount of the penalty, or forfeiture, to be exacted."

From what has already been stated, it follows, that, if, by "incidents of prosecution," and terms and conditions connected therewith, the payment of costs only be meant, the Treasury (with the exception of a few cases of great hardship) has required such payment in all cases of remission or mitigation, and has not deemed itself confined to such payment in those cases where it appeared necessary and proper to enforce a part of the penalty or forfeiture. The statute grants, in that respect, two distinct powers—that of prescribing the terms and conditions on which prosecutions shall be discontinued: which, of course, embraces the payment of costs and other incidents of prosecution, and that of mitigating or remitting, only in part, the penalty. Which last authority would be nugatory, and would not therefore have been given, had the law intended to confine the effect of that authority to the costs, or other similar incidents of prosecution; these being embraced by another part of the enacting clause.

In deciding on those cases to which the power of remitting, in whole or in part, does apply, and in graduating the amount of penalty enforced, in those where it appeared improper to grant an unqualified remission, the Treasury has been invariably governed by three principles:

1st. Enforcing laws. 2dly. Reducing the penalty to that amount, and requiring only that portion which appeared sufficient for the purpose of preventing infractions. 3dly. Uniform rules of decision, so far as the diversity of cases rendered them practicable. In the application of those principles to individual cases, several circumstances have naturally been taken into consideration, such as the degree of negligence manifested by the party; the importance, for the safety of the revenue, of the particular provision which had been infringed; the encouragement due to the vigilance of the officers; and, when necessary, for the purpose of checking illegal importations, the profit derived from the transaction.

The gain of the Treasury never had any influence on any decision, or has even been thought of. The portion of a mitigated penalty sometimes happens to be paid into the Treasury, because the law had made one-half payable there, if not mitigated. The decisions of the Treasury never can add anything to the amount actually forfeited, and otherwise legally payable; and whenever a mitigation takes place, it operates as a deduction from such payment. If it ever should be attempted to draw a revenue from forfeitures and penalties, it will be done by giving to the statute a construction precisely the reverse of that now adopted. Instead of restricting the words "wilful negligence" to flagrant infractions, tantamount to fraud, as is now done, in conformity with the obvious meaning of the statute, let those expressions receive that construction of which, in common parlance, they are susceptible; let every negligence, however unimportant, provided it be accompanied with an act of the will, be called "wilful negligence," and every penalty which has been mitigated, together with many of those which have been remitted in full, will fall in the class of those on which no remission can be granted. With that construction, instead of the trifling amount which has been paid into the Treasury for the share of the United States, in mitigated penalties, which have been enforced in part, not less, probably, than two millions of dollars, remitted by those decisions, would have been legally exacted. The exposition of the law, and the preceding arguments, have been adduced only in proof of the correctness of the principles which have been adopted in mitigating penalties: for, in point of fact, the portion which has been paid on that account, in the Treasury, is so inconsiderable, that, if known, it never could have been supposed that what is called the gain of the Treasury had the smallest effect on the decisions.

The whole number of decisions, since the present Secretary of the Treasury has filled that office, viz: from the 14th of May, 1801, to the 14th of December, 1812, amounts to 1,297. In ninety-two of these cases, there being, in the opinion of the Treasury, intent of fraud, or (statute) wilful negligence, no remission could be granted. Of the 1,205 other cases, to which the power of remitting in whole, or in part, applied, there have been 888 in which an absolute remission has been granted, generally on payment of costs; and 317 have been mitigated. In about two-thirds of these, nothing more has been inflicted than the payment of sums, generally inconsiderable, to the use of the custom-house officers. Of the residue, there are 27, consisting of three embargo cases, and of 24 cases of illegal importations, principally from Amelia Island, or in vessels at sea when war was declared, in which the decision has been, that, from the net proceeds of sales, the costs, and (in the cases of importation) the duties in force when the decisions took place, should be deducted; that the residue, if not exceeding the prime cost, freight, insurance, and other charges, should be paid to the claimants, and that the surplus, if any, should be distributed in the same manner as the whole forfeiture, if enforced, would have been. In one of those cases, one hundred and fifty dollars have been paid into the Treasury. It is ascertained that, in many of them, there is no surplus; and the same result is anticipated in most others. In 67 other cases, hereafter stated, in answer to the last query of the committee, the whole amount paid into the Treasury falls short of four thousand dollars. There may be eight or ten more cases of mitigations, in which some payments have been, or may be, made into the Treasury, and which, not being sufficiently designated in the register of decisions, could not be ascertained without a critical examination of all the original papers. The amount of penalties and forfeitures actually paid into the Treasury, and which is hereafter stated, arises, almost exclusively, from cases of fraudulent infractions of the laws, on which no remission whatever could take place, and, in most of which, no application has, of course, been made to the Treasury.

The last query of the committee relates to the principles and amount of mitigations where a certain per centage has, in addition to the duties established by law, been required for the use of the United States.

In cases where a fine is mitigated, it is always done by fixing a sum of money less than the fine. When a forfeiture is mitigated, it is more consistent with the spirit of the law that the reduced payment which is required should still be in proportion to the value of the whole forfeiture incurred. This principle has been adopted in those cases designated as having been mitigated, by requiring the payment of a per centage. All those which have been ascertained amount to sixty-seven, as already stated, and consist of two classes.

1. The first partial non-importation act took effect on the first day of July, 1808. The following rules were adopted with respect to subsequent importations, not fraudulent, and susceptible of remission or mitigation. An absolute remission was granted on all importations in vessels which had sailed from a British port, prior to the 1st of June, 1808, on the ground that there was a possibility of their arrival prior to the time when the law took effect. The forfeiture was mitigated in the subsequent cases, and no greater portion required than what appeared absolutely necessary to prevent continual infractions. For that purpose the forfeiture was reduced to the payment of a sum equal to double the amount of the legal duties, to be divided as the forfeiture itself, if enforced, would have been. But that sum was levied only on the articles actually prohibited, and not on those otherwise admissible, and belonging to the same owners, though they were also forfeited by the law. There were thirty-seven cases of this description. It has been ascertained that the sum paid in the Treasury on thirty of them, amounts to $1,646 44. The sum paid on the seven other cases is blended in the collector's accounts, with the ordinary duties, but, from the value of the merchandise, is estimated to have been less than nine hundred and sixty dollars. The forfeitures remitted by those same decisions are believed to have exceeded half a million of dollars in value.

2. The importation of spirits, porter, and refined sugar, is prohibited in vessels or casks, of a size less than is prescribed by law. In the first decisions made on those cases, the condition of the remission was, that the articles imported contrary to law should be re-exported, without giving any other option to the owners. The only exception, while that rule prevailed, is Gillespie's case, where the spirits had been sold by order of court, prior to the application for a remission being made. The condition of paying one-fourth part of the proceeds was substituted to that of re-exportation, which had become impracticable. The share of the United States, contrary to what was intended, did not, in that case, cover the legal duties. It being, from experience, ascertained that the condition of an absolute re-exportation was sometimes impracticable, and in most cases, more severe than was required for the purpose of preventing infractions of the law, an alternative was added to that condition, by leaving it optional with the claimants, if they did not re-export, to pay a certain sum which, after some variations, was fixed at the rate of five cents per gallon of spirits, for the use of the United States, in addition to the legal duties. But, in all the cases, two only excepted, where the admission arose from inadvertence in filing the decisions, the condition of the re-exportation has always been preserved, and the payment aforesaid imposed only in case of not complying with that condition. The cases of this description, in which any money may have been paid in the Treasury, amount to thirty. The actual payments being blended with the accounts of duties, cannot be ascertained. But the amount of spirits, porter, and sugar, embraced by those cases, have been ascertained from the applications for remission; and it appears that, if no part has been re-exported, and if, in every instance, the parties have preferred to pay the sum to which the forfeiture was reduced, the whole amount paid in the Treasury cannot have exceeded $1,400, and may, therefore, have been less.

A general statement of all the fines, penalties, and forfeitures, paid by the collectors into the Treasury, from the 1st of January, 1794, to the 31st of December, 1811, and amounting to $253,508 05, is enclosed. The expenses of prosecution in those cases, as paid by the marshals, cannot be discriminated from the general expenses paid generally for jurors, witnesses, and all other expenses incident to the prosecutions of every species of offences against the United States, including the safe-keeping of prisoners. The aggregate of all these amounts for the same period, as appears by the annexed statement, to $857,206 69. There can be no doubt that the portion expended in prosecuting for the offences against the revenue and restrictive laws under which the abovementioned fines, penalties, and forfeitures, have been incurred and paid, considerably exceeds the amount actually recovered and paid in the Treasury; and that those penalties have never been a source of revenue, nor been sufficient to defray the expenses of prosecution: for which object they are exclusively appropriated by law. I have the honor, &c.

OWNERS OF PRIVATEERS.

[Communicated to the House, November 23, 1812.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, the memorial of the undersigned, of the city of Baltimore, merchants and owners of private armed commissioned vessels of war, respectfully represents:

That your memorialists have, since the declaration of war, at a heavy charge and cost, purchased, equipped, and fitted for offensive operations, numerous strong and well appointed cruisers, which have done the public enemy immense injury, by the capture of many of her merchant vessels laden with valuable cargoes, and the destruction of at least ten thousand tons of her shipping; that the cruisers of your memorialists have captured and made prisoners of war seven hundred of the seamen of the enemy, who have been exchanged for an equal number of American prisoners, who have thus, through the instrumentality and at the charge of your memorialists, been rescued from captivity; that, trusting to what they deemed the fair construction of the 14th section of the act "concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," and, supposing from the general and comprehensive expressions of the commissions which had been granted to them by the President of the United States, that enemy's property, whether taken bound to the United States or elsewhere, on the high seas, or within our own waters, was lawful prize, your memorialists were greatly induced by this confidence to make larger and more immediate outfits, calculating upon the known course of trade between this country and Great Britain, in which it has been so usual to cover British interests in American names, and knowing that it would be in their power, when armed with the authority of a national commission, to detect and bring to light the belligerent interest; that, in many instances, your memorialists have succeeded in capturing and bringing in for adjudication property so circumstanced, that they had proceeded against it as prize of war, and a general sentiment appeared to prevail among those experienced in the law that, under the fair construction of the prize act, and according to the manifest intention of the Legislature, the captors having incurred the expense of the outfit, having encountered the peril of capture, and having detected the enemy interest, which must otherwise have remained concealed, were entitled, in law, as well as in point of justice, to the benefit of the capture; that, after proceedings had been instituted at their instance, and at a heavy expense, against such property in different districts, your memorialists, who never anticipated any interference on the part of the Government of the United States with their just claims, on the ground of an act of Congress pre-existing the declaration of war, and whose operation they believed to be suspended, as related to prize goods, by the 14th section of the prize act above referred to, now find themselves called upon to defend their rights as well against the pretensions of the Treasury Department as against the shufflings, evasions, and legal subterfuges of fictitious claimants, anxious to screen, because having a common interest in the property of the belligerent. Your memorialists are persuaded that it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to appropriate the proceeds of individual enterprise, exertion, and hazard against the enemy to the exclusive advantage of the public Treasury; and that, if such can, by any possibility, be the legal exposition of their acts, it must have been a mere legislative omission, of which your memorialists confidently hope the injurious consequences will be prevented by an explanatory law.

Your memorialists would further beg leave to submit to the wisdom of Congress the propriety of diminishing, on behalf of the captors, the very heavy duties imposed upon prize goods. They do not require an indiscriminate abatement of duty upon all prize goods, but they would humbly represent that, on various articles, principally intended for exportation, and not consumed within the country, the impost equals, and, on some, exceeds their value in the market; so that it may happen that the captor, instead of being benefited, may have incurred his risk and expense in some instances, without any profit from, and in others at a positive loss by, his prize. Your memorialists would suggest that it is not in consonance to the just principles of revenue that the Government, under the pretence of duty, should take the whole proceeds of the exertions and hazards of the captor, but that there should, in all cases, be a just proportion between the value of the article captured and the claim of the Government thereon, by way of impost. In such cases, therefore, your memorialists would humbly pray a diminution of duty, or that, with respect to prize goods, a fair ratio be established, by law, between the value in market and the impost on the article.

Your memorialists would respectfully call the attention of the Legislature to the embarrassments, difficulties, and delays which they labor under in the determination of prize causes in the different courts of the United States, under the present very imperfect system, even in cases where the enemy interest is incontestably shown, where no claim is interposed, and where, therefore, the proceedings ought to be conducted with the expedition characteristic of Courts of Admiralty. In several such instances a procrastination of many months has taken place, to the extreme injury of the captors, without any reasonable cause of delay, and the hardy seaman who hazarded his life in the public cause, finds himself at last obliged, by necessity, to sacrifice, for a trifle, his share in the just compensation of his perils, to which, as the right is certain, so the remedy ought to be immediate.

While there are numerous acts of Parliament in Great Britain, prescribing to the Courts of Admiralty the mode of proceeding, and insuring to captors a safe and speedy ascertainment of their rights, whereby the private armed service is much encouraged, your memorialists, and others in the like circumstances in the United States, are exposed to the inconvenience of this matter being left entirely open to the discretion of the judges, with the exception of a few words in the prize act. In consequence of which omission, every court has, according to the several impressions of its judges, adopted a mode of proceeding peculiar to itself; and while in one district the remedy of the captor is speedy, in others the determination for a considerable time is suspended, to the great vexation and injury of the interested. That courts belonging to the same country, and exercising, in different districts, precisely the same jurisdiction and power, should be bound by some rules common to them all, in matters of prize, and that the rights of the citizen should not be different before tribunals similarly organized, according to the district in which such rights are to be exercised, would appear to be positions too plain for argument; but that, from the want of the necessary provisions, the rights of war speedily administered in one district, should, in another, be subject to the most vexatious delays, appears to be an evil of such magnitude that your memorialists are persuaded that it is only necessary to show its existence to Congress to secure its prompt legislative redress.

Your memorialists would further submit to Congress some considerations which, although of minor importance, in a national point of view, are of serious moment to them, as owners of private armed vessels of war. Great inconveniences are experienced by them in consequence of that provision of the prize act which renders it incumbent on the captors to proceed against the prize in the first district to which such prize may be brought—a provision which appears to your memorialists to operate exclusively to the benefit of the officers of the customs and of the courts, who claim the possession and benefit of prizes taking refuge in port, as their rights—a provision which, in many instances, may expose the prize to re-capture by the enemy, which deprives the privateer owners of all control over that in which they are the most interested, subjects them to the loss of a bad market, and compels them to submit to a distant and expensive agency, and to frequent detriment from carelessness and mismanagement, which would not have been incurred, if the prize could have been lawfully taken from the district where she first casually arrived, to the district in which the captor resides, and to which the capturing vessel belongs. As to any substantial object of justice, they can discover none which is so gratified by the provision in question, as to render a compliance with the interests and wishes of the captor, in this particular, inexpedient; the question in controversy can be as justly decided in one district as another, in which respect no preference can be presumed in law, and none can be justly given; and the inconvenience from the present arrangement is so sensibly felt, that it will frequently happen that prizes will incur the risk of re-capture, from a longer voyage, rather than put into a near American port, at which the rights of the officers of the customs and of the court may compel her to remain, although it may be to the interest of all concerned that she should proceed to another port. Your memorialists, therefore, pray that captors be permitted, by law, to take their prizes from one port of the United States to another, under such precautions and limitations as to the wisdom of Congress may appear expedient.

Your memorialists would further submit to the consideration of Congress the propriety of a legal provision that the agents of the captors should, in cases where the prize is sold on a credit, be entitled to receive the notes or other securities which have been received upon such sales by the respective marshals of districts, previously securing to the officers their fees and commissions; such a provision, enabling the person specially appointed by the captors to receive the proceeds, would put it in his power in most instances to pay off the officers and seamen before the terms of credit expired, and thus prevent the inconvenience and loss arising from the delay. And as the agents of the owners are in general the agents of the officers and crew, there can be no just exception to the law at once intrusting them with the possession of those funds which must finally come into their hands, through the medium of the clerks of the courts. Your memorialists would likewise suggest that the marshal's commission on the sale of prize goods, which is charged upon the gross amount of sales, is peculiarly burdensome to the captor, in all cases where the United States receive the greater part of the proceeds by way of duties, as such commissions come entirely out of the pocket of the captors, and not unfrequently amount to five or six per centum on the sum which they are entitled to receive, after the deduction of duties. Your memorialists conceive that in justice they should only be chargeable with marshal's commission on the sum by them actually received.

Wherefore your memorialists pray that Congress, taking into consideration the various grievances of which they have herein complained, will pass a law or laws giving them such relief in the premises as to the justice and the fair demands of your memorialists may be due.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT, &c.

[Communicated to the House, February 6, 1813.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 2, 1813.

SIR: Permit me to revive the suggestions I had the honor to make to you in conversation relative to the better organization of the Navy Department; and though it would be premature in me to offer any general system of improvement, yet, in my view, there are some prominent defects in the establishment, which are susceptible of a simple remedy, similar to that of which necessity urged the adoption in relation to the War Department.

The vital error appears to me to consist in loading the Chief of the Department with the cognizance of details, and with the execution of duties which divert his attention from the sound direction of the great and efficient objects of the establishment; or the inevitable alternative is to submit the execution of those duties to subordinate agents, whose responsibility does not afford a sufficient guarantee to the public for the judicious and faithful discharge of the trust. Of this nature is the duty of forming contracts, making purchases, and the effective control and accountability of navy agents, now spread over the interior as well as the Atlantic coast, and which I conceive would employ to great public advantage a distinct department, directed by a responsible and able head. If, in the present state of our Navy, this view of the subject is in any degree correct, the increase, as now provided for by law, must render it indispensable.

I would therefore respectfully suggest the idea of a Naval Purveyor's department, with deputies, as many as may be necessary, to be nominated by the President to the Senate. The Purveyor to reside in some of our central seaport towns, where the state of the market, and the information necessary to form contracts to advantage, can be best known, and effected with the best security; the Secretary of the Navy retaining the control and general direction of all important contracts to be formed by the Purveyor.

Permit me also to ask of you to consider the propriety of increasing the appropriation for clerks in the Navy Department, so as to admit of the addition of two able clerks to the number now employed. I would also suggest the propriety of providing for the appointment of an additional number of captains, in anticipation of those authorized by the act for building the seventy-fours. There is not now a single vacancy; and, unless a captain is taken from one of the navy yards, there is no commander for the Macedonian, although a distinguished master commandant has been designated for that promotion and command; indeed, we have none to provide for casualties, or the fate of battle.

I would also draw your attention to a species of force of vast importance for short coasting convoys, as well as for the annoyance of the enemy. I mean corvettes, such as the Hornet, or rather larger, (such as the enemy employ.) Of this valuable class of vessels we are almost destitute. I think six vessels of this class would be desirable; they can be built by contract on favorable terms, and in service in four months. Orders have been given to construct and equip two corvettes at Erie, and one at Sackett's Harbor, with a view to the complete command of the whole of the lakes. I think, sir, the public could be amply remunerated for the additional six corvettes, by a reduction of the number of gunboats now in service, and the officers and crews of those that may be retained, in situations admitting of such diminution. I have, &c.

WILLIAM JONES.

Hon. BURWELL BASSETT.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 3, 1813.

SIR: With reference to the note I had the honor to address to you on the — instant, permit me to add that the authority to increase the number of captains is equally applicable to the circumstances of the Adams frigate, intended for Captain Morris, who is not yet appointed, and for whom there is no vacancy.

I also pray your attention to a subject which menaces the service with serious inconvenience. Offences committed on board privateers are to be tried by naval courts martial; two have been called for and ordered since I have been in office. It is at all times inconvenient and expensive to institute these tribunals, and, in many cases, may be impracticable; meanwhile, the accused may be suffering the rigors of an unjust imprisonment, and the frequency of offences or charges may create very serious evils. Indeed, a case has already occurred, in which an individual has suffered several months' close confinement, waiting trial. Cannot some other tribunal be substituted?

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM JONES.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 4, 1813.

SIR: Upon more mature reflection and investigation, I am induced to believe that it will for this session be best to postpone the creation of the Purveyor's office, lest it should militate with some of the arrangements necessary to be made at an early period; and during the recess, I shall have an opportunity of testing the utility of the plan, as well as of suggesting some improvements of the system. All that will be necessary at present, will be to provide for two additional clerks in this Department, and I believe they are really necessary. I would propose to embrace in the appropriation for building and equipping the sloops of war, the whole number which may be necessary both on the lakes and the sea, by a section authorizing the building — sloops of war, (say ten of the largest class,) and a section appropriating for the building and equipping the said sloops of war, including $200,000 for expenses incurred in the purchase and building of vessels on the lakes, — dollars.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM JONES.

REFUSAL TO FURNISH MILITIA.

[Communicated to Congress, November 6, 1812.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of the correspondence between the Department of War and the Governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut, referred to in my Message of the fourth instant.

JAMES MADISON.

NOVEMBER 6, 1812.

[Circular.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 15, 1812.

SIR: I am instructed by the President of the United States to call upon the Executives of the several States to take effectual measures to organize, arm, and equip according to law, and hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning, their respective proportions of one hundred thousand militia, officers included, by virtue of an act of Congress, passed the 10th instant, entitled "An act to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States."

This, therefore, is to require your Excellency to take effectual measures for having ten thousand of the militia of Massachusetts (being her quota) detached, and duly organized in companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions, within the shortest period that circumstances will permit, and, as nearly as possible, in the following proportions of artillery, cavalry, and infantry, viz: One-twentieth part of artillery, one-twentieth part of cavalry, and the residue infantry. There will, however, be no objection, on the part of the President of the United States, to the admission of a proportion of riflemen, duly organized in distinct corps, and not exceeding one-tenth part of the whole quota of the States, respectively. Each corps should be properly armed and equipped for actual service.

When the detachment and organization shall have been effected, the respective corps will be exercised under the officers set over them, but will not remain embodied, or be considered as in actual service, until, by subsequent orders, they shall be directed to take the field.

Your Excellency will please to direct that correct muster rolls and inspection returns be made of the several corps, and that copies thereof be transmitted to this Department, as early as possible.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

W. EUSTIS.

His Excellency the Governor of Massachusetts.

[A similar letter was addressed to the Governors of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 12, 1812.

SIR: I am directed by the President to request your Excellency to order into the service of the United States, on the requisition of Major General Dearborn, such part of the quota of militia from the State of Massachusetts, detached conformably to the act of April 10th, 1812, as he may deem necessary for the defence of the seacoast.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

His Excellency CALEB STRONG,
Governor of Massachusetts.

Refusal to furnish Militia.

HEAD QUARTERS, BOSTON, June 22, 1812.

SIR: I have received instructions from the President of the United States to call on your Excellency for such part of the quota of militia from the State of Massachusetts, detached conformably to the act of Congress of April 10th, 1812, as I may deem necessary for the defence of the seacoast; and I now have the honor of requesting your Excellency to order fourteen companies of artillery, and twenty-seven companies of infantry, into the service of the United States, for the defence of the ports and harbors in this State, and the harbor of Newport.

The companies are intended for the following ports and harbors, viz: Passamaquoddy, one company of artillery, and four companies of infantry, with a full complement of officers, to be commanded by a major; Marblehead, Salem, Cape Ann, and Newburyport, two companies of artillery and two companies of infantry; Boston, four companies of artillery and eight companies of infantry, with one lieutenant colonel commandant and one major; and eight companies of infantry for the defence of Rhode Island.

Having received official information that war has been declared by Congress against Great Britain, your Excellency will perceive the expediency of giving facility to such measures as the crisis demands; and, as the defence of the seacoast of New England is, at present, confided to my direction, I shall, with confidence, rely on all the aid and support that the respective Governors can afford, and more especially on that of the Governor of the important State of Massachusetts; and I shall, at all times, receive, with the greatest pleasure, any advice or information that your Excellency may be pleased to communicate.

With respectful consideration. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HIS EXC'Y CALEB STRONG,
Governor of Massachusetts.

Omitted in the above:—Machias, one company of artillery; Penobscot, one company of artillery and two companies of infantry, to be commanded by a major; Wiscasset and Damariscotta, two companies of artillery, one each; Kennebunk, one company of artillery; Portland, two companies of artillery and three companies of infantry, to be commanded by a major.

BOSTON, June 26, 1812.

SIR: Not having received any notice from your Excellency, or the Adjutant General, of what measures have been taken for calling into the service of the United States, for the defence of our seacoast, the companies of detached militia, proposed in a note I had the honor of addressing to your Excellency, on the 22d instant, a sense of duty compels me to solicit such information on the subject as the urgency of the case demands; and I am persuaded that no unnecessary delay will disappoint my anxious desire for as early information as circumstances will admit.

With respect, &c. H. DEARBORN.

HIS EXC'Y CALEB STRONG, &c.

BOSTON, June 26, 1812.

SIR: I have received your letter, of this day, in which you request information of the measures which have been taken for calling the militia into the service of the United States.

I find that Governor Gerry, on the 25th April last, ordered that ten thousand men should be detached from the militia of this State; but, I am informed by the Adjutant General, that the returns of those detachments have not come to hand, except in a very few instances.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

CALEB STRONG.

To Major General DEARBORN.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 21, 1812.

SIR: By information received from Major General Dearborn, it appears that the detachments from the militia of Massachusetts, for the defence of the maritime frontier, required by him under the authority of the President, by virtue of the act of the 10th of April, 1812, have not been marched to the several stations assigned them.

Inasmuch as longer delay may be followed with distress to a certain portion of our fellow-citizens, and with injurious consequences to our country, I am commanded, by the President, to inform your Excellency, that this arrangement of the militia was preparatory to the march of the regular troops to the Northern frontier. The exigencies of the service have required, and orders have accordingly been given to Major General Dearborn, to move the regular troops to that frontier, leaving a sufficient number to man the guns in the garrisons on the seaboard. The execution of this order increases, as your Excellency cannot fail to observe, the necessity of hastening the detached militia to their several posts, as assigned by General Dearborn, in which case, they will, of course, be considered in the actual service and pay of the United States.

The danger of invasion, which existed at the time of issuing the order of the President, increases, and I am specially directed by the President to urge the consideration to your Excellency, as requiring the necessary order to be given for the immediate march of the several detachments specified by General Dearborn, to their respective posts. I have the honor to be, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

HIS EXC'Y CALEB STRONG,
GOVERNOR of Massachusetts.

BOSTON, August 5, 1812.

I received your letter of the 21st July, when at Northampton, and the next day came to Boston. The people of this State appear to be under no apprehension of an invasion; several towns, indeed, on the seacoast, soon after the declaration of war, applied to the Governor and Council for arms and ammunition, similar to the articles of that kind which had been delivered to them by the State, in the course of the last war; and, in some instances, they were supplied accordingly. But they expressed no desire that any part of the militia should be called out for their defence, and, in some cases, we were assured such a measure would be disagreeable to them.

You observe, in your last letter, that the danger of invasion which existed at the time of issuing the order of the President, increases. It would be difficult to infer from this expression, that, in your opinion, that danger is now very considerable, as the President's order must have been issued before war was declared, your former letter being dated the 12th of June, and General Dearborn's, who was then at Boston, on the 22d of that month; besides, it can hardly be supposed that, if this State had been in great danger of invasion, the troops would have been called from hence to carry on offensive operations in a distant Province. However, as it was understood that the Governor of Nova Scotia had, by proclamation, forbid any incursions or depredations upon our territories, and as an opinion generally prevailed that the Governor had no authority to call the militia into actual service, unless one of the exigencies contemplated by the Constitution exists, I thought it expedient to call the Council together, and, having laid before them your letter, and those I had received from General Dearborn, I requested their advice on the subject of them.

The Council advised, that they are unable, from a view of the Constitution of the United States, and the letters aforesaid, to perceive that any exigency exists, which can render it advisable to comply with the said requisition. But as, upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions, the Governor and Council have authority to require the opinion of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court, it is advisable to request the opinion of the Supreme Court upon the following questions:

"1st. Whether the commanders-in-chief of the militia of the several States have a right to determine whether any of the exigencies contemplated by the Constitution of the United States exist, so as to require them to place the militia, or any part of it, in the service of the United States, at the request of the President, to be commanded by him, pursuant to acts of Congress?

"2d. Whether, when either of the exigencies exist, authorizing the employing of the militia in the service of the United States, the militia thus employed can be lawfully commanded by any officer but of the militia, except by the President of the United States?"

I enclose a copy of the answers given by the judges to these questions. Since the Council were called, a person deputed by the towns of Eastport and Robinson, on our Eastern boundary, at Passamaquoddy, applied to me, representing that they had no apprehensions of invasion by an authorized British force, but that there were many lawless people on the borders from whom they were in danger of predatory incursions, and requesting that they might be furnished with some arms and ammunition, and that three companies of militia might be called out for their protection. The Council advised that they should be supplied with such arms and ammunition as were necessary for their present defence, which has been ordered. They also advised me to call into the service of the United States three companies of the detached militia, for the purposes above mentioned. I have this day issued an order for calling out three companies of the detached militia, to be marched, forthwith, to Passamaquoddy, and to be commanded by a major. Two of the companies will be stationed at Eastport, and one company at Robinson, until the President shall otherwise direct.

I have no intention officiously to interfere in the measures of the General Government, but if the President was fully acquainted with the situation of this State, I think he would have no wish to call our militia into service in the manner proposed by General Dearborn.

It is well known that the enemy will find it difficult to spare troops sufficient for the defence of their own territory, and predatory incursions are not likely to take place in this State: for, at every point, except Passamaquoddy, which can present no object to those incursions, the people are too numerous to be attacked by such parties as generally engage in expeditions of that kind.

General Dearborn proposed that the detached militia should be stationed at only a few of the ports and places on the coast; from the rest, a part of their militia were to be called away. This circumstance would increase their danger; it would invite the aggressions of the enemy, and diminish their power of resistance.

The whole coast of Cape Cod is exposed, as much as any part of the State, to depredations; part of the militia must, according to this detaching order, be marched from their homes; and yet, no place in the old colony of Plymouth is assigned to be the rendezvous of any of the detached militia.

Every harbor or port within the State has a compact settlement, and, generally, the country around the harbors is populous. The places contemplated in General Dearborn's specification, as the rendezvous of the detached militia, excepting in one or two instances, contain more of the militia than the portion of the detached militia assigned to them. The militia are well organized, and would undoubtedly prefer to defend their firesides, in company with their friends, under their own officers, rather than to be marched to some distant place, while strangers might be introduced to take their places at home.

In Boston, the militia are well disciplined, and could be mustered in an hour upon any signal of an approaching enemy, and in six hours the neighboring towns would pour in a greater force than any invading enemy will bring against it.

The same remark applies to Salem, Marblehead, and Newburyport, places whose harbors render an invasion next to impossible. In all of them, there are, in addition to the common militia, independent corps of infantry and artillery, well disciplined and equipped, and ready, both in disposition and means, to repair to any place where invasion may be threatened, and able to repel it, except it should be made by a fleet of heavy ships, against which nothing perhaps but strong fortifications, garrisoned by regular troops, would prove any defence, until the enemy should land, when the entire militia would be prepared to meet them.

Kennebunk is unassailable by anything but boats, which the numerous armed population is competent to resist. Portland has a militia, and independent corps, sufficiently numerous for its defence; and the same is the case with Wiscasset and Castine.

Against predatory incursions, the militia of each place would be able to defend their property, and, in a very short time, they would be aided, if necessary, by the militia of the surrounding country. In case of a more serious invasion, whole brigades or divisions could be collected, seasonably, for defence. Indeed, considering the state of the militia in this Commonwealth, I think there can be no doubt that, detaching a part of it, and distributing it into small portions, will tend to impair the defensive power.

I have thus freely expressed to you my own sentiments, and, so far as I have heard, they are the sentiments of the best informed men. I am fully disposed to afford all the aid to the measures of the National Government which the Constitution requires of me; but I presume it will not be expected, or desired, that I shall fail in the duty which I owe to the people of this State, who have confided their interests to my care.

I am, sir, &c. CALEB STRONG.

Hon. W. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

To his Excellency the Governor, and the honorable the Council of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

The undersigned, Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court, have considered the questions proposed by your Excellency and Honors for their opinion.

By the Constitution of this State, the authority of commanding the militia of the Commonwealth is vested exclusively in the Governor, who has all the powers incident to the office of Commander-in-Chief, and is to exercise them personally, or by subordinate officers under his command, agreeably to the rules and regulations of the Constitution and the laws of the land.

While the Governor of the Commonwealth remained in the exercise of these powers, the Federal Constitution was ratified, by which was vested in the Congress a power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to provide for governing such parts of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers.

The Federal Constitution further provides that the President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States.

On the construction of the Federal and State Constitutions must depend the answers to the several questions proposed. As the militia of the several States may be employed in the service of the United States, for the three specific purposes of executing the laws of the Union, of suppressing insurrections, and of repelling invasions, the opinion of the judges is requested whether the commanders-in-chief of the militia of the several States have a right to determine whether any of the exigencies aforesaid exist, so as to require them to place the militia, or any part of it, in the service of the United States, at the request of the President, to be commanded by him pursuant to acts of Congress.

It is the opinion of the undersigned that this right is vested in the commanders-in-chief of the militia of the several States.

The Federal Constitution provides that, whenever either of these exigencies exists, the militia may be employed, pursuant to some act of Congress, in the service of the United States; but no power is given, either to the President, or to the Congress, to determine that either of the said exigencies do in fact exist. As this power is not delegated to the United States, by the Federal Constitution, nor prohibited by it, to the States, it is reserved to the States, respectively; and, from the nature of the power, it must be exercised by those with whom the States have, respectively, intrusted the chief command of the militia.

It is the duty of these commanders to execute this important trust agreeably to the laws of their several States, respectively, without reference to the laws, or officers, of the United States, in all cases except those specially provided in the Federal Constitution. They must, therefore, determine when either of the special cases exist obliging them to relinquish the execution of this trust, and to render themselves, and the militia, subject to the command of the President. A different construction, giving to Congress the right to determine when these special cases exist, authorizing them to call forth the whole of the militia, and taking them from the commanders-in-chief of the several States, and subjecting them to the command of the President, would place all the militia, in effect, at the will of Congress, and produce a military consolidation of the States, without any Constitutional remedy, against the intentions of the people when ratifying the Constitution. Indeed, since passing the act of Congress, of February 28th, 1795, c. 101, vesting in the President the power of calling forth the militia, when the exigencies mentioned in the Constitution shall exist, if the President has the power of determining when those exigencies exist, the militia of the several States is in effect at his command and subject to his control.

No inconveniences can reasonably be presumed to result from the construction, which vests in the commanders-in-chief of the militia of the several States, the right of determining when the exigencies exist, obliging them to place the militia in the service of the United States. These exigencies are of such a nature that the existence of them can be easily ascertained by, or made known to, the commander-in-chief of the militia, and when ascertained, the public interest will produce prompt obedience to the acts of Congress.

Another question proposed to the consideration of the judges, is, whether, when either of the exigencies exist authorizing the employing of the militia in the service of the United States, the militia thus employed can be lawfully commanded by any officer but of the militia, except by the President of the United States?

The Federal Constitution declares that the President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States. He may undoubtedly exercise this command by officers of the Army of the United States, by him commissioned according to law. The President is also declared to be the Commander-in-Chief of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States. The officers of the militia are to be appointed by the States, and the President may exercise his command of the militia by officers of the militia duly appointed.

But we know of no Constitutional provision authorizing any officer of the Army of the United States to command the militia, or authorizing any officer of the militia to command the Army of the United States. The Congress may provide laws for the government of the militia, when in actual service, but to extend this power to the placing them under the command of an officer not of the militia, except the President, would render nugatory the provision, that the militia are to have officers appointed by the States.

The union of the militia in the actual service of the United States with troops of the United States, so far as to form one army, seems to be a case not provided for, or contemplated, in the Constitution. It is, therefore, not within our department to determine on whom the command would devolve, on such an emergency, in the absence of the President; whether one officer, either of the militia, or of the Army of the United States, to be settled according to military rank, should command the whole; whether the corps must be commanded by their respective officers, acting in concert as allied forces; or what other expedient should be adopted, are questions to be answered by others.

The undersigned regret that the distance of the other Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court renders it impracticable to obtain their opinions, seasonably, upon the questions submitted.

THEOPHILUS PARSONS,
SAMUEL SEWALL,
ISAAC PARKER.

BOSTON, August 21, 1812.

SIR: I mentioned in my letter to you of the 5th of August, that I had that day issued an order for calling out three companies of the detached militia, to be marched immediately to Passamaquoddy, for the defence of that frontier, and to be commanded by a major. In my instructions to Major General Sewall, to be communicated to the major to be designated by him, I directed that two of the companies should be stationed at Eastport, and one company at Robinston, until the President should direct otherwise, unless, in the mean time, the major, with the advice of Brigadier General Brewer, who lives at Robinston, and to whom I wrote on the subject, should think a different disposition of the companies would be more advantageous.

I have this day received a letter from General Sewall, dated the 17th instant, in which he says that he had designated the detached company in the neighborhood of Eastport, under the command of Captain Thomas Vose, junior, of Robinston. The detached company in the interior neighborhood of Penobscot river, under the command of Captain Joshua Chamberlain, of Orrington, and the detached company in the same neighborhood, under the command of Captain Thomas George, of Brewer, to form a battalion, to be commanded by Major Nathan Low, of Deer Isle, and directed them to march immediately to Eastport, and that they would probably march the next day. I shall immediately write to Major Low, and direct him to conform to the above instructions, in disposing of the companies, until the President of the United States shall otherwise direct.

I am, sir, with respect,

CALEB STRONG.

Hon. WM. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

NORTHAMPTON, Sept. 10, 1812.

SIR: I received this morning a letter from Major General Sewall, dated the first of this month, in which he mentioned that the detached troops, from the neighborhood of Penobscot, had marched to Eastport, five or six days before that time, with their adjutant and quartermaster, but that Major Low, who was appointed to command them, had been released from that service on account of bodily infirmity, and that Major Jacob Ulmer, of Lincolnville, was appointed in his room, and had been notified to proceed immediately to Eastport.

General Sewall observes that application had been made to him for the appointment of a commissary and surgeon, for the post at Eastport, and if those appointments, or either of them, are thought necessary, he proposes Mr. Chevy, an officer of the artillery, for the former, and Doctor Bastow, a surgeon in the militia, for the latter, both inhabitants of Eastport.

I am, sir, with sentiments of respect, your most obedient servant,

CALEB STRONG.

Hon. WM. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

LYME, April 20, 1812.

SIR: I had the honor this morning to receive your letter of the 15th instant, containing the directions of the President of the United States for detaching three thousand of the militia of this State, agreeably to the provisions of the act of Congress of the 10th instant. The act itself has not been received, and it will be very satisfactory to me to receive a copy of it by the next mail from your department. In the meantime every preparation will be made for detaching the officers and men, agreeably to the directions already received. I have the honor to be, &c.

SIR: I am directed by the President to request your Excellency to order into the service of the United States, on the requisition of Major General Dearborn, such part of the quota of militia from the State of Connecticut, detached conformably to the act of April 10, 1812, as he may deem necessary for the defence of the seacoast.

I have the honor to be, &c.

His Ex'cy ROGER GRISWOLD,
Governor of Connecticut.

LYME, June 17, 1812.

SIR: I have had the honor this afternoon to receive your letter of the 12th instant, communicating to me the request of the President that I would order into the service of the United States, on the requisition of Major General Dearborn, such part of the quota of militia from the State of Connecticut, detached conformably to the act of Congress of April 10th, 1812, as he may deem necessary for the defence of the seacoast.

In obedience to which request, I shall, on the requisition of General Dearborn, execute without delay the request of the President.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

ROGER GRISWOLD.

Hon. WM. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

SHARON, (CT.), July 2, 1812.

SIR: His Excellency Governor Griswold has received from Major General Henry Dearborn a letter, under date of the 22d of last month, requesting that five companies of the militia of this State, detached conformably to the act of Congress of April 10, 1812, may be ordered into the service of the United States, to wit: "Two companies of artillery, and two companies of infantry, to be placed under the command of the commanding officer at Fort Trumbull, near New London, and one company of artillery, to be stationed at the battery at the entrance of the harbor of New Haven."

Impressed with the deep importance of the requisition, and the serious consideration it involves, his Excellency deemed it expedient to convene the Council at Hartford, on Monday the 29th ultimo. He has taken their advice upon this interesting subject, and has formed his own deliberate opinion; but, as he is under the necessity of leaving the State, on a journey for the recovery of his health, it becomes my duty, as Lieutenant Governor, to communicate to you the result.

The assurance contained in the Governor's letter of the 17th of June last, in answer to yours of the 12th of the same month, was necessarily given in full confidence that no demand would be made through General Dearborn, but in strict conformity to the Constitution and laws of the United States. His Excellency regrets to perceive that the present requisition is supported by neither.

The Constitution of the United States has ordained that Congress may provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Accordingly, the acts of Congress of February, 1795, and of April, 1812, do provide for calling forth the militia in the exigencies above mentioned. The Governor is not informed of any declaration made by the President of the United States, or of notice by him given, that the militia are required "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, or repel invasions." As, therefore, none of the contingencies enumerated in the Constitution, and recognised by the laws, are shown to have taken place, his Excellency considers that, under existing circumstances, no portion of the militia of this State can be withdrawn from his authority. Further, if the call had been justified by either of the Constitutional exigencies already recited, still, in the view of his Excellency, an insuperable objection presents itself against placing the men under the immediate command of an officer or officers of the army of the United States.

The appointment of the officers of the militia is by the Constitution expressly reserved "to the States respectively." In the event of their being called into the actual service of the United States, in the case above specified, the laws of the United States provide for their being called forth as militia, furnished with proper officers by the State. And, sir, it will not escape your notice, that the detachment from the militia of this State, under the act of Congress of the 10th of April last, is regularly organized into a division, consisting of brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies, and supplied according to law with all the necessary officers. His Excellency conceives, then, that an order to detach a number of companies sufficient for the command of a battalion officer, and place them under the command of an officer of the United States, cannot, with propriety, be executed, unless he were also prepared to admit that the privates may be separated from their company officers, and transferred into the Army of the United States; thus leaving the officers of the militia without any command, except in name; and in effect impairing, if not annihilating, the militia itself, so sacredly guarantied by the Constitution to the several States. Under these impressions, the Governor has thought proper, by and with the advice of the Council, to refuse a compliance with the requisition of Major General Dearborn.

Refusal to furnish Militia.

His Excellency is sincerely disposed to comply promptly with all the Constitutional requests of the National Executive; a disposition which has ever been manifested by the Government of this State; and he laments the occasion which thus compels him to yield obedience to the paramount authority of the Constitution and laws. He trusts the General Government will speedily provide an adequate force for the security and protection of the seacoast. In the meantime, his Excellency has issued the necessary orders to the general officers commanding the militia in that quarter to be in readiness to repel any invasion which may be attempted upon that portion of the State, and to co-operate with such part of the national forces as shall be employed for the same purpose.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and very humble servant,

JOHN COTTON SMITH.

Hon. WM. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 14, 1812.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of the third instant.

The absence of His Excellency, Governor Griswold, on account of ill health, is seriously to be regretted, particularly at this important crisis, when his prompt assurances of obeying the requisition of the President, to call into the service of the United States such detachments of militia as might be required, conformably to the act of April 10, 1812, through General Dearborn, are intercepted and suspended by your Honor.

The reasons assigned for refusing to execute the engagements of his Excellency, Governor Griswold, appear not less extraordinary than the act itself.

After a declaration of war against a nation possessed of a powerful and numerous fleet, a part of which were actually on our coast, had been promulgated, and officially communicated to the Executive of the State, the assertion made by your Honor, "that the Governor is not informed that the United States are in imminent danger of invasion," was not to have been expected. To remove all doubts from your mind on this subject, I am instructed by the President to state to you, that such danger actually exists; and to request that the requisition of General Dearborn, made by his special authority, for calling into the service of the United States certain detachments of militia from the State of Connecticut, be forthwith carried into effect.

The right of the State to officer the militia is clearly recognised in the requisition of General Dearborn. The detachments, when marched to the several posts assigned them, with their proper officers, appointed conformably to the laws of the State, will command, or be commanded, according to the rules and articles of war and the usages of service. Very respectfully, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

His Honor JOHN C. SMITH,
Governor of Connecticut.

LYME, August 13, 1812.

SIR: His Honor Governor Smith has put into my hands your letter of the 14th of July, and it is with surprise I notice the construction you have put on my letter of the 17th of June. The unusual and exceptionable terms, also, in which your letter is expressed, have not escaped notice. But a regard to the propriety of my own conduct will not allow me to descend to any comments upon its particular expressions, but leave me to perform my duty to the General Government, by giving the explanation which appears proper.

When you communicated the request of the President that any future requisition from General Dearborn for a part of the draughted militia, might be complied with, it remained uncertain whether such a requirement would be made, or, if made, under what circumstances it might take place.

Confident, however, that the President would authorize no requisition which was not strictly Constitutional, and particularly that the order would not exceed the conditions of the act of the 10th of April, to which you had referred, I had no hesitation in giving general assurance that the requisitions which the President might make through General Dearborn would be complied with. I then thought, as I do still, that decency, and a due respect to the first Magistrate of the Union, required that my assurance should be general, and no expression should be used which might imply a suspicion that the President would violate the Constitution in his orders. I also expected that this early and general declaration would be considered as evidence of a disposition which has been uniformly felt in this State, to execute every Constitutional requisition from the General Government.

In what light, however, my expressions have been viewed, I trust there will be no future misconstruction, when I assure you that I neither intended or expected to be understood, by the general language of my letter, or any expression it contained, to give the smallest assurance that I would execute any order which I judged repugnant to the Constitution, from whatever source it might emanate.

The light in which I have viewed the order from General Dearborn has been already communicated by Governor Smith, and it is only proper to add that my opinion has not changed, but is confirmed by the unanimous opinions of the Council of the State.

The new light in which you have presented the subject in your letter to Governor Smith has received every attention, but still my opinion remains the same. The war, which has commenced, and the cruising of a hostile fleet on our coast, is not invasion; and the declaration of the President, that there is imminent danger of invasion, is evidently a consequence drawn from the facts now disclosed, and is not, in my opinion, warranted by those facts. If such consequences were admitted to result from a declaration of war with an European Power, it would follow that every war of that character would throw the militia into the hands of the National Government, and strip the States of the important right reserved to them. In addition to the foregoing facts, it is proper for me further to observe, that I have found it difficult to fix in my mind the meaning of the words "imminent danger of invasion," used by Congress in the act of the 28th of February, 1795, and now repeated in your letter, as no such expression is contained in that part of the Constitution which authorizes the President to call the militia into service. Presuming, however, that some definite meaning, thought consistent with the Constitution, was at the time annexed to the expression, I have rather inferred that the Legislature must have intended only to include an extreme case, where an enemy had not passed the line of the United States, but were evidently advancing in force to invade our country. Such a case would undoubtedly come within the spirit of the Constitution, although it might not be included in its literal expression.

But whether the Congress in 1795 were justified in the expression, or not, is unimportant, there being no difficulty in the present case, as none of the facts disclosed furnish anything more than a slight danger of invasion, which the Constitution could not contemplate, and which might exist even in times of peace.

While I regret this difference of opinion on a question of such importance, I do not doubt that the President will do me the justice to believe that a sense of duty leaves me no other course to pursue, and that every means for the defence of the State will be speedily provided for.

I have the honor to be your most obedient and humble servant,

ROGER GRISWOLD.

Approved, November 12, 1812.

JAMES MADISON.

An Act further to prolong the continuance of the Mint at Philadelphia.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act, entitled "An act concerning the Mint," approved March the third, one thousand eight hundred and one, is hereby revived and continued in force and operation, for the further term of five years, after the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen.

Approved, December 2, 1812.

An Act making an appropriation to defray expenses incurred, or to be incurred, under an act, entitled "An act to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States;" and the act entitled "An act for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes," passed the twenty-eighth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of one million of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards defraying any expense incurred, or to be incurred, under an act, entitled "An act to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States," passed the tenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twelve; and, also, under an act, entitled "An act for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes," passed the twenty-eighth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five," to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, December 12, 1812.

An Act increasing the pay of non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, and others of the Army, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, the monthly pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, drivers, bombardiers, matrosses, sappers, miners, artificers, saddlers, farriers, and blacksmiths, who have enlisted, or shall hereafter enlist in the service of the United States, shall, during the continuance of the war between the United States of America and their Territories, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the dependencies thereof, be as follows, to wit: To each sergeant major and quartermaster sergeant, twelve dollars; to each sergeant and principal musician, eleven dollars; to each corporal, ten dollars; to each musician, nine dollars; to each private, driver, bombardier, matross, sapper, and miner, eight dollars; to each artificer, saddler, farrier, and blacksmith, not attached to the quartermaster general's and ordnance department, thirteen dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, during the continuance of the war with Great Britain, no non-commissioned officer, musician, private, driver, bombardier, matross, sapper, miner, artificer, saddler, farrier, or blacksmith, enlisted in the service of the United States, during his continuance in service, shall be arrested, or subject to arrest, or to be taken in execution for any debt contracted before or after enlistment.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, who shall, after the promulgation of this act, be recruited in the regular Army of the United States, may, at his option, to be made at the time of enlistment, engage to serve during the present war with Great Britain, instead of the term of five years; and shall, in case he makes such option, be entitled to the same bounty in money and land, and to all other allowances, and be subject to the same rules and regulations, as if he had enlisted for the term of five years.

Approved, December 12, 1812.

An Act concerning the District and Territorial Judges of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, hereafter, it shall be incumbent upon the district and territorial judges of the United States, to reside within the districts and territories, respectively, for which they are appointed; and that it shall not be lawful for any judge, appointed under the authority of the United States, to exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or to be engaged in the practice of the law. And any person offending against the injunction or prohibition of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor.

Approved, December 18, 1812.

An Act to increase the Navy of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States shall be, and he hereby is, authorized, as soon as suitable materials can be procured therefor, to cause to be built, equipped, and employed, four ships, to rate not less than seventy-four guns, and six ships to rate forty-four guns each.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed on board each of the said ships of seventy-four guns each, one captain, six lieutenants, one captain, one first lieutenant and one second lieutenant of marines, one surgeon, one chaplain, one purser, and three surgeons' mates.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed in each of the said ships, carrying seventy-four guns, the following warrant officers, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States: one master, one second master, three masters' mates, one boatswain, one gunner, one carpenter, one sailmaker, and twenty midshipmen; and the following petty officers, who shall be appointed by the captains of the ships, respectively, in which they are to be employed, viz: one armorer, six boatswains' mates, three gunners' mates, two carpenters' mates, one sailmaker's mate, one cooper, one steward, one master at arms, one cook, one coxswain, one boatswain's yeoman, one gunner's yeoman, one carpenter's yeoman, ten quarter gunners, eight quartermasters, and one clerk, and one schoolmaster, also to be appointed by the captain.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the crews of each of the said ships of seventy-four guns, shall consist of two hundred able seamen, three hundred ordinary seamen and boys, three sergeants, three corporals, one drummer, one fifer, and sixty marines.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the pay of the schoolmaster shall be twenty-five dollars per month and two rations per day.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sum of two millions five hundred thousand dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the building and equipping of the aforesaid ships of war.

Approved, January 2, 1813.

An Act directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines, forfeitures, and penalties, in certain cases.

Be it enacted, &c., That in all cases where goods, wares, and merchandise, owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, have been imported into the United States from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, which goods, wares, and merchandise, were shipped on board vessels which departed therefrom between the twenty-third day of June last, and the fifteenth day of September last, and the person or persons interested in such goods, wares, or merchandise, or concerned in the importation thereof, have thereby incurred any fine, penalty, and forfeiture, under an act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," and an act, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," and the act supplementary to the act last mentioned, on such person or persons petitioning for relief, to any judge or court proper to hear the same, in pursuance of the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the fines, forfeitures, and penalties, in certain cases therein mentioned," and on the facts being shown, on inquiry had by said judge or court, stated and transmitted, as by said act is required, to the Secretary of the Treasury; in all such cases wherein it shall be proved to his satisfaction that said goods, wares, and merchandise, at the time of their shipment, were bona fide owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, and shipped and did depart from some port or place in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, owned as aforesaid, between the twenty-third day of June last, and the fifteenth day of September last, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to remit all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, that may have been incurred under the said acts, in consequence of such shipment, importation, or importations, upon the costs and charges that have arisen or may arise being paid, and on payment of the duties which would have been payable by law on such goods, wares, and merchandise, if legally imported; and, also, to direct the prosecution or prosecutions, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease and be discontinued: Provided, nevertheless, That no case in which the purchase of such goods, wares, and merchandise was made, after war was known to exist between the United States and Great Britain, at the port or place where such purchase was made, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

Approved, January 2, 1813.

Public Acts of Congress.

An Act approving of the report of the Commissioners appointed by the Secretary at War, to ascertain and settle the exterior line of the public land at West Point, in the State of New York.

Be it enacted, &c., That the report of the commissioners appointed by the Secretary at War to settle the exterior line of the public land at West Point, in the State of New York, with the adjoining proprietor, conformably to an act to authorize the Secretary at War to ascertain and settle, by the appointment of commissioners, the exterior line of the public land at West Point with the adjoining proprietor, be and the same is hereby approved.

Approved, January 5, 1813.

An Act authorizing the President of the United States to establish post routes, in certain cases.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States, during the existence of the war in which the United States are engaged, or of any war in which they may be engaged, shall be and is hereby authorized to direct the Postmaster General to send a mail between the headquarters of any army of the United States, and such post office as he may think proper; and the route or road on which the same shall be conveyed shall, to all intents and purposes, be an established post road, so long as the mail shall be sent on the same, conformably to the authority hereby given.

Approved, January 14, 1813.

An Act providing Navy Pensions, in certain cases.

Be it enacted, &c., That if any officer of the navy or marines shall be killed or die, by reason of a wound received in the line of his duty, leaving a widow, or, if no widow, a child or children, under sixteen years of age, such widow, or, if no widow, such child or children, shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death, which allowance shall continue for and during the term of five years; but in case of the death or intermarriage of such widow, before the expiration of the said term of five years, the half pay for the remainder shall go to the child or children of the said deceased officer: Provided, That such half pay shall cease on the death of such child or children; and the money required for this purpose shall be paid out of the navy pension fund, under the direction of the commissioners of that fund.

Approved, January 20, 1813.

An Act making certain partial appropriations for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of one million of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards defraying the expenses of the Military Establishment of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen; and that the sum of one million of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards defraying the expenses of the Navy during the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be appropriated for the purposes herein recited, that is to say: Towards defraying the compensation granted by law to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, their officers and attendants, during the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, fifty thousand dollars.

Towards defraying the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, during the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, ten thousand dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations, hereinbefore made, shall be paid and discharged out of any moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, January 20, 1813.

An Act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the more perfect organization of the Army of the United States."

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one additional major to the first regiment of light dragoons, the regiment of light artillery, each regiment of infantry, and the rifle regiment, in the army of the United States; who shall receive the like pay, rations, forage, and other emoluments, as officers of the same grade and corps of the present military establishment.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be appointed, in manner aforesaid, one third lieutenant to each troop or company, in the army of the United States, who, if of cavalry or light dragoons, shall receive the monthly pay of thirty dollars, and of other corps, twenty-three dollars, and be allowed the same forage, rations, and other emoluments, as second lieutenants of the same corps to which they belong.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there be allowed to each troop or company, in the army of the United States, one additional sergeant, who shall receive the like pay, clothing, rations, and other emoluments, as sergeants of the present military establishment.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in order to complete the present military establishment to the full number authorized by law, with the greatest possible despatch, there shall be paid to each effective able-bodied man, who shall be duly enlisted into the service of the United States, after the first day of February next, to serve for the term of five years, or during the war, an advance of twenty-four dollars, on account of his pay, in addition to the existing bounty; one half of such advance to be paid at the enlistment of the recruit, and the other half when he shall be mustered and have joined some military corps of the United States, for service; and a bounty of one hundred and sixty acres of land, as heretofore established by law.

Public Acts of Congress.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers who shall be employed in the recruiting service, shall be entitled to receive for every effective able-bodied man, who shall be duly enlisted after the first day of February next, by them, for the term of five years or during the war, and mustered, and between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, the sum of four dollars: Provided nevertheless, That this regulation, so far as respects the age of the recruit, shall not extend to musicians, or to those soldiers who may re-enlist into the service: And provided also, That no person under the age of twenty-one years shall be enlisted by any officer, or held in the service of the United States, without the consent, in writing, of his parent, guardian, or master, first had and obtained, if any he have; and if any officer shall enlist any person contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, for every such offence he shall forfeit and pay the amount of the bounty and clothing which the person so recruited may have received from the public, to be deducted out of the pay and emoluments of such officer.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person during the time he may be performing a tour of militia duty to enlist in the regular army of the United States, and the recruiting officers are hereby authorized to enlist any such person, in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as if he were not performing such militia duty; and every person who shall enlist, while performing a tour of militia duty as aforesaid, shall be thereby exonerated from serving the remainder of said tour; and the State to which he may belong shall not be required to furnish any other person to serve in his stead.

Approved, January 20, 1813.

An Act in addition to the act concerning Letters of Marque, Prizes, and Prize Goods.

Be it enacted, &c., That all prizes of vessels and property, captured by private armed ships, commissioned under the authority of the United States, which may be condemned in any district or circuit court of the United States, shall be sold at public auction, by the marshal of the district in which the same shall be condemned, within sixty days after the condemnation thereof; sufficient notice of the time and place, and conditions of sale, being first given, on such day or days, on such terms of credit, and in such lots or proportions as may be designated by the owner or owners, or agent of the owner or owners of the privateer which may have captured the same: Provided, That the term of such credit shall not exceed ninety days; and the said marshal is hereby directed to take and receive from the purchaser of such prize vessel and property the money therefor, or his, her, or their promissory notes, with endorsers, to be approved by the owner or owners of the privateer, to the amount of the purchase, payable according to the terms thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That upon all duties, costs, and charges, being paid according to law, the said marshal shall, on demand, deliver and pay over to the owner or owners of the privateer, or to the agent of such owner or owners of the privateer, which may have captured such prize vessel and property, a just and equal proportion of the funds received on account of the sale thereof, and of the promissory notes directed to be taken as aforesaid, to which the said owner or owners may be entitled, according to the articles of agreement between the said owner or owners, and the officers and crew of the said privateer; and a just and equal proportion of the proceeds of the sale as aforesaid, shall, on demand, be also paid over by the said marshal to the officers and crew of the said privateer, or to their agent or agents. And if there be no written agreement, it shall be the duty of the marshal to pay over, in manner as aforesaid, one moiety of the proceeds of the sale of such prize vessel and property to the owner or owners, agent or agents of the owner or owners of the privateer, which may have captured the same; and the other moiety of the said proceeds to the agent or agents of the officers and crew of the said privateer, to be distributed according to law, or to any agreement by them made: Provided, The said officers and crew, or their agent or agents, shall have first refunded to the owner or owners, or to the agent of the owner or owners of the privateer aforesaid, the full amount of advances which shall have been made by the owner or owners of the privateer, to the officers and crew thereof.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the selling prize property, and receiving and paying over the proceeds as aforesaid, the marshal shall be entitled to a commission of one per cent. and no more, first deducting all duties, costs, and charges, which may have accrued on said property: Provided, That on no case of condemnation and sale of any one prize vessel and cargo shall the commissions of the marshal exceed two hundred and fifty dollars.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the marshal, within fifteen days after any sale of prize property, to file in the office of the clerk of the district court, of the district wherein such sale may be made, a just and true account of the sales of such prize property, and of all duties and charges thereon, together with a statement thereto annexed of the promissory notes taken on account thereof, which account shall be verified by the oath of the said marshal; and if the said marshal shall wilfully neglect, or refuse to file such account, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars for each omission or refusal as aforesaid, to be recovered in an action of debt by any person interested in such sale, and suing for the said penalty, on account of the party or parties interested in the prize vessel or property sold as aforesaid, in any court having cognizance thereof.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners of any private armed vessel or vessels, or their agent or agents, may, at any time before a libel shall be filed against any captured vessel or her cargo, remove the same from any port into which such prize vessel or property may be first brought, to any other port in the United States, to be designated at the time of the removal as aforesaid, subject to the same restrictions and complying with the same regulations, with respect to the payment of duties, which are provided by law, in relation to other vessels arriving in port with cargoes subject to the payment of duties: Provided, That before such removal the said captured property shall not have been attached at the suit of any adverse claimant, or a claim against the same have been interposed in behalf of the United States.

Approved, January 27, 1813.

An Act authorizing the admission, under certain circumstances, of vessels owned by citizens of the United States of America, with their cargoes, from British ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

Be it enacted, &c., That in all cases where goods, wares, and merchandise, bona fide the property of a citizen or citizens of the United States, have been imported into the United States from British ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope, for the cargoes of which vessels bonds have been required at the port or place of shipment from, and have been given by the owners, agents, consignees, or supercargoes of such vessels, that the cargoes thereof shall be delivered or landed at some port or place in the United States; and the person or persons interested in such goods, wares, or merchandise, or concerned in the importation thereof, have incurred thereby any fine, penalty, and forfeiture, or have delivered the same into the possession or custody of the United States, on such person petitioning for relief to any judge or court proper to hear the same, in pursuance of the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating and remitting the fines, forfeitures, and penalties, in certain cases therein mentioned;" and on the facts being shown, on inquiry had by said judge or court, stated and transmitted as by said act is required to the Secretary of the Treasury; in all such cases wherein it shall be proved to his satisfaction that said goods, wares, and merchandise, at the time of their shipment, were bona fide owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, and for the landing or delivery of which at some port or place in the United States bonds were required and given as aforesaid, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to remit all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which may have been incurred in consequence of such shipment, importation, or importations, to deliver up possession of the said vessels, goods, wares, and merchandise to the owner or owners thereof, upon the costs or charges that have arisen, or may arise, being paid, and the duties payable on such goods, wares, and merchandise, or which would have been payable if they had been legally imported, being paid or secured to be paid according to law, as if the same had been imported and entered at the time of the release thereof; and also to direct the prosecution or prosecutions, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery of such fines, penalties, and forfeitures, to cease and be discontinued: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to a remission of or exemption from any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, which has been or may be incurred for a breach of any law or laws of the United States, other than such as prohibit the admission into the United States of goods, wares, and merchandise, imported as aforesaid.

Approved, January 27, 1813.

An Act in addition to the act, entitled "An act to raise an additional military force," and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, in addition to the present Military Establishment of the United States, there be raised such number of regiments of infantry, not exceeding twenty, as in the opinion of the President may be necessary for the public service, to be enlisted for the term of one year, unless sooner discharged.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That each of the said regiments shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, one adjutant, one paymaster, one quartermaster, one surgeon, two surgeon's mates, one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, two principal musicians, and ten companies.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That each company shall consist of one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, one third lieutenant one ensign, five sergeants, six corporals, two musicians, and ninety privates.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in the recess of the Senate, to appoint such of the officers authorized by this act, as may not be appointed during the present session; which appointments shall be submitted to the Senate at their next session for their advice and consent.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, authorized by this act, shall receive the like pay, forage, rations, clothing, and other emoluments (the land and bounty excepted) as the officers of the same grade and corps, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the present Military Establishment.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the regiments hereby authorized to be raised, shall be governed by the rules and articles of war, which have been established by the United States in Congress assembled, or by such rules and articles as may be hereafter by law established.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers who shall be employed in recruiting the force authorized by this act, shall be entitled to receive, for every person enlisted by them into this service, for the term specified, and approved by the commanding officer of the regiment, and between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, the sum of two dollars: Provided nevertheless, That this regulation, so far as respects the age of the recruits, shall not extend to musicians, or those soldiers who may re-enlist into the service: And provided also, That no person, under the age of twenty-one years, shall be enlisted by any officer, or held in the service of the United States, without the consent, in writing, of his parent, guardian, or master, first had and obtained, if any he have; and if any officer shall enlist any person contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, for every such offence he shall forfeit and pay the amount of the bounty and clothing, which the persons so recruited may have received from the public, to be deducted out of the pay and emoluments of such officer.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid to each man, recruited as aforesaid, a bounty of sixteen dollars; but the payment of eight dollars of the said bounty shall be deferred until he shall be mustered, and have joined some military corps of the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the said regiments shall be paid in such manner, that the arrears shall at no time exceed two months, unless the circumstances of the case shall render it unavoidable.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, shall be disabled by wounds or otherwise, while in the line of his duty in public service, he shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States, at such a rate of pension and under such regulations as are or may be directed by law: Provided always, That the compensation to be allowed for such wounds or disabilities, to a commissioned officer, shall not exceed, for the highest rate of disability, half the monthly pay of such officer, at the time of his being disabled or wounded; and that no officer shall receive more than the half pay of a lieutenant-colonel; and that the rate of compensation to non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, shall not exceed five dollars per month: And provided also, That all inferior disabilities shall entitle the person so disabled to receive an allowance proportionate to the highest disability.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That if any commissioned officer shall, while in the service of the United States, die, by reason of any wound received in actual service of the United States, and leave a widow, or, if no widow, a child or children, under sixteen years of age, such widow, or, if no widow, such child or children, shall be entitled to and receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death, for and during the term of five years; but in case of the death or intermarriage of such widow, before the expiration of the said term of five years, the half pay for the remainder of the time shall go to the child or children of such deceased officer: Provided always, That such half pay shall cease on the decease of such child or children.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That if any non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, shall desert the service of the United States, he shall, in addition to the penalties mentioned in the rules and articles of war, be liable to serve for and during such a period as shall, with the time he may have served previous to his desertion, amount to the full term of his enlistment; and such soldier shall and may be tried by a court martial, and punished, although the term of his enlistment may have elapsed previous to his being apprehended or tried.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That every officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, shall take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation, to wit: "I, A. B., do solemnly swear or affirm (as the case may be) that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America; and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against their enemies or opposers whomsoever; and that I will observe and obey the orders of the President of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed over me, according to the rules and articles of war."

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That where any commissioned officer shall be obliged to incur any extra expense in travelling and sitting on general courts martial, he shall be allowed a reasonable compensation for such extra expense, actually incurred, not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per day to officers who are not entitled to forage, and not exceeding one dollar per day to such as shall be entitled to forage.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That whenever any officer or soldier shall be discharged from the service, except by way of punishment for an offence, he shall be allowed his pay and rations, or an equivalent in money, for such term of time as shall be sufficient for him to travel from the place of discharge to the place of his residence, computing at the rate of twenty miles to a day.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed to each brigade one chaplain, who shall be entitled to the same pay and emoluments as a major in the infantry.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That no field or staff officer, who may be appointed by virtue of this act, shall be entitled to receive any pay or emoluments until he shall be called into actual service, nor for any longer time than he shall continue therein.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted. That the act, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept and organize certain volunteer military corps," and the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled, 'An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept and organize certain volunteer military corps,'" be, and the same are hereby repealed, from and after the first day of February next: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to deprive the officers and men who may have entered the service as volunteers, under the said acts, of any rights, immunities, or privileges therein secured, or the United States of the services of such volunteers, agreeably to the provisions of the said acts.

Approved, January 29, 1813.

An Act for the relief of the Bible Society of Philadelphia.

Be it enacted, &c., That the duties arising and due to the United States upon certain stereotype plates, imported during the last year into the port of Philadelphia, on board the ship Brilliant, by the Bible Society of Philadelphia, for the purpose of printing editions of the Holy Bible, be and the same are hereby remitted, on behalf of the United States, to the said society: and any bond or security given for the securing of the payment of the said duties shall be cancelled.

Approved, February 2, 1813.

An Act supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes, and to increase the pay of volunteer and militia corps.

Be it enacted, &c., That in every case in which a court martial shall have adjudged and determined a fine against any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, of the militia, for any of the causes specified in the act to which this act is a supplement, or in the fourth section of an act, entitled "An act to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States;" all such fines, so assessed, shall be certified to the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, in the same manner as the act to which this act is a supplement directed the same to be certified to the supervisor of the revenue.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the marshals shall pay all fines which have been levied and collected by them or their respective deputies, under the authority of the acts herein referred to, into the Treasury of the United States, within two months after they shall have received the same, deducting five per centum for their own trouble; and, in case of failure, it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Treasury to give notice to the District Attorney of the United States, who shall proceed against the said marshal in the district court by attachment for the recovery of the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of volunteer and militia corps, who, subsequent to the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, shall have been or may hereafter be called out, while in the service of the United States, shall, during the continuance of the present war between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, and the United States of America and their territories, be entitled to and receive the same monthly pay, rations, and forage, and furnished with the same camp equipage, as are or may be provided by law for the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the Army of the United States.

Approved, February 2, 1813.

An Act giving the right of pre-emption in the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the Illinois Territory.

Be it enacted, &c., That every person, or the legal representative of every person, who has actually inhabited and cultivated a tract of land lying in either of the districts established for the sale of public lands, in the Illinois Territory, which tract is not rightfully claimed by any other person, and who shall not have removed from said Territory; every such person and his legal representatives shall be entitled to a preference in becoming the purchaser from the United States of such tract of land at private sale, at the same price, and on the same terms and conditions, in every respect, as are or may be provided by law for the sale of other lands sold at private sale in said Territory, at the time of making such purchase: Provided, That no more than one quarter section of land shall be sold to any one individual, in virtue of this act; and the same shall be bounded by the sectional and divisional lines run, or to be run, under the direction of the Surveyor General for the division of the public lands: Provided also, That no lands reserved from sale by former acts, or lands which have been directed to be sold in town lots, and out lots, shall be sold under this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every person claiming a preference in becoming the purchaser of a tract of land, in virtue of this act, shall make known his claim, by delivering a notice in writing, to the register of the land office, for the district in which the land may lie, wherein he shall particularly designate the quarter section he claims; which notice the register shall file in his office, on receiving twenty-five cents from the person delivering the same. And in every case where it shall appear, to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of public moneys of the land office, that any person, who has delivered his notice of claim, is entitled, according to the provision of this act, to a preference in becoming the purchaser of a quarter section of land, such person so entitled shall have a right to enter the same, with the register of the land office, on producing his receipt from the receiver of public moneys for at least one-twentieth part of the purchase money, as in case of other public lands sold at private sale: Provided, That all lands to be sold under this act shall be entered with the register at least two weeks before the time of the commencement of the public sales, in the district wherein the land lies: and every person having a right of preference in becoming the purchaser of a tract of land, who shall fail so to make his entry with the register, within the time prescribed, his right shall be forfeited, and the land by him claimed shall be offered at public sale, with the other public lands in the district to which it belongs.—[Approved, February 5, 1813.

An Act authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding sixteen millions of dollars.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding sixteen millions of dollars, to be applied, in addition to the moneys now in the Treasury, or which may be received from other sources, to defray any of the expenses which have been, or, during the present session of Congress may be authorized by law, and for which appropriations have been, or, during the present session of Congress, may be made by law: Provided, That no engagement nor contract shall be entered into, which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums thus borrowed at any time after the expiration of twelve years, from the first day of January next: And it is hereby further declared, That it shall be deemed a good execution of the said power to borrow, for the President of the United States to cause to be sold, the whole or any part of the certificates of stock issued for the sums to be borrowed by virtue of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States do cause to be laid before Congress, on the first Monday in February, eighteen hundred and fourteen, or so soon thereafter as Congress may be in session, an account of all moneys obtained by the sale of the certificates of stock, by virtue of the power given him by the preceding section, together with a statement of the rate at which the same may have been sold.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ, with the approbation of the President of the United States, an agent or agents, for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions to the loan authorized by this act, or of selling any part of the stock created by virtue thereof. A commission not exceeding one quarter of one per cent. on the amount thus sold, or for which subscriptions shall have been thus obtained, may, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be allowed to such agent or agents; and a sum not exceeding forty thousand dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated for paying the amount of such commission or commissions, as may be thus allowed, and also for defraying the expenses of printing and issuing the subscription certificates and certificates of stock and other expenses incident to the receiving of subscriptions, and completing the loan authorized by this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That so much of the funds constituting the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars, for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt of the United States, as may be wanted for that purpose, after satisfying the sums necessary for the payment of the interest, and such part of the principal of said debt, as the United States are now pledged annually to pay or reimburse, is hereby pledged and appropriated for the payment of the interest, and for the reimbursement of the principal of the stock which may be created by virtue of this act: it shall accordingly be the duty of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to cause to be applied and paid out of the said fund, yearly, such sum and sums as may be annually wanted to discharge the interest accruing on the said stock, and to reimburse the principal as the same shall become due, and may be discharged in conformity with the terms of the loan; and they are further authorized to apply, from time to time, such sum or sums, out of the said fund, as they may think proper, towards redeeming by purchase, and at a price not above par, the principal of the said stock, or any part thereof. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged, to establish sufficient revenues for making up any deficiency that may hereafter take place in the funds hereby appropriated for paying the said interest and principal sums, or any of them, in manner aforesaid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any of the banks in the District of Columbia, to lend any part of the sum authorized to be borrowed by virtue of this act, anything in any of their charters of incorporation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, February 8, 1813.

An Act regulating pensions to persons on board private armed ships.

Be it enacted, &c., That the two per centum reserved in the hands of the Collectors and Consuls by the act of June, eighteen hundred and twelve, entitled "An act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," shall be paid to the Treasury, under the like regulations provided for other public money and shall constitute a fund for the purposes provided for by the seventeenth section of the beforementioned act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized and required to place on the pension list, under the like regulations and restrictions as are used in relation to the Navy of the United States, any officer, seaman, or marine, who, on board of any private armed ship or vessel bearing a commission of letter of marque, shall have been wounded or otherwise disabled in any engagement with the enemy; allowing to the captain a sum not exceeding twenty dollars per month; to lieutenants and sailing master, a sum not exceeding twelve dollars each per month; to marine officer, boatswain, gunner, carpenter, master's mate, and prize-masters, a sum not exceeding ten dollars each per month; to all other officers a sum not exceeding eight dollars each per month, for the highest rate of disability, and so in proportion; and to a seaman, or acting as a marine, the sum of six dollars per month, for the highest rate of disability, and so in proportion; which several pensions shall be paid, by direction of the Secretary of the Navy, out of the fund above provided, and from no other.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the commanding officer of every vessel, having a commission, or letters of marque and reprisal, shall enter in his journal the name and rank of any officer, and the name of any seaman, who, during his cruise, shall have been wounded or disabled as aforesaid, describing the manner and extent, as far as practicable, of such wound or disability.

Public Acts of Congress.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every collector shall transmit quarterly to the Secretary of the Navy, a transcript of such journal as may have been reported to him, so far as it gives a list of the officers and crew, and the description of wounds and disabilities, the better to enable the Secretary to decide on claims for pensions.

Approved, February 13, 1813.

An Act confirming certain claims to lands in the District of Vincennes.

Be it enacted, &c., That all the decisions of the register and receiver of public moneys for the district of Vincennes, made in favor of persons claiming donation lands in the said district, as entered in a list of claims, which, in the opinion of the said register and receiver, ought to be confirmed in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act providing for the sale of certain lands in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes," passed on the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ten, which list is a part of their report to the Secretary of the Treasury, bearing date of the twenty-seventh day of May, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following persons, whose claims, according to the aforesaid report, are not embraced by the provisions of the above recited act, but which nevertheless, in the opinion of the register and receiver, ought to be confirmed, shall be, and their claims are hereby, confirmed, respectively, to the following quantities of land, that is to say: the heirs of Francis Peltier, the heirs of Bernice Lefever, and the heirs of Jean Btt. Valecour, respectively, four hundred acres; Rene Campeau, Francois Cardinal, the heirs of Joseph Pancake, the heirs of Jacob Howell, the heirs of Alexander Wilson, the heirs of Daniel Sullivan, and the heirs of Jacob Tevebaugh, respectively, one hundred acres.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several persons whose claims are confirmed by this act, are hereby authorized to enter their locations with the register of the land office at Vincennes, on any part of the tract set apart for that purpose in said district, by virtue of the act, entitled "An act respecting claims to lands in the Indiana Territory and State of Ohio," and in conformity to the provisions of that act: Provided, That such locations shall be made prior to the first day of October next; and the right of any person who shall neglect to locate prior to that day shall become void and forever be barred.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person, or the legal representative of every person, whose claim to a tract of land is confirmed by this act, shall, whenever his claim shall have been located and surveyed, be entitled to receive, from the register of the land office at Vincennes, a certificate, stating that the claimant is entitled to receive a patent for such tract of land by virtue of this act; for which certificate the register shall receive one dollar; and which certificate shall entitle the party to a patent for the said tract of land, which shall issue, in like manner, as is provided by law for the other lands of the United States.

Approved, February 13, 1813.

An Act making provision for an additional number of General Officers.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint six major generals, in addition to those already authorized by law; each of whom shall be allowed two aids-de-camp, to be taken from the officers of the line, and six brigadier generals, who shall be allowed a brigade major, and one aid-de-camp, each to be taken also from the officers of the line.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the officers authorized by this act, shall receive the same pay, forage, rations, and other emoluments, as the officers of the same grade of the present Military Establishment.

Approved, February 24, 1813.

An Act authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause Treasury notes for such sum or sums as he may think expedient, but not exceeding in the whole the sum of five millions of dollars, to be prepared, signed, and issued, in the manner herein-after provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, in addition to the amount authorized by the next preceding section of this act, to cause Treasury notes, for such sum or sums as he may think expedient, but not exceeding, in the whole, the further sum of five millions of dollars, to be prepared, signed, and issued, in the manner hereinafter provided: Provided, That the amount of money borrowed or obtained, by virtue of the notes which may be issued by virtue of this section, shall be deemed, and held to be, in part of the sum of sixteen millions of dollars, authorized to be borrowed by virtue of the act to that effect, passed during the present session of Congress.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said Treasury notes shall be reimbursed by the United States, at such places, respectively, as may be expressed on the face of the said notes, one year, respectively, after the day on which the same shall have been issued; from which day of issue they shall bear interest, at the rate of five and two-fifths per centum a year, payable to the owner and owners of such notes, at the Treasury, or by the proper commissioner of loans, or by the officer designated for that purpose, at the places and times respectively designated on the face of said notes, for the payment of the principal.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said Treasury notes shall be respectively signed, in behalf of the United States, by persons to be appointed for that purpose by the President of the United States, two of which persons shall sign each note, and shall each receive, as a compensation for that service, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents for every hundred notes thus signed by them, respectively; and the said notes shall likewise be countersigned by the commissioner of loans for that State, where the notes may respectively be made payable, or by the Register of the Treasury, if made payable in the District of Columbia, or by a person to be appointed for that purpose by the President of the United States, if made payable in a State for which there is no commissioner of loans; which person or persons thus appointed shall also receive, as a compensation for that service, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents for every hundred notes thus signed by him or them respectively.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to cause to be issued such portion of the said Treasury notes as the President may think expedient, in payment of supplies, or debts due by the United States, to such public creditors, or other persons, as may choose to receive such notes in payment, as aforesaid, at par; and the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to borrow, from time to time, not under par, such sums as the President may think expedient on the credit of such notes; or to sell, not under par, such portion of the said notes as the President may think expedient: and it shall be a good execution of this provision to pay such notes to such bank or banks, as will receive the same at par, and give credit to the Treasury of the United States, for the amount thereof, on the day on which the said notes shall thus be issued and paid to such bank or banks respectively.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to employ an agent or agents for the purpose of selling any portion of the notes which may be issued by virtue of this act: a commission not exceeding one-quarter of one per cent., on the amount thus sold, may, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be allowed to such agent or agents; and a sum not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated for paying such commission or commission as may be thus allowed.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said Treasury notes shall be transferrable by delivery and assignment, endorsed thereon by the person to whose order, the same shall, on the face thereof, have been made payable.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said Treasury notes, wherever made payable, shall be everywhere received in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the authority of the United States, and of all public lands sold by the said authority: on every such payment credit shall be given for the amount of both the principal and the interest, which, on the day of such payment, may appear due on the note or notes thus given in payment: and the said interest shall, on such payments, be computed at the rate of one cent and one-half of a cent per day, on every hundred dollars of principal, and each month shall be computed as containing thirty days.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That any person making payment to the United States, in the said Treasury notes, into the hands of any collector, receiver of public moneys, or other public officer or agent, shall, on books kept according to such forms as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, give duplicate certificates of the number and respective amount of principal and interest of each and every Treasury note thus paid by such person; and every collector, receiver of public moneys, or other public officer or agent, who shall thus receive any of the said Treasury notes in payment, shall, on payment of the same into the Treasury, or into one of the banks where the public moneys are, or may be, deposited, receive credit both for the principal and for the interest, computed as aforesaid, which, on the day of such last mentioned payment, shall appear due on the note or notes thus paid in; and he shall be charged for the interest accrued on such note or notes from the day on which the same shall have been received by him in payment as aforesaid, to the day on which the same shall be paid by him as aforesaid: Provided, always, That no such charge or deduction shall be made with respect to any bank, into which payments as aforesaid, may be made to the United States, either by individuals or by collectors, receivers, or other public officers, or agents, and which shall receive the same as specie, and give credit to the Treasurer of the United States for the amount thereof, including the interest accrued and due on such notes on the day on which the same shall have been thus paid into such bank, on account of the United States.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be reimbursed and paid the principal and interest of the Treasury notes which may be issued by virtue of this act, at the several time and times when the same, according to the provisions of this act, should be thus reimbursed and paid; and the said commissioners are further authorized to make purchases of the said notes, in the same manner as of other evidences of the public debt, and at a price not exceeding par, for the amount of the principal and interest due at the time of purchase of such notes. So much of the funds constituting the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars, for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt of the United States, as may be wanted for that purpose, after satisfying the sums necessary for the payment of the interest and such part of the principal of the said debt, as the United States are now pledged annually to pay and reimburse, including therein the interest and principal which may become payable upon any loan or loans which may be contracted by virtue of any law passed during the present session of Congress, is hereby pledged and appropriated for the payment of the interest, and for the reimbursement or purchase of the principal of the said notes; and so much of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as may be necessary for that purpose, is hereby appropriated for making up any deficiency in the funds thus pledged and appropriated, for paying the principal and interest as aforesaid; and that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed for that purpose, to cause to be paid to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund such sum or sums of money, and at such time and times as will enable the said Commissioners faithfully and punctually to pay the principal and interest of the said notes.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That a sum of forty thousand dollars, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, for defraying the expense of preparing, printing, engraving, signing, and otherwise incident to the issuing of the Treasury notes authorized by this act.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly aid or assist in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting, any note in imitation of, or purporting to be, a Treasury note aforesaid; or shall falsely alter, or cause, or procure to be falsely altered, or willingly aid or assist in falsely altering any Treasury note issued as aforesaid; or shall pass, utter, or publish, or attempt to pass, utter, or publish, as true, any false, forged, or counterfeited note, purporting to be a Treasury note as aforesaid, knowing the same to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited; or shall pass, utter, or publish, or attempt to pass, utter, or publish as true, any falsely altered Treasury note issued as aforesaid, knowing the same to be falsely altered, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony, and being thereof convicted, by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labor for a period not less than three years, nor more than ten years, and be fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars.

Approved, February 25, 1813.

An Act to impose a duty on the importation of iron wire.

Be it enacted, &c., That iron wire, which, from and after the passage of this act, shall be imported into the United States and the Territories thereof, shall be subject to the same duty as is paid on the importation of iron, steel, or brass locks, hinges, hoes, anvils, and vices.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That an addition of ten per centum shall be made on the rate of duty hereby directed to be collected on the importation of iron wire as aforesaid, in ships or vessels not of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the duty laid by this act shall be levied and collected in the same manner, and under the same regulations and allowances as to drawbacks, mode of security, and time of payment, as the duties now in force on the articles hereinbefore enumerated.

Approved, February 25, 1813.

An Act to raise ten additional companies of rangers.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise ten additional companies of rangers, on the same provisions, conditions, and restrictions, as those authorized to be raised by "An act authorizing the President of the United States to raise certain companies of rangers for the protection of the frontier of the United States," which said companies shall be in lieu of one of the regiments authorized to be raised by the act in addition to the act entitled "An act to raise an additional military force, and for other purposes," passed the twenty-ninth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen.

Approved, February 25, 1813.

An Act to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress.

Be it enacted, &c., That, after the adjournment of the present session, the next meeting of Congress shall be on the fourth Monday of May next.

quity had by the said judge or courts, stated and transmitted, as by the said act is required, to the Secretary of the Treasury; in all such cases wherein it shall be proved, to his satisfaction, that the said goods, wares, and merchandise, at the time of their importation or introduction into the United States were bona fide American property, that they were not clandestinely imported or introduced, and that they were imported or introduced since the declaration of war aforesaid, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to remit all fines, penalties, and forfeitures that may have been incurred under the said acts, in consequence of such importation or introduction into the United States, upon the costs and charges that have arisen, or may arise, being paid on payment of the duties that would have been payable by law, on such goods, wares, and merchandise, if legally imported; and also, to direct the prosecution or prosecutions, if any shall have been instituted, for the recovery of the said fines, penalties, and forfeitures, to cease and be discontinued.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the duties payable on the goods, wares, and merchandise, embraced by the provisions of the act, entitled "An act authorizing the admission, under certain circumstances, of vessels owned by citizens of the United States of America, with their cargoes, from British ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope," shall not, in any case, be paid, or secured to be paid, in such manner as to postpone the payment of such duties beyond the time and times at which the said duties should have become payable, if the goods, wares, and merchandise had been imported and entered at the time of passing this act, anything in the act above mentioned to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, February 27, 1813.

An Act in addition to an act regulating the Post Office Establishment.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for carrying mails of the United States in any steamboat or boats, which are or may be established to ply between one post town and another post town: Provided, That such contract shall not be made for a longer period than four years: And provided also, That the pay for such service shall not be at a greater rate, taking into consideration distance, expedition, and frequency, than is paid for carrying the mail by stages, on the post road or roads, or adjacent to the course of such steamboats, and that such contracts shall secure the regular transportation of the mail throughout each year.

Approved, February 27, 1813.

An Act authorizing the appointment of additional officers in the respective Territories of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be appointed in the respective Territories of the United States a person learned in the law, to act as Attorney of the United States, who shall, besides the usual fees of office, receive an annual salary of two hundred and fifty dollars, payable quarter-yearly, at the Treasury of the United States; and there shall also be appointed, in each of said Territories, a Marshal, who shall receive the same fees and compensation as is allowed by law to the Marshal of the district of Kentucky.

Approved, February 27, 1813.

An Act to establish certain post roads in the State of Louisiana.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following post roads be established: from Natchez, in the Mississippi Territory, by Concordia, to Catahoula, and from thence, by Rapids, to Natchitoches; from St. Francisville, by St. Helena and St. Tammany, to Madisonville.

An Act to encourage Vaccination.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an agent to preserve the genuine vaccine matter, and to furnish the same to any citizen of the United States, whenever it may be applied for, through the medium of the post office; and such agent shall, previous to his entering upon the execution of the duties assigned to him by this act, and before he shall be entitled to the privilege of franking any letter or package as herein allowed, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation, before some magistrate, and cause a certificate thereof to be filed in the General Post Office: "I, A. B., do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will faithfully use my best exertions to preserve the genuine vaccine matter, and to furnish the same to the citizens of the United States; and also, that I will abstain from everything prohibited in relation to the establishment of the post office of the United States." And it shall be the duty of the said agent to transmit to the several postmasters in the United States a copy of this act; and he shall also forward to them a public notice, directing how and where all application shall be made to him for vaccine matter.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all letters or packages, not exceeding half an ounce in weight, containing vaccine matter, or relating to the subject of vaccination, and that alone, shall be carried by the United States' mail free of any postage, either to or from the agent who may be appointed to carry the provisions of this act into effect: Provided always, That the said agent, before he delivers any letter for transmission by the mail, shall, in his own proper handwriting, on the outside thereof, endorse the word "vaccination," and thereto subscribe his name, and shall previously furnish the postmaster of the office where he shall deposit the same with a specimen of his signature; and if said agent shall frank any letter or package, in which shall be contained anything relative to any subject other than vaccination, he shall, on conviction of every such offence, forfeit and pay a fine of fifty dollars, to be recovered in the same manner as other fines or violations of law establishing the post office: Provided also, That the discharge of any agent, and the appointment of another in his stead, be at the discretion of the President of the United States.

Approved, February 27, 1813.

An Act giving further time for registering claims to lands in the eastern and western districts of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana.

Be it enacted, &c., That every person or persons claiming lands in the eastern or western district of the Territory of Orleans, now State of Louisiana, who are actual settlers on the land which they claim, and whose claims have not been heretofore filed with the register of the land office for the district wherein the lands lie, shall be allowed until the first day of January next, to deliver notices in writing, and the written evidences of their claims, in the said districts, respectively, to the register of the land office at New Orleans and Opelousas; and the notices and evidences so delivered, within the time limited by this act, shall be recorded in the same manner, and on payment of the same fees, as if the same had been delivered before the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eight; but the rights of such persons as shall neglect so doing, within the time limited by this act, shall, so far as they are derived from, or founded on, any act of Congress, ever after be barred and become void, and the evidences of their claims never after admitted as evidence in any court of the United States against any grant derived from the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every person or persons who had filed his or their notice of claims to land, lying within either of the said districts with the proper register of the land office, according to former laws, but have not exhibited any testimony or written evidence in support of the same, and whose claim has not been confirmed by the commissioners appointed to ascertain and settle claims to lands in the said districts, shall be allowed until the first day of January next, to deliver the written evidence or other testimony in support of his or their claim, the notice of which had been filed as aforesaid, to the register of the land office at New Orleans, for lands lying in the eastern district, and the register of the land office at Opelousas, for lands lying in the western district; and every written evidence of claim, the notice whereof had been filed as aforesaid, for lands lying in the said districts, delivered, within the time limited by this section, to the said registers, shall, by them, respectively be recorded in the same manner as was directed, and on receiving the same fees allowed by former acts for recording evidence of claim to lands in the same districts; and the right of any such persons neglecting to deliver the evidence of their claims as abovementioned, shall become barred and void in so far as the same is derived from the United States, and the evidence thereof be incapable of being admitted in any court whatsoever against any grant derived from the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the register and receiver of public moneys of the said respective land offices at New Orleans and Opelousas, shall have the same powers and perform the same duties in every respect, in relation to the claims that may be filed according to the first section of this act, and the claims, notice of which had been given under former acts, and the evidence in support thereof shall have been delivered according to the second section of this act, as the board of commissioners, for ascertaining and adjusting claims to lands in the same districts, would have had or should have performed, if such notice had been filed, and such evidence delivered, before the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eight, except, that their decisions shall be subject to the revision of Congress.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the register and receiver of each of the said land offices, respectively, to make, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a report of all the claims filed with the register as aforesaid, with the substance of the evidence in support thereof, and of the claims formerly filed, in support of which evidence shall have been received, with the substance of such evidence, and also their opinion, and such remarks respecting the claims as they may think proper to make; which report, together with a list of the claims which, in the opinion of the register and receiver, ought to be confirmed, shall be laid by the Commissioner of the General Land Office before Congress, at their next session, for their determination thereon.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the register and receiver of the aforesaid land offices shall have power to appoint a clerk, whose duties shall be the same, in relation to the aforesaid claims, as were required of the clerk to the board of commissioners for the same districts, and the said registers, receivers, and clerks, shall each be allowed fifty cents for each claim on which a decision shall be made, in their respective districts, whether such decision be in favor or against the claims; which allowance of fifty cents shall be in full compensation for their services under this act. And a further sum of fifty cents shall be allowed on each claim decided as aforesaid, to defray the expense of making translations from the French and Spanish languages.

Approved, February 27, 1813.

An Act to authorize and empower the President and Managers of the Washington Turnpike Company of the State of Maryland, when organized, to extend and make their turnpike road to or from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, through the said District, to the line thereof.

Be it enacted, &c., That the law of the State of Maryland, entitled "An act to incorporate a company to make a turnpike road from the line of the District of Columbia, where it crosses the post road leading from Georgetown to Fredericktown, through Montgomery and Frederick counties to Fredericktown," passed in the year one thousand eight hundred and five, and the supplement thereto, be, and they are hereby declared to be, in full force, within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the president and managers of said company, when organized according to law, shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to make said turnpike road from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, through Tennyaltown, to the line of said District, in the same manner, and upon the same terms and conditions, as by law they are authorized to make the said turnpike, within the limits of the State of Maryland.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, when and so soon as the said turnpike road shall be completed from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to Montgomery court-house, in the State of Maryland, it shall and may be lawful for the said president and managers of said company to erect a toll-gate on this side of, and near to Tennyaltown, and there to demand and receive such tolls, and on such terms and conditions, as by the law of the State of Maryland they are authorized to demand and receive, at any toll-gate erected on said road within the limits of the State of Maryland.

Approved, February 27, 1813.

An Act to continue in force, for a limited time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers."

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act passed on the twenty-fifth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and four, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," as is contained in the first section of the said act, and which was continued in force for the time therein mentioned, by an act, entitled "An act to continue in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers,'" passed on the thirty-first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, be, and the same is hereby, continued in force until the first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and thence to the end of the next ensuing session of Congress: Provided, however, That the additional duty laid by said section shall be collected on all such goods, wares, and merchandise, liable to pay the same, as shall have been imported previous to the end of that session of Congress.

Approved, February 27, 1813.

An Act for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged with Great Britain, it shall not be lawful to employ on board any of the public or private vessels of the United States any person or persons except citizens of the United States, or persons of color, natives of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the time when this act shall take effect, it shall not be lawful to employ as aforesaid any naturalized citizen of the United States, unless such citizen shall produce to the commander of the public vessel, if to be employed on board such vessel, or to a collector of the customs, a certified copy of the act by which he shall have been naturalized, setting forth such naturalization and the time thereof.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases of private vessels of the United States sailing from a port in the United States to a foreign port, the list of the crew, made as heretofore directed by law, shall be examined by the collector for the district from which the vessel shall clear out, and, if approved of by him, shall be certified accordingly. And no person shall be admitted or employed as aforesaid, on board of any vessel aforesaid, unless his name shall have been entered in the list of the crew, approved and certified by the collector for the district from which the vessel shall clear out as aforesaid. And the said collector, before he delivers the list of the crew, approved and certified as aforesaid, to the captain, master, or proper officer of the vessel to which the same belongs, shall cause the same to be recorded in a book by him for that purpose to be provided, and that the said record shall be open for the inspection of all persons, and a certified copy thereof shall be admitted in evidence in any court in which any question may arise, under any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized from time to time to make such further regulations, and to give such directions to the several commanders of public vessels, and to the several collectors, as may be proper and necessary respecting the proofs of citizenship, to be exhibited to the commanders or collectors aforesaid: Provided, That nothing contained in such regulations or directions shall be repugnant to any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the time when this act shall take effect, no seaman or other seafaring man, not being a citizen of the United States, shall be admitted or received as a passenger on board of any public or private vessel of the United States, in a foreign port, without permission in writing from the proper officers of the country of which such seaman or seafaring man may be a subject or citizen.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the time when this act shall take effect, the Consuls or commercial agents of any nation at peace with the United States shall be admitted (under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President of the United States) to state their objections, to the proper commander or collector as aforesaid, against the employment of any seaman or seafaring man on board of any public or private vessel of the United States, on account of his being a native subject or citizen of such nation, and not embraced within the description of persons who may be lawfully employed, according to the provisions of this act; and the said Consuls or commercial agents shall also be admitted, under the said regulations, to be present at the time when the proofs of citizenship of the persons against whom such objections may have been made, shall be investigated by such commander or collector.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any commander of a public vessel of the United States shall knowingly employ, or permit to be employed, or shall admit or receive, or permit to be admitted or received, on board his vessel, any person whose employment or admission is prohibited by the provisions of this act, he shall on conviction thereof forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars for each person thus unlawfully employed or admitted on board such vessel.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, contrary to the prohibitions of this act, be employed, or be received on board of any private vessel, the master or commander, and the owner or owners of such vessel, knowing thereof, shall respectively forfeit and pay five hundred dollars for each person thus unlawfully employed or received in any one voyage; which sum or sums shall be recovered, although such seaman or person shall have been admitted and entered in the certified list of the crew aforesaid, by the collector for the district to which the vessel may belong; and all penalties and forfeitures arising under or incurred by virtue of this act, may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, with costs of suit, by action of debt, and shall accrue and be one moiety thereof to the use of the person who shall sue for the same, and the other moiety thereof to the use of the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit any commander or master of a public or private vessel of the United States, whilst in a foreign port or place, from receiving any American seaman in conformity to law, or supplying any deficiency of seamen on board of such vessel, by employing American seamen, or subjects of such foreign country, the employment of whom shall not be prohibited by the laws thereof.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall have no effect or operation with respect to the employment, as seamen, of the subjects or citizens of any foreign nation which shall not, by treaty or special convention with the Government of the United States, have prohibited, on board of her public and private vessels, the employment of native citizens of the United States, who have not become a citizen or subject of such nation.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent any arrangement between the United States and any foreign nation, which may take place under any treaty or convention, made and ratified in the manner prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no person who shall arrive in the United States, from and after the time when this act shall take effect, shall be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, who shall not, for the continued term of five years next preceding his admission as aforesaid, have resided within the United States, without being, at any time during the said five years, out of the territory of the United States.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, any certificate or evidence of citizenship referred to in this act; or shall pass, utter, or use as true, any false, forged, or counterfeited certificate of citizenship, or shall make sale or dispose of any certificate of citizenship to any person other than the person for whom it was originally issued, and to whom it may of right belong, every such person shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of felony; and, on being thereof convicted by due course of law, shall be sentenced to be imprisoned and kept to hard labor for a period not less than three or more than five years, or be fined in a sum not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, at the discretion of the court taking cognizance thereof.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That no suit shall be brought for any forfeiture or penalty incurred under the provisions of this act, unless the suit be commenced within three years from the time of the forfeiture.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

An Act giving further time to purchasers of public lands to complete their payments.

Be it enacted, &c., That every person who, prior to the first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and nine, had purchased any tract or tracts of land of the United States, not exceeding in the whole six hundred and forty acres, unless the tract purchased be a fractional section or sections, or fractional sections classed with an entire section, at any of the land offices established for the disposal of the public lands, and whose lands have not already been actually sold, or reverted to the United States for non-payment of part of the purchase money, shall be allowed the further term of three years, from and after the expiration of the period already given by law, for completing the payment of the said purchase money; which further term of three years shall be allowed only on condition: first, that all arrears of interest on the purchase money shall have been paid on or before the time shall have expired, according to former laws, for completing the payment of the purchase money: Provided, That in all cases in which the time for completing the payment of the purchase money may have expired, or shall expire, before the first day of June next, the interest may be paid on or before that day: second, that the residue of the sum, due on account of the principal of such purchase, shall be paid, with interest thereon, in three equal annual payments, viz: one-third of the said residue, with interest which may then be due thereon, within one year; another third of said residue, with interest, within two years, and the remaining third of said residue, with interest, within three years after the expiration of the time for completing the payment on account of such purchase, according to former laws; and in case of failure in paying either the arrears or interest, or any of three instalments of principal with the accruing interest, at the time and times abovementioned, the tract of land shall be forthwith advertised and offered for sale, in the manner and on the terms directed by law, in case of lands not paid for within the limited term, and shall revert in like manner, if the sum due, with interest, be not at such sale bidden and paid: Provided, That the benefit of this act shall not extend to any person or persons, on account of any purchase of any tract or tracts of land, made at any of the land offices northwest of the river Ohio prior to the first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eight.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

An Act allowing further time for delivering the evidence in support of claims to land in the Territory of Missouri, and for regulating the donation grants therein.

Be it enacted, &c., That every person or persons who had filed a notice of claim to any tract of land lying within the district of Louisiana (now Territory of Missouri) with the recorder of land titles, according to law, and have not exhibited any testimony or written evidence in support of the same, and whose claim has not already been confirmed, shall be allowed until the first of January next, to deliver to the recorder of land titles for said Territory the written evidence, or produce other testimony, in support of his or their claim, notice whereof had been filed as aforesaid; and the written evidence delivered to the said recorder within the time limited by this section, in support of claims filed as aforesaid, shall be by him recorded in the same manner, and on receiving the same fees allowed by former acts for recording written evidence of claims to lands in the said district; and the rights of any such person neglecting to deliver the evidence of their claims within the time abovementioned shall become barred and void, in so far as the same was derived from the United States, and the evidence thereof be incapable of being admitted in any court whatsoever.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the recorder of land titles for the said Territory shall have the same powers, and perform the same duties in every respect, in relation to the claims, whereof notice had been filed as aforesaid, and the written evidence in support thereof shall have been delivered, or other testimony produced within the time limited by this act, as the board of commissioners for ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in said district would have had or should have performed if the evidence of such claims had been delivered before the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eight, except that his decision shall be subject to the revision of Congress.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said recorder to make, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a report of all the claims which had been filed, and in support of which evidence shall be received as aforesaid, with the substance of such evidence, together with his opinion, and such remarks as he may think proper, which report, together with a list of the claims which, in the opinion of the said recorder, ought to be confirmed, shall be laid before Congress at their next session for their determination thereon.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person whose claim to a donation of a tract of land in said district has been confirmed by the board of commissioners appointed for ascertaining the rights of persons claiming lands in said district, and is embraced in their report transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, or which has been confirmed by the recorder of land titles, under the third section of the act, entitled "An act making further provision for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Missouri," approved on the thirteenth of June, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, shall be entitled to a grant for six hundred and forty acres, notwithstanding a less quantity shall have been allowed to him by the decision of the said commissioners, or recorder of land titles: Provided, That in no case shall the grant be for more land than was claimed by the party in his notice of claim, nor for more land than is contained within the acknowledged and ascertained boundaries of the tract claimed.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the principal deputy surveyor for the said Territory shall survey or cause to be surveyed, under the direction of the surveyor general, a tract of six hundred and forty acres of land, to each claimant of a donation tract, whose claim has been confirmed as aforesaid, except as provided by the last preceding section, where the quantity claimed by the party was less than six hundred and forty acres, and where the ascertained boundaries of the tract claimed does not include six hundred and forty acres, in which cases the survey shall contain only the land claimed; and the tracts thus to be surveyed shall consist of unappropriated lands, and shall in every case contain the improved lands, by virtue of the settlement on, and cultivation of, which the claimant's right to a donation has been confirmed; and in all cases where, by reason of adjacent prior claims, or the contiguity of the improvements of the persons entitled to donation grants, each claimant cannot obtain a tract of six hundred and forty acres, the vacant lands applicable to the object shall be divided between the claimants, in such manner as shall appear to the principal deputy surveyor most equitable; and whenever plats of the surveys shall have been returned by the principal deputy surveyor to the office of the recorder of land titles, it shall be the duty of the recorder to issue for each tract, according to the survey returned to him, a certificate in favor of the party to each person entitled thereto, which shall be transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said Commissioner that such certificate was fairly obtained, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, then in that case patents shall be granted in like manner as is provided by law for other lands of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the said recorder of land titles, in addition to his salary as fixed by law, shall be allowed fifty cents on each claim which had been filed, and in support of which evidence shall have been received, according to the first section of this act, and on which he shall make a decision, whether such decision be in favor of, or against, the claim; and a further allowance of five hundred dollars, which shall be paid after he shall have made his report to the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which allowance of fifty cents for each claim decided on, and five hundred dollars on the completion of the business, shall be in full compensation for his services, including clerk hire, respecting the claims to be decided on according to this act.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

An Act to alter the times of holding the District Court in the respective districts of New York and Massachusetts.

Be it enacted, &c., That, instead of the first Tuesdays of April and October, the district court for the district of New York, directed by law to be holden at Utica, shall be holden on the second Tuesday of May, and the fourth Tuesday of September, yearly.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all actions, suits, process, and proceedings, commenced, or to be commenced, or now pending in said district court, and liable to be discontinued, or suffer prejudice from the foregoing alterations, may be returned to, and shall be continued to the district court, to be holden in pursuance of this act, in such manner as that the same shall suffer no discontinuance or prejudice by virtue of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the respective terms of the district court of Massachusetts district, which are now required by law to be holden at Salem, within said district, shall hereafter be holden at Boston, within said district, at the respective times now prescribed by law; and that all writs and processes, of whatsoever nature or kind, that have been or may be issued, and made returnable to the said court at Salem, shall be returnable and returned to the said court at Boston, anything in any former law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

12th Con. 2d Sess.—43

An Act to encourage the destruction of the armed vessels of war of the enemy.

Be it enacted, &c., That, during the present war with Great Britain, it shall be lawful for any person or persons to burn, sink, or destroy, any British armed vessel of war, except vessels coming as cartels or flags of truce; and for that purpose to use torpedoes, submarine instruments, or any other destructive machine whatever: and a bounty of one-half the value of the armed vessel so burnt, sunk, or destroyed, and also one-half the value of her guns, cargo, tackle, and apparel, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States to such person or persons who shall effect the same, otherwise than by the armed or commissioned vessels of the United States.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

An Act the better to provide for the supplies of the Army of the United States, and for the accountability of persons intrusted with the same.

Be it enacted, &c., That the third section of the act, entitled "An act to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes," passed on the second day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, from and after the thirty-first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a superintendent general of military supplies, who shall reside at the seat of Government, and receive an annual salary of three thousand dollars; and whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the Secretary for the War Department, to keep proper accounts of all the military stores and supplies of every description, purchased or distributed for the use of the Army of the United States, and of the volunteers and militia in their service; to prescribe the forms of all the returns and accounts of such stores and supplies purchased, on hand, distributed, used, or sold, to be rendered by the commissary of ordnance and officers in his department, by the commissary general of purchases and his deputies, by the several officers in the quartermaster general's department, by the regimental quartermasters, by the hospital surgeons and other officers belonging to the hospital and medical department, and by all other officers, agents, or persons who shall have received, distributed, or been intrusted with such stores and supplies as aforesaid; to call to account all such persons; to audit and settle all such accounts, and, in case of delinquency, to transmit the account, and to state the value of the articles unaccounted for by such delinquency, to the accounting officers of the Treasury, for final settlement and recovery of such value; to transmit all such orders, and generally to perform all such other duties respecting the general superintendence of the purchase, transportation, safe-keeping, and accountability of military supplies and stores, as aforesaid, as may be prescribed by the Secretary for the War Department.

Public Acts of Congress.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the commissary general of purchases and his deputies, the several officers in the quartermaster's department, the regimental quartermasters, the commissary of ordnance, his assistant and deputies, the principal hospital surgeons and officers belonging to the hospital and medical departments, and all other officers, agents, or persons who shall have received, or may be intrusted with, any stores or supplies, of any description whatever, for the use of the Army of the United States, and of the volunteers or militia in their service, shall render quarterly accounts of the disposition and state of all such stores and supplies to the superintendent aforesaid, and shall also make such other returns respecting the same, and at such other times as the Secretary for the War Department may prescribe: Provided, however, That the accounts and returns thus rendered shall relate to the articles of supply only, which may have been received and disposed of, or as may remain on hand, and shall not embrace the specie accounts for moneys disbursed by such officers, agents, or other persons; which specie accounts shall be rendered, as heretofore, to the Accountant for the War Department.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the officers, agents, or other persons, who may receive moneys in advance from the War Department, shall render quarterly accounts to the Accountant of the said Department, of their specie receipts and disbursements, and shall moreover make such other monthly summary statements thereof, to the Secretary for the said Department, as he may prescribe. And the quarterly accounts of supplies, or of moneys, rendered as aforesaid, shall be respectively settled by the superintendent general of military supplies, and by the Accountant of the War Department, according to their respective authorities, within three months after the time when such accounts shall have respectively been rendered to them.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the War Department shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to define and prescribe the species as well as the amount of supplies to be respectively purchased by the commissary general's and quartermaster general's departments, and the respective duties and powers of the said departments respecting such purchases; and also to adopt and prescribe general regulations for the transportation of the articles of supply from the places of purchase to the several armies, garrisons, posts, and recruiting places, for the safe-keeping of such articles, and for the distribution of an adequate and timely supply of the same to the regimental quartermasters, and to such other officers as may by virtue of such regulations be intrusted with the same. And the Secretary aforesaid is also authorized to fix and make reasonable allowances for the store rent, storage, and salary of store-keepers, necessary for the safe-keeping of all military stores and supplies.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the superintendent general of military supplies shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate; but the President is hereby authorized to make the appointment during the recess of the Senate, which appointment shall be submitted to the Senate at their next meeting for their advice and consent.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the superintendent general of military supplies shall be authorized to employ a sufficient number of clerks: Provided, That their annual compensation shall not exceed in the whole seven thousand dollars; and the sum of eight thousand dollars is hereby appropriated for paying the said compensation, and that of the superintendent aforesaid, during the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, empowered, as he may deem it expedient, either to appoint for the time being a special commissary or commissaries for the purpose of supplying, by purchase or contract, and of issuing, or to authorize any officer or officers in the quartermaster general's department to supply and issue, as aforesaid, the whole or any part of the army, in cases where, either from the want of contractors, or from any deficiency on their part, or from any other contingency, such measure may be proper and necessary in order to insure the subsistence of the army or of any part thereof; and such special commissaries shall each, whilst employed, be entitled to the pay and emoluments of a deputy quartermaster general.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint not exceeding six assistant commissaries, to be attached to such army, or to reside at such places respectively as the Secretary for the War Department may direct, for the purpose of receiving from the commissary general of purchases, or from his deputies, and of distributing to the regimental quartermasters, and to such officers as may, by the Secretary aforesaid, be designated, the clothing and other supplies purchased by the commissary general aforesaid, or his deputies, and destined for the use of the troops belonging to the army, or in the vicinity of the place to which such assistant commissaries may respectively be attached. And said assistant commissaries shall, whilst employed, be entitled to the pay and emoluments of a deputy quartermaster general.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide new certificates of registry.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be provided blank certificates of registry, and such other papers as may be necessary, executed in such manner, and with such marks as he may direct; and from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, no certificate of registry shall be issued, except such as shall have been provided and marked as aforesaid; and the ships or vessels of the United States, which shall have been duly registered as such, shall be entitled to new certificates of registry (gratis) in exchange for their old certificates of registry. And it shall be the duty of the respective collectors, on departure of any such ship or vessel, after the said thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, from any district to which such ship or vessel shall belong, to issue a new certificate accordingly, and to retain and deface the former certificate.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry this act into effect.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

An Act rewarding the officers and crew of the frigate Constitution, and the officers and crew of the Wasp.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to have distributed, as prize money, to Captain Isaac Hull, of the frigate Constitution, his officers and crew, the sum of fifty thousand dollars for the capture and destruction of the British frigate Guerriere; and the like sum, in like manner, to Captain William Bainbridge, his officers and crew, for the capture and destruction of the British frigate Java; and the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, in like manner, to Captain Jacob Jones, of the sloop of war Wasp, his officers and crew, for the capture of the British sloop of war Frolic; and that the sum of one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purposes aforesaid.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

An Act for the better organization of the general staff of the Army of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the adjutant-general's, inspector general's, and quartermaster general's departments shall consist of the following officers, that is to say: an adjutant and inspector general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, and not exceeding eight adjutants general, sixteen assistant adjutants general, eight topographical engineers, eight assistant topographical engineers, eight inspectors general, sixteen assistant inspectors general, eight quartermasters general, eight deputy quartermasters general, and thirty-two assistant deputy quartermasters general.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized, if he shall deem it expedient, to assign one of the brigadiers general to the principal army of the United States, who shall, in such case, act as adjutant and inspector general, and as chief of the staff of such army; and the quartermaster general attached to the principal army shall, as heretofore, have the brevet rank, and the pay and emoluments of a brigadier general.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the other adjutants shall have the brevet rank, and the pay and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; all the other inspectors general, and quartermasters general, shall have the brevet rank, and the pay and emoluments of a colonel of infantry; the assistant adjutants general, assistant inspectors general, deputy quartermasters general, and topographical engineers, shall have the brevet rank, and the pay and emoluments of a major of cavalry; and the assistant topographical engineers, and assistant deputy quartermasters general, shall have the brevet rank, and the pay and emoluments of a captain of infantry.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the assistant adjutants general, the assistant inspectors general, and the assistant topographical engineers, shall be taken from the line. The adjutants general, inspectors general, quartermasters general, deputy quartermasters general, topographical engineers, and assistant deputy quartermasters general, may be taken from the line, or not, as the President may deem expedient. And officers taken from the line, and transferred to the staff, shall receive only the pay and emoluments attached to the rank in the staff; but their transfer shall be without prejudice to their rank and promotion in the line, according to their said rank and seniority, which promotion shall take place according to usage, in the same manner as if they had not been thus transferred.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the War Department, and he is hereby authorized, to prepare general regulations, better defining and prescribing the respective duties and powers of the several officers in the adjutant general, inspector general, quartermaster general, and commissary of ordnance departments, of the topographical engineers, of the aids of generals, and generally of the general and regimental staff; which regulations, when approved by the President of the United States, shall be respected and obeyed, until altered or revoked by the same authority. And the said general regulations, thus prepared and approved, shall be laid before Congress at their next session.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the number of assistant deputy commissaries of ordnance shall not exceed sixteen, and that they shall respectively be entitled to the brevet rank, and to the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant of infantry.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, for the better superintendence and management of the hospital and medical establishment of the Army of the United States, there shall be a physician and surgeon general, with an annual salary of two thousand five hundred dollars, and an apothecary general, with an annual salary of eighteen hundred dollars; whose respective duties and powers shall be prescribed by the President of the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the forage, wagon, and barrack masters shall be appointed as heretofore; but each quartermaster general, attached to any separate army, command, or district, shall be authorized, with the approbation, and under the direction, of the Secretary of the War Department, to appoint as many such officers, and to employ as many artificers, mechanics, and laborers, as the public service may require.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the assistant deputy quartermasters general may be appointed, and officers taken from the line and transferred to the staff, may be thus transferred by the President of the United States alone. But all other new appointments authorized by this act shall be made by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate. Provided, That, during the recess of the Senate, such appointments may be made by the President alone, in which case the same shall be laid before the Senate at their next session for their advice and consent.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That every act, and every part of an act of Congress, now in force, within the purview and meaning of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all letters and packets to and from the adjutant and inspector general, adjutants general, inspectors general, quartermasters general, commissary general of ordnance, physician, and surgeon general, and apothecary general, which relate to their official duties, shall be free from postage.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint any of the officers authorized by an act, entitled "An act making provision for an additional number of general officers," passed the twenty-fifth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, during the recess of the Senate, to be submitted to the Senate at their next session for their advice and consent; and that no officer appointed, or who may be appointed, by virtue of the aforesaid act, shall be entitled to receive any pay or emolument until he shall be called into actual service, nor for any longer time than he shall be continued therein.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

An Act to revive and continue in force "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, passed the twelfth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and four, establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's."

Be it enacted, &c., That the act of Congress, passed the second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and eleven, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, passed the twelfth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and four, establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's," be, and the same is hereby, revived and continued in force for one year, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, March 3, 1813.

An Act supplementary to the act for increasing the Navy.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be and he is hereby authorized to have built six sloops of war, and to have the same manned, equipped, and commissioned for service; and that the President be authorized to have built, or procured, such a number of sloops of war, or other armed vessels, to be manned, equipped, and commissioned, as the public service may require, on the lakes.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be and he is hereby authorized to appoint such officers, and to employ the number of seamen which may be necessary for such vessels as are authorized by law to be put in commission, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the building or procuring said vessels, and for the payment of two hundred thousand dollars, for vessels already procured on the lakes, by direction of the President, that the sum of nine hundred thousand dollars, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, be and the same is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated for the purpose of establishing a dock yard, for repairing the vessels of war, in such central and convenient place on the seaboard as the President of the United States shall designate.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President be and he is hereby authorized to contract for the building any of the six forty-four gun ships authorized by law: Provided, That the building be under inspection of an agent appointed by the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to sell or dispose of such and so many of the gunboats belonging to the United States as may have become unfit for service, or as, in his judgment, may no longer be necessary to be retained by the Government.

Approved, March 3, 1813.
